pleasure. They are kind and hospitable to all that visit them; and, as for the women, who do not expose themselves to the weather, they are often very fair, and have brisk and charming eyes, which sets them off to advantage. They marry very young, some at thirteen or fourteen, and she that stays till twenty is reckoned a very indifferent character. The young men are commonly of a bashful and sober behaviour. The easy way of living in this new and plentiful country fosters negligence. The women are the most industrious sex in the place, and by their good housewifery make a good deal of cloth of their coton, wool and flax, some of them keeping their families, though large, very decently appareled with linens and woolens, so that they have no occasion to run into the merchant's debt, or lay out their money in stores for clothing."

These copious extracts from our first historian will tend to give you some idea of the life in this new and undeveloped country then.

Our historic field is extensive and "rich with the spoils of time," but, of course, I can only give here a sort of coup d'oeil, or momentary glance like that obtained by passing on a train at lightning speed through some beautiful and ever-changing landscape.

Pursuant to an act of assembly, the vestry of St Paul's met at the house of Thomas Gilliam, December 15, 1701. The Hon. Henderson Walker, then governor, Colonel Wm. Wilkinson, and Captain Thomas Lewton, were appointed wardens for a year, and instructed "to agree with a workman for building a church twenty-five feet long, posts in the ground, and held to the collar beams." It was built upon an acre of land given by Edward Smithwick, and was finished in 1702. This was the first church ever built upon North Carolina soil. The vestries of those old days, when church and state were united, possesses considerable civil authority, and were about equal in power to our county commissioners. They were empowered to collect tithes, provide standards of weights and measures, etc.

Digitized by Google

In 1704 Dr. John Blair presented himself to the vestry as a minister, and was received by them at a salary of thirty pounds per year.

The services had previously been conducted by readers employed at a small salary, whose only qualifications were that they should promise to live sober and exemplary lives during their periods of service. This temporary church lasted but a few years, for in 1709 the Rev. Mr. Adams, who came here under the auspices of the "Society for Propagating the Gospel" wrote: "They built a church some years ago, but it is small, and very sorrily put together, and therefore I prevailed with them to build another, which they went about when I came away." The dimensions of the new church were forty feet long, twenty-four feet wide, and fourteen feet high. In 1714, according to the records, this church was still unfinished, and it was either never finished at all, or soon fell into decay. It was not until 1729 that the initial step was taken toward building the present brick edifice. In April, 1729, Governor Everard wrote the following letter to the Bishop of London in regard to the church: "'Tis no small concern I send you this, to inform you that our church is not built now, nor is it like to be gone about; for those men that were appointed commissioners for the building it have six hundred pounds in their hands, and are now the only opposers of building one. I was, in order to laying the foundation, chose church-warden with one Mr. Mosely. We had several meetings to consult about building it, but could not agree, being always hindered by our secretary, one Mr. John Lovick, a man of no religion, fears not God or man, believes neither, seldom seen at any place of divine worship, his money is his God, ridicules all goodness. While such a man is in power no good can be expected." In 1736 a tax was laid for building this church, and in 1738 the work was actually begun; it was not, however, finished until 1745. About the latter part of that century the church fell into decay, and was restored to its present beauty largely through the munificence of Mr. Josiah Collins, and the stained-glass window of the apse memorializes this act of generosity.

Digitized by Google

That curious compound of learning, and good natured facetiousness Colonel William Byrd, of Virginia, who was here in 1729, on the commission to run the boundary line between North Carolina and Virginia, wrote that Edenton contained then forty or fifty houses, most of them small and inexpensive, and that a man was called extravagant if he aspired to brick chimney for his house. "Justice itself," says he "is but indifferently lodged, the court-house having much the air of a common tobacco house, and that this in the only metropolis in the Christian or Mohammedan world where there is neither church, chapel, mosque, synagogue or any other place of worship, of any sect of religion whatsoever. This much, however, may be said of the inhabitants of Edenton, that not a soul has the least taint of hypocrisy or superstition."

Bishop Spangenburg, of the Moravian Church, wrote in his diary while in Edenton in 1752: "Edenton is one of the oldest towns in America, and yet it is hardly one-quarter as large as Germantown, although it has a beautiful situation. There are other cities mentioned in the Law Book, but there are no houses, they are only created cities by act of assembly."

In 1777 a young man named Watson, about nineteen years old, from Providence, R. I., made a tour through this section, and left a valuable account of his trip. He said that "Edenton contained then about one hundred and thirty-five dwellings, a brick court house, and was defended by two forts." There were few roads here then. An early minister of the S. P. G. (Society for the Propagation of the Gospel), wrote to England: "I was obliged to buy a couple of horses, which cost me 14 pounds, one of which was for a guide, because there is no possibility for a stranger to find his road in that country, for if he once goes astray, it is a great hazard if he ever finds his road again." Edenton was at this time the court end of the Province, hither had gathered the wealth and refinement of the colony, who constituted for themselves a sort of social oligarchy.

Digitized by Google

Edenton, before the Revolution manufactured harness, hats, nails and rope. The incorporation of the town included four hundred and twenty acres. It had a good foreign trade. During one year there were forty-three arrivals of vessels from foreign ports, and about the same number of departures.

Those principally engaged in the foreign trade were John Campbell, Robert Armistead, Richard Brownrigg, Benjamin Russell, Alexander Miller, John Little and Messrs. Collins, Allen and Dickinson. The names of the largest vessels were the Sterling, Roanoke, Providence, Betsy, Liberty, Two Brothers, the Mary and the Mary Anna.

The first steamboat ever in our waters was the Albemarle. It was used as a ferry boat between Edenton and Plymouth and caried the Raleigh mail. The trial trip was made in two hours and five minutes. It was tendered President Monroe as a pleasure boat when he visited our town in 1819.

Bancroft, the father of American history, wrote: "Here was a colony of men from civilized life, scattered among the forests, resting on the bosom of nature. With absolute freedom of conscience, benevolent reason was the simple rule of their conduct. Are there any," says he, "who doubt man's capacity for self-government, let them study the early history of North Carolina."

I wish the reader to note, and history confirms the fact, that resistance to British authority existed here one hundred years before the Revolution, for the many early disturbances and frequent rebellions, such as those of Culpepper, Cary, and Eastchurch, wer nothing more than resistance to illegal and usurped authority, and a contest for political and religious freedom. There were the long shadows cast before the mighty Revolution. This little colony might, therefore, be styled the birthplace of American Independence.

Digitized by Google

In the history of all governments the oppressed are long tolerant of their oppressors, and a revolution is of progressive development. It took nearly five hundred years to free France of its despots. Brazil, I believe, presents a singular exception, when, as if by magic, the empire ceased to exist, and a virgin republic sprang full panoplied upon the scene.

Nine ministers officiated in this church up to the time of the Revolution, the last one being the Rev. Daniel Earle, D. D., familiar to tradition and history as "Parson Earle." He was a man of such strong points of character, and was so typical of the old fashioned parson of those days, that it is interesting to study his life and character. Oliver Wendell Holes has limned his prototype in that matchless poem the "Wonderful One-Horse Shay." We can see him now as he passes along the highway in his old stick gig, working his Sunday text, and "drawn by his rat-tail, ewe-necked bay." He was the much beloved parson of all this section, baptizing all the children and ministering at all the death beds and marriages, he thus became the welcome guest of every fireside. He was in striking contrast to some of our earlier ministers, who cared but little for their parishioners.

"Parson Earle" was born in the town of Bandon, province of Munster, Ireland, and was the younger son of an Irish nobleman. His family was one of prominence and distinction. One of his ancestors was General Earle, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland in the reign of Queen Anne. In early life he was an officer in the British army, but his marriage with the daughter of a church official changed the whole tenor of his life, and he soon resigned his commission to take holy orders. The exact date of his emigration to America is not known, but he was first sent by the Bishop of London to that part of Virginia now called Gloucester county.

Digitized by Google

In 1757 he came to the Albemarle section to act as curate for the venerable Clement Hall, rector of St. Paul's, then in very feeble health, and upon his death was made full rector. His charge not only included Edenton, but many mission stations scattered at great distances throughout the section now known as Chowan, Hertford and Gtaes counties. His wife, who had died before his departure for America, left him with two little daughters, these he committed to the care of relatives in England to be reared, and educated.

When he first came to this section he settled fifteen miles above here on Chowan River, and named his residence Bandon, after his native town. He was soon afterwards married to a Welch lady, a widow Charity Jones of Smithfield, Va., by whom he had no issue. As soon as he was well established in his new home he sent to England for his two daughters.

Parson Earle was full of energy, public spirit, and enterprise, and established at Bandon the first classical school in North Carolina for boys, in which he was assisted by his daughter, Nancy. He instructed in Latin, Greek and Mathematics, and numbered among his pulpils the children of the Baron de Poelnitz, placed there at the suggestion of James Iredell. The Baron, who was Grand Chamberlain at the Court of Frederick the Great, and his wife, who was Lady Anne Stuart, were spending some time in travel through America.

Parson Earle made improvements in the cultivation of flax, and taught the people of this section the proper method of preparing it for the loom, and the manner of weaving toweling, tablecloths, etc., a household industry still pursued in our rural districts.

Digitized by Google

He was a sympathizer in the struggle of the colonies for independence, and was on that account debarred from preaching in his church at Edenton during the Revolution. Several attempts were made by the British to capture him. Upon one occasion he was informed by a messenger that some scouts were coming to take him prisoner. He immediately buried his silver and treasures in his cellar, and dispatched a servant to his plowmen in the fields to tell them to fly to the woods, and secrete the horses, but his servant was too late, and four of his best horses were captured, the parson himself barely escaping.

Some, following the beaten track of predecessors, have claimed that he was a Tory, because he received his stipend regularly during the Revolution from the S. P. G. This society, as its name indicates, was a religious organization, and not a political one. Organized about the beginning of that century through the untiring zeal of Dr. Thomas Bray for the dissemination of the Gospel in foreign lands, it took no cognizance of political differences; as a proof of this, when the infamous "Church Act" was passed in South Carolina through the chicanery of Sir Nathaniel Johnston, this society finding that it was for his political advantage, and not for the good of the church, held a special meeting in London, and resolved to send no more missionaries until it was repealed. And then, too, it is hardly rational to suppose that he would have espoused the British cause for the sake of the paltry stipend, when he owned such large interests here exposed to the revolutionists, and it is not probable either that he would have antagonized himself to his dear ones, his daughter and grandson, respectively, the wife and son of Charles Johnson, an ardent apostle of liberty, and Mr. Johnson would hardly have been so intimate with a family whose feelings were so inimical to his in a day when political lines were so closely, and so dangerously drawn.

Some stress must also be laid upon the tradition and local history concerning him. Parson Earle's memory is still held in great veneration through all this section, and but a few years have passed since there were old people living in this county, who bore testimony to his patriotism and virtues. The life of a Tory in this liberty-loving section could hardly have had such a glorious sunset. He was the exponent of the popular sentiment here then, and was selected to preside over a revolutionary meeting of the freeholders and other citizens of Chowan county in the court-house at Edenton, August 23rd, 1774, among whom were such patriots as Joseph Hewes, Samuel Johnston and Thomas Benbury, and who passed resolutions condemning the Boston Port Act and the unjust imposition of tax upon the colonies, no Tory could have presided over such a meeting.

Digitized by Google

He was also unjustly accused of being a Tory because he did not sever all connection with the Church of England, and establish an independent church, but he held that the church was a unit; that it was of Divine origin; that he was a simple priest, and that the Bishop of London, then the head of the church, alone had that power. He was a man of the highest educational attainments, verily a learned Theban in its broadest sense, he possessed great wit and humor, blended with the kindest of hearts.

Parson Earle was not only an able and faithful minister, but proved to be a successful farmer and fisherman. He was one of the pioneers in the shad and herring fishing in this country. About the time of the revolution his church at Edenton became somewhat dilapidated, and the worshippers few in number. One Sunday morning, when the parson arrived at Edenton to preach to the faithful, he was shocked and surprised to find that some village witling had placarded upon the church door the following quartrain:

"A half built church,
And a broken-down steeple,
A herring-catching parson
And a dam set of people."

Digitized by Google

He was ever afterwards styled the Herring-catching Parson.

He died in 1790, and was buried near the site of his old home, but the modest slab, which once marked his resting place, has long since been covered by the drifting sands, and the tall pines which surround this lonely spot sigh out to every passing zephyr, in a weird melancholy monotone, their requiem for the repose of his soul:

"Only the actions of the just Smell sweet, and blossom in the dust."——

The original bell of this church was taken down in response to Beauregard's call to melt the church bells of the Confederacy, and cast them into cannon, which incident inspired that beautiful Southern war lyric "Melt the Bells," the beauty and pathos of this poem will excuse its interpolation here.

Melt the bells, melt the bells,
Still the tinkling on the plain,
And transmute the evening chimes
Into war's resounding rhymes,
That the invaders may be slain
By the bells.

Melt the bells, melt the bells,
That for years have called to prayer
And instead, the cannon's roar
Shall resound the valley o'er,
That the foe may catch despair
From the bells.

Melt the bells, melt the bells
Though it cost a tear to part
With the music they have made,
Where the friends we love are laid,
With pale cheek and silent heart,
'Neath the bells.

Digitized by Google

Melt the bells, melt the bells,
Into cannon, vast and grim,
And the foe shall feel the ire
From their heaving lungs of fire,
And we'll put our trust in Him
And the bells.

Melt the bells, melt the bells,
And when foes no more attack,
And the lightning cloud of war
Shall roll thunderless and far,
We will melt the cannon back Into bells.

Melt the bells, melt the bells,
And they'll peal a sweeter chime,
And remind of all the brave
Who have sunk to glory's grave,
And will sleep thro' coming time
'Neath the bells.

(F. Y. Rockett in Memphis Appeal.)

This bell helped to form the "Edenton Bell Battery," which was organized in the winter of 1861-'62, by that cultured gentleman and gallant soldier, Captain William Badham,* of this town, whose unmarked grave lies in yonder silent churchyard, where twilight zephyrs fan the graceful Eulalias to sleep, and whose feathery aigrettes, in turn, like sacred aspergills sprinkle the morning dew like holy water over his grave.

The name of this gun was the St. Paul. It was in numerous actions, and did efficient service during the war, and was finally surrendered at Town Creek.

The Honorable John H. Small is making a praiseworthy effort to locate this war trophy, and have it returned to the parish.

*See Appendix.

Digitized by Google

This venerable church is the admiration of the stranger; to us it is the sacred shrine of our religious liberty, the radiance from whose Shekinah shall pervade—shall live on through all the eons of eternity. Half clad in ivy, Time's green uniform, it stands a majestic, but not a voiceless sentinel of the Past, and as the sun in his eternal flight traces the shadow of its tall spire upon the sacred globe below, unerring as the Dial of Ahaz, which only the finger of God could turn backwards, its aereal gnomon points almost every hour of the day to the grave of some distinguished citizen. Its gilded cross, silhouetted in bold relief against the crimson evening sky, suggests the vision of the Emperor Constantine.

Live on thou mighty instrument of good! Live on thou granary of God's eternal harvest! Oblivion shall not blur, nor Time's remorseless hand can alter, one single page of thy history! "Thou art the Zion of the Holy One of Israel, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against thee!"

APPENDIX.

NOTES CONCERNING THE EARLY SECESSION MOVEMENT IN CHOWAN COUNTY.

On February 12th, 1861 a mass meeting was held at the Court-house in Edenton to consider the interest of North Carolina, and her relation to the National Government. John H. Leary was elected chairman, and T. J. Bland Secretary. A committee was at once appointed consisting of John C. Badham, John A. Benbury, Riddick Mansfield, John Thompson, and John H. Garrett to draft resolutions expressive of the sentiment of the people of the county. Three reports were submitted, a majority report by John A. Benbury, advising prudence, and caution, and discretion, believing that the Peace Congress then in session would find a solution of the trouble between the states; then a minority report was submitted by John C. Badham urging an immediate separation from the Union, and the necessity of adopting means of defense: A third report was offered by John H. Garrett counselling a strict adherence for the time to the Union, until the incoming administration should commit some overt act sufficient to cause a rupture with the National Government. The majority report was, however, adopted, the minority withdrew at once from the Convention, and nominated John C. Badham as the secession candidate to represent the County in the State Convention, which had been called to convene in Raleigh. William E. Bond was nominated as the Union candidate. At the election held on February 22nd the result was as follows, Bond, four hundred and twenty-seven; Badham, seventy-nine; Bond's majority, three hundred and forty-eight.

Digitized by Google

On the 4th of March Lincoln was inaugurated, but those who loved the Union, and hoped for so much perceived in his inaugural address not a straw to cling to, and he soon afterwards issued his celebrated proclamation calling upon North Carolina to furnish troops to invade her sister states, and to force them again into the Union; so on the 1st day of May a second convention was held in Edenton, and nominated Dr. Richard Dillard, senior, who was elected without opposition to the State Convention called by Gov. Ellis, which met in Raleigh on May 20th, the anniversary of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, and severed our connection with the Union. This convention is considered the ablest body of men which ever assembled for any purpose within the borders of the State.

Warlike preparations at once began, the "Dixie Rebels," a six-month's volunteer company, was at once organized by Capt. James K. Marshall, he was afterwards promoted to the rank of Colonel. John C. Badham, a Lieutenant in this company, afterwards became a Major in the 5th N. C., and gave his life for his country at Williamsburg, Va., May 5th, 1862, at which time he held a commission of Lieut.-Colonel. Capt. T. L. Skinner also organized a company, he fell at Mechanicsville, and was succeeded by John A. Benbury, who soon shared the same fate. The few survivors of this famous company are Kader McClenny, R. S. Hedrick, Jerry Mitchell, and W. H. Pratt.

Digitized by Google

In November, 1861, the entire militia of Chowan county was ordered to Roanoke Island for its defense, it consisted of four companies, commanded by Captains Jno. C. Pearce, Thos. Wilson, Isaac Byrum and J. C. Johnston. These companies constituted the 5th Regiment of N. C. militia. The regimental officers were W. A. Moore, Col., R. G. Mitchell, Lt-Col., Wm. H. Bonner, Major, Wm. Badham, Quarter Master, Jos. G. Godfrey, Commissary, Dr. R. H. Winborne, Surgeon and Dr. L. P. Warren, Assistant Surgeon.

The Edenton Bell Battery was recruited by Capt. Wm. Badham in the winter '61-'62, and left Edenton soon after the fall of Roanoke Island, then went to Weldon, and on to Raleigh with sixty men, there they were joined by Lieut. Nelson McClees, of Tyrrell County, with twenty-two men, and by Lieut. Gaskins with about twenty men.

It was understood that Mr. McCleese in attaching himself to this battery would receive a commission as Lieut. Lieut. McCleese was to command one section and two guns, and Lieut. John M. Jones another section and two guns also. After drilling in Raleigh about two months, they were ordered to Camp Lee near Richmond for instruction. As gun metal was scarce, Capt. Badham sent Lieut. Jones to Edenton to secure the church bells, and any others that he might obtain, to be cast into cannon, in response to Gen. Beauregard's famous call. He readily secured all the bells except the Baptist (several members objecting), including the town and court-house bells, the Academy bell, and the shipyard bells; these were conveyed to Suffolk across the country in a wagon, and shipped to the Tredegar Iron Works at Richmond, where they were cast into four cannon, and named respectively, the "St. Paul," the "Fannie Roulhac," for a devout and patriotic lady, a staunch member of the Methodist Church, the "Columbia," and the "Edenton." As the complement of the artillery corps of Gen. Lee's army was then complete, an order was issued that all other artillery in camps should be transferred, for the time, to the infantry service; this produced great mortification, and disappointment in the company, and Capt. Badham at once dispatched Lieut. Jones to President Jefferson Davis with the following note: "Sir: The guns of my company were made of the bells of my town, and have tolled to their last resting place a great many of the parents and relatives of my command, and sooner than part with these guns they had rather be taken out and shot. But, if allowed to keep these guns they will stand by them till they die."

Digitized by Google

This spirited, and patriotic letter was handed to Colonel Dorcas then chief of ordinance, who conveyed it at once to President Davis. Lieut. Jones had not long to wait, the reply came at once that the company would be furnished as soon as possible with both artillery-horses, and harness. The Battery was then assigned to Moore's Third North Carolina Battalion. Horses were difficult to procure, in the meantime McClellan had assumed the offensive around Richmond, and the battery was ordered to Redoubt No. 7, until the horses arrived, when they were sent to Winchester to report to General Pendleton, after being there three months the battery was ordered to report for duty to General McLaw, but the order was soon rescinded. Then came a call from North Carolina ordering the battery to Wilmington, the guns were immediately shipped by rail to Wilmington, and Lieut. Jones with a special detachment carried the horses, and accoutrements through the country. When he arrived at Goldsboro, Gov. Vance, finding that the enemy were threatening, and near, ordered him to halt there, and the guns which had already arived in Wilmington were immediately ordered by telegraph back to Goldsboro. From Goldsboro they marched to Kinston, and reported to Gen. R. F. Hoke.—Capt. Badham, upon receipt of news that an engagement was in progress, sent Lieut. McCleese with section No. 2 to Whitehall bridge, Lieut. Jones was ordered down ten hours later, when he found that McCleese had lost two of his men. Jones was then sent six miles up the river, but as no demonstration was made there, he was ordered on to Goldsboro to protect that town. After about a week the battery was ordered to Wilmington, and guarded the railroad bridge at Northeast, from there they went to Bald Head Island, and did guard duty on the coast until the fall of Fort Fisher, when they fell back on Fort Anderson: after the flank movement of the enemy, and the evacuation of Fort Anderson, the battery was located at Town Creek, where they were attacked by the enemy with considerable force, Capt. Badham sent Sergeant B. F. Hunter with one gun, the "St. Paul," to prevent them from making a flank movement, while he was engaging them at Town Creek; Hunter was supported by a detachment of South Carolina infantry, who broke and ran, leaving him on the field with but a squad of men. Hunter stood his ground fearlessly, and when the enemy arived at the very muzzle of his gun, a Federal officer shouted to him, "If you fire that gun I will kill you:" the Confederate Sergeant, with that coolness, and intrepidity which always characterized him, replied, "Kill, and go to hell," and then ordered his gunner, William Hassell, to fire immediately. He was captured, and would have been cut down at once, but the Federal officer ordered his men to spare his life, saving, "He's too brave a man to be killed." About fifteen men were captured along with Sergeant Hunter and sent to prison at Point Lookout, among them Mr. A. T. Bush of this town. The remainder of the battery fell back to Wilmington, and were subsequently engaged at Cox's Bridge, finally surrendering to General Sherman at Greensboro.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The names, dimensions, and officers in command of the Edenton Bell Battery taken from the note-book of the late Capt. Wm. Badham.

The "St. Paul"—made from St. Paul's church bell in charge of Sergeant B. F. Hunter. Howitzer 1533, E. B. face 1862, left trunnion I. R. A. & Co., F. F. right trunnion 7760 breech.

The "Fannie Roulhac"—made from the Methodist Church bell, and in charge of Sergeant Harry Gregory. Howitzer —1532 face E. B. also 1862, left trunnion I. R. A. & Co., F. F. Right trunnion breech 770.

The "Columbia"—made from the bells of the two shipyards, owned by Col. T. L. Skinner, and Col. R. T. Paine. Gun in charge of Sergeant Ed. Davenport, 1534 face E. B. also—1862 left trunnion I. R. A. & Co., F. F. right trunnion, breech 860.

The "Edenton"—made from the Academy, Court House, and Hotel bells, and other bells presented by private individuals. Gun in charge of Sergeant George Parish. No. 1531 face E. B. 1862—left trunnion I. R. A. & Co., F. F. right trunnion 860 pounds breech.

The "St. Paul," and the "Edenton" were commanded by Lieut. John M. Jones, the "Fannie Roulhac," and "Columbia" were commanded by Lieut. Nelson McCleese. The guns did service at the following places, Winchester, Culpepper Court House, the Seven days fight around Richmond in redoubt No. 7, Goldsboro, Kinston, Whitehall Bridge, Bald Head, Smithfield, (now called Southport), Fort Anderson, Town Creek, the streets of Wilmington, Bentonsville, Cox's Bridge, and surrendered to General Sherman at Greensboro.

RICHARD DILLARD.
"BEVERLY HALL."
Edenton, N. C.

Digitized by Google

William Hooper.

Digitized by Google

LIFE OF

WILLIAM HOOPER

SIGNER OF

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

BY HIS NEPHEW

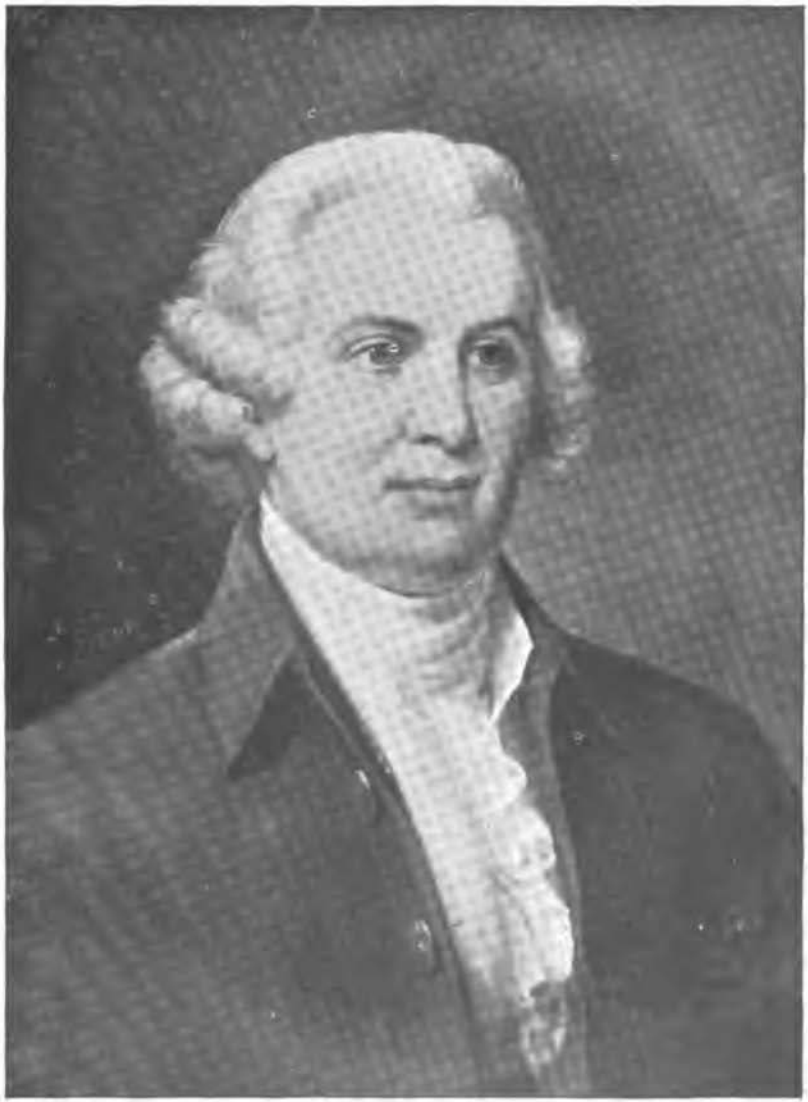
ARCHIBALD MACLAINE HOOPER.

First Printed in the Hillsboro Recorder of Nov. 13th, 20th, 27th, and December 4th, 1822.

Preface by his great-grand-daughter, Mrs. Spier Whitaker, of Raleigh, N. C., formerly Fannie De Berniere Hooper.

1905.

Digitized by Google



Will Hooper

OF NORTH CAROLINA

Signer of The Declaration of Independence

Son of Rev. Wm. Hooper, Rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and Mary (Dennie) Hooper.
Born at Boston the 17th day of June, 1742. Died and was buried at Hillsboro, N. C., October 1790 Removed to Guilford Battle Ground, April 25, 1894.

Digitized by Google

PREFACE.

Being assigned the task of contributng to the Booklet a sketch of the life of William Hooper, one of the Signers from North Carolina, of the Declaration of Independence, I can not do better than to present that written in 1822, by his nephew Archibald Maclaine Hooper, over the signature Callisthenes, as it originally appeared in a series of articles entitled "Biographical Sketches," in the Hillsboro Recorder for November and December of that year. Mr. Griffith J. McRee, in his pamphlet, Life and Character of Archibald Maclaine Hooper, published in 1856, referring to this sketch, says: "About this time Mr. Hooper wrote a memor of William Hooper, to be seen in Wheeler's History and elsewhere, which is decidedly superior to any other of that great patriot as yet offered to the public." Wheeler, publishing in 1851, in expressing his obligations to Mr. Heartt, editor of the Recorder, for a copy of the memoir, characterizes it as "from the pen of one of the best writers of his day, whose connection with the distinguished subject of his biography gave him facilities for procuring facts possessed by no other person."* This sketch is, without doubt, the first—as Mr. McRee says that up to his time it was the best—of William Hooper ever written, and is the source from which his subsequent biographers have largely drawn their material, and to which, as far as regards him, the bibliography of the Lives of the Signers is most indebted.

The author of the Life of William Hooper, in Volume VII of the work entitled "Sanderson's Biography," published by R. W. Pomeroy—this seventh volume in 1827—with the addition of some subject matter, has incorporated into his essay the whole of A. M. Hooper's article published five years before, sometimes verbatim, sometimes with slight changes of phraseology, sometimes liberally paraphrasing, but fails to credit its author with the transcriptions so freely made, except in the case of one passage and then with a note of disparagement, without designating him by name, and as if this extract were his first or only draft on the sketch in question. Introducing therefrom, A. M. Hooper's description of the society of Wilmington, N. C., at that time, he comments: "A flattering picture of it has been drawn by one of his (William Hooper's) relatives, which if somewhat highly colored, may at least have the advantage of exciting or gratifying local recollections." Mr. McRee retorts upon the writer, that while quoting this account he intimates a suspicion that it is "too highly colored," and that, "unable to realize upon the distant Cape Fear, the existence of a society at that period less numerous but more refined than that of Boston or Philadelphia, with shallow arrogance he insinuates his doubt."

Incidental, internal evidence of the respective dates of publication of the articles above enumerated, may be seen in their different renderings of a single passage. A. M. Hooper, in his narrative in the Hillsboro Recorder, in 1822, says: "He (William Hooper) died October, 1790, in the forty-ninth year of his age, leaving a widow two sons and a daughter, all of whom, except Mrs. Elizabeth Watters, of Hillsboro, are deceased. There survive also, of his descendants, three grandsons, children of his eldest son, William, to wit.: William, pastor of the Episcopal Church and superintendent of the academy at Fayetteville; Thomas, a lawyer; and James, a merchant, all residents of the same place." The author of the life of Hooper in "Sanderson's Biography" copies this passage almost verbatim, until, reaching the name of the eldest grandson, Rev. William Hooper, of North Carolina, he mentions him, not as "pastor of the Episcopal Church and superintendent of the academy at Fayetteville," but as "*Professor of Logic and Rhetoric at the University of North Carolina" he having occupied that position from 1825 to 1828—thus correctly bringing up the facts to the date of his own writing. Wheeler, though always loyal to the people of his State and University, while admittedly copying A. M. Hooper's sketch, of 1822, in this passage takes liberties with the text and commits anachronisms in endeavoring to make it conform to the time of his own publication, 1851, in its statements regarding Rev. William Hooper, of North Carolina, who, he says, "was distinguished as a literary writer, was *Professor of Languages at the University, a Baptist minister" and resides in Raleigh." It was correct that he had been (1828-1837) Professor of Languages in the University, that he had become (1831) a Baptist minister, and that he resided for a few months of the year 1851 in Raleigh; but it is obvious that these statements could not have been contained in a paper written in 1822; and, in the meantime, the two brothers, Thomas and James, mentioned by Wheeler as still living had died, the former in 1828, the latter in 1841.

*Italics not in the original.

Digitized by Google

Rev. Charles A. Goodrich's sketch of William Hooper, in his Lives of the Signers to the Declaration of American Independence, published in 1829, Lossing's in Biographical Sketches of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, and those of other writers or compilers bear evidence, with that in "Sanderson's Biography," of a common deviation from A. M. Hooper's sketch. These facts and the consideration that the file (probably the only one extant) of the Hillsboro Recorder, which is in the possession of the descendants of Mr. Dennis Heartt, for so long editor of that paper, is inaccessible to most persons and must eventually be disintegrated by time, and that Wheeler's History of North Carolina has long been out of print, furnish sufficient ground for the republication of the original article. It had been intended to publish, in connection with it, a number of documentary records relating to William Hooper and his family, but having been found too extended for the space usually occupied by a contribution to this periodical, they do not appear.

---

*Italics not in Sanderson.

Italics not in Wheeler.

Digitized by Google

FROM THE HILLSBORO RECORDER.

(Wednesday, Nov. 13, 1822.)

"An obliging correspondent has furnished us with sketches of the life and character of William Hooper, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, the introductory number of which we give to our readers in to-day's papers. It is now forty-six years since that memorable period, and the hands which affixed their imperishable names to the instrument which proclaimed to the world the birth of our independence, with three exceptions only, are now mouldered into dust. The actors in that proud period are fast fading from our view; and though a dazzling brightness is spread over that portion of our history, the names only of many once prominent individuals are all that remain to us of them; the evidences of their eloquence, of their zeal, of their prowess, of their patient endurance of suffering, and of their patriotism, are irrecoverably lost. While the oblivious hand of time is thus burying in the dark mists of revolving years the memory of the heroes of the revolution, the broken fragments and detached incidents of their lives will be seized upon as sacred relics and cherished in fond remembrance. It is therefore highly gratifying to us, and we are persuaded that it will be not less gratifying to our readers, that we are enabled to lay before them the following sketches of the life and character of one of those hardy patriots who fearlessly signed the instrument which declared us free and laid the foundation of civil liberty throughout the world." [Editor of the Recorder.]

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH NO 1.

To the Editor of the Hillsboro Recorder.

Sir—It is much to be regretted that the State of North Carolina has never possessed a good historian. Thence it has happened that her eminent patriots in the cabinet and in the field are unnoticed and unknown; and thence it is, that the most interesting incidents connected with their lives are irretrievably lost.

This State certainly had her full portion of men of talent, when she was a British colony, during her revolutionary contest, and even after that eventful period, forming an epoch from about 1737 to 1790. Many of these enjoyed the advantages of a liberal education, but many were indebted for their stores of knowledge to the exertions of vigorous intellect availing itself of books, of experience in the transactions of business, and of extensive intercourse with enlightened society. The specimens of genius, which appeared in the prints and pamphlets of the epoch alluded to were lost, either in the ordinary casualties of peace or destroyed during the ravages of the revolutionary war. Yet, these, important as they might seem, are not to be compared with the eloquence of the bar and of the senate.

Digitized by Google

How much is it to be deplored, that means were not adopted to preserve memorials which would cast a splendor over the annals of the state, which would enable us to do justice to names that once adorned her literary and political circles, and above all, to those illustrious patriots who planned and achieved her independence!

The bold and animated discussions which occupied our provincial assemblies, which shook our popular meetings, our conventions and our state assemblies during the progress of the revolution, and the angry and obstinate debates which succeeded the ratification of the treaty of peace were consigned to oblivion. All the actors in these memorable and anxious scenes have sunk into the grave; and we have now nothing to assist us in forming an estimate of their moral worth and intellectual greatness but imperfect hints and broken outlines caught from the representations of those who have received them by transmission, and whose second-hand intelligence may be suspected of being embellished by partiality or distorted by prejudice.

I have, sir, been involuntarily led into this train of reflections, by the publication of the proposals for compiling the lives of the signers of the declaration of independence. It is natural that a native citizen of North Carolina should feel a solicitude that the delegation from his state, whose names are subscribed to that instrument, should be treated with a consideration due to their high political career and to their successful exertions in the cause of civil liberty. The merits of Penn and the worth of Hewes are entitled to historical notice, yet I am at a loss, after the lapse of so many years, where to seek for the incidents of their lives, which preceded that ever memorable act that has immortalized their names. Of William Hooper, who was the head or efficient member of that delegation, some traditionary accounts have come to my knowledge. These, I endeavored to preserve for the purpose of composing, at some convenient season, a volume of memoirs. The undertaking is, however, too much for my ability, and is certainly incompatible with my business and my numerous engagements.

Digitized by Google

The fame of this distinguished statesman has suffered more from the injuries of time and neglect, than that of any of his competitors. His political life comprehended a wider extent of the exigencies and emergencies of the times than that of any of them; and his various talents were kept continually in action. Instead, therefore, of attempting to write memoirs of his life, I have resolved to commence the humble task of furnishing sketches for the assistance of his biographer. These sketches written amid the bustle of business and under the weight of many cares, shall appear in a series of numbers in your journal. There seems to me, sir, to be a peculiar propriety in selecting the columns of your journal, for the occurrences of the life of William Hooper. The tomb of the patriot is the shrine where offerings should be made to his memory. The town of Hillsborough was his last and chosen residence. There he enjoyed years of the purest domestic felicity, and there his warmest friendships were cemented by social intercourse. There he poured forth the last fervours of his genius, and there he last awakened emotions of delight and admiration. Indeed, sir, this is ground which, even if it had not been the residence of the signer of independence, ought to be held sacred. It has been the scene where orators and statesmen have engaged in emulous debate, where patriotism has achieved her highest purposes and where eloquence has risen in her noblest flights.

CALLISTHENES.

Digitized by Google

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH NO 2.

Wednesday, Nov. 20, 1822.

To the Editor of the Hillsborough Recorder.

Sir—In the narrative which I have undertaken to furnish for your columns, I entertain no fear of incurring the imputation of incorrectness in detailing ordinary facts; but I must at the same time apprise you that I am not equally confident of that accuracy which consists in the full relation of circumstances, or the precision which is desirable in recurring to dates. A careful biographer will no doubt have it in his power to rectify errors of the last mentioned kind, and to supply deficiencies by reference to the public offices and to the departments of state.

William Hooper, the subject of these sketches, was born 17th June, in Boston, Massachusetts. His father, the Rev. William Hooper, pastor of Trinity Church in that town, is mentioned briefly and imperfectly in Elliott's Biographical Dictionary. The addition of a few words would have prevented the suspicion that the account was penned in the spirit of prejudice. Certain it is, that no minister ever enjoyed more fully the affection and reverence of his congregation, and few have been so much admired for elegance of manners and a bold and impressive eloquence. Besides the learning and the sciences which are obtained at universities, he possessed accomplishments* such as are not considered, in any degree, essential in forming the erudite and well-bred divine. He married in Boston, the daughter of Mr. John Dennie, an eminent merchant. William was the eldest of five children by this marriage.

The plan of his education commenced in his infancy. At the age of seven he was removed in part from the pupilage of his father, and placed at a free grammar school in Boston, the master of which was John Lovel, almost as much

*In a letter from the late venerable Doctor Lloyd, of Boston, dated 24th September, 1796, to one of the sons of W. Hooper, pastor of Trinity Church, he says, "Your father's memory will ever be dear to me. He was the most accomplished gentleman, and one of the best friends I ever had."

Digitized by Google

celebrated in America, in his day,* as was once the famous Doctor Busby in England. Here he was distinguished for his proficiency in the studies preparatory to his entering into College, and completed the regular course of seven years with commendation and praise.† At this early period he was remarked on for the weakness of his constitution. His nerves were so sensitive, that he became an object of incessant raillery to his group of little relatives and to his father's domestics. With increase of years his constitution grew firmer, but his nerves always retained much of their early delicacy. Aided by the instruction of his father, which was never remitted, he made literary acquirements uncommon for one of his age, and advanced himself in his scholastic studies beyond his cotemporaries. It was, no doubt, owing to this circumstance that he was admitted, contrary to established rules, into the sophomore class at Harvard College,‡ There he took rank among the most distinguished, and signalized himself in oratory. He graduated A. B. in 1760, and A. M. in 1763.

Such was the anxious attention which his father bestowed on him in order to form him as an orator, that his vacations were periods of more laborious study and exertion than the terms of his scholastic exercises. And here it is worthy of observation, that the genius of the father and son were diametrically opposite. That of the father was of a loftier cast, and was formed in the school of Demosthenes; that of the son was Ciceronian in its features. The characteristic of the father was vehemency; that of the son insinuation. Were it not a presumptuous comparison, I would say, the father was Chatham, the son was William Pitt.

It was the early intention and earnest wish of his father to devote this son to the ministry. To this, however, the son was disinclined, for reasons that were considered satisfactory by his father, who agreed to alter his destination. Finding that he preferred the study of the law, he placed him with James Otis, Esq., who was then a lawyer of eminence.

*1749. †1756. ‡1757.

Digitized by Google

At this period commenced the attempts of the English Parliament against the rights and privileges of the subjects in the provinces. Mr. Otis took an early and decided stand, by his writings and open declarations, against this assumed power of the British government. He was exceeded by none in zeal, and equalled by few in abilities. The high esteem and respect which the subject of these sketches entertained for Mr. Otis, naturally rendered him partial to his political principles; and there can be no doubt, had the effect of assisting to engraft those principles on his mind, and to establish them permanently there. Subsequent events ripened them into maturity, and rendered them active.

Mr. Hooper, having prepared himself for the practice of law, and finding the bar in his native State so overflowing that there was no encouragement for juvenile practitioners, determined, about 1763, to try the experiment of making his fortune in North Carolina. To this he was invited by the circumstance of his family's having very particular friends, influential characters in the province. Accordingly, in 1764, he embarked at Boston for Wilmington, on Cape Fear. He did not remain long in North Carolina at that visit, but returned to Boston in about a year. In 1765 he again visited North Carolina, and advanced in the practice of law. His health, however, sustained such severe shocks, that he resolved, conformably to the wishes of his father, to abandon it.

In 1767, the death of his father made it necessary that he should revisit his native place, and at the same time blasted the hope of his quitting North Carolina, which, on account of his health only, he wished to do. In the fall of 1767, having determined to fix his residence permanently in Wilmington, he married, in Boston, Miss Ann Clark, of the former place, daughter of Thos. Clark, Esq., deceased, and sister of Gen. Thos. Clark, afterwards of the United States Army. The choice was most fortunate, considered in reference to the qualifications of the lady to adorn and sweeten social life, and most fortunate, too, considered in reference to that firmness of mind, which enabled her to sustain, without repining, the grievous privations and distresses to which she became peculiarly exposed in consequence of the prominent station which Mr. Hooper held in the War of the Revolution.

Digitized by Google

CALLISTHENES.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH NO. 3.

Wednesday, Nov. 27, 1822.

To the Editor of the Hillsborough Recorder.

Sir—In relating the events and circumstances in the life of an individual who has acquired distinction by the exercise of superior faculties, it is proper to notice every particular which has an influence on the progress of the mind.

The fatigue of attending to the practice of the law is, in our days, considered excessive. When Mr. Hooper came to the bar, and for several years after, it was infinitely greater. Then the luxury of carriages for travelling, was not common. Mr. Hooper attended the county courts of Rowan, and other counties in the back country, at least one hundred and eighty miles distant from Wilmington, and he travelled always on horseback. Such fatigue was too great for a constitution naturally delicate.

The manners and customs of the people of Cape Fear, at that period, were not more favorable to a proficiency in legal science, than was the organization of the courts. Hospitality carried to an extreme, and an excessive fondness for conviviality, were the characteristics of those days. In fact, every class of society became infected by the example; and numbers of old families, now reduced to comparative poverty, have reason to rue the prodigal liberality of their ancestors. Hospitality is indeed a virtue, which travellers and geographists, who have attempted to describe North Carolina, very generally allow to her, however penurious their praise may be in other respects.

Digitized by Google

The British Governor Martin, on a visit to Wilmington, having occasion to reply to an address of the inhabitants, presented by Mr. Hooper, styled it "the region of politeness and hospitality." The commerce of Wilmington was then improving, and derived great advantage from a bounty on naval stores. Many of the families residing in it were possessed of fortunes, and all of them in respectable stations, obtained subsistence without painful exertion.

But the dissipation which arose out of an excess of hospitalty, exhibited a more animated picture in the surrounding country. Whole families, and frequently several families together, were in the practice of making visits; and, like the tents of the Arabs, seemed continually in motion. The number of visitants, the noise and bustle of arrivals and greetings, the cries of the poultry yard, and the bleating of the pasture, require some sounding polysyllable to convey an idea of the joyous uproar; some new-coined word to disinguish their caravan approaches from ordinary visits or formal visitations. Every visit was a sort of jubilee. Festive entertainments, balls, every species of amusement which song and dance could afford, was resorted to. The neighing courser and the echoing horn, the sports of the turf and the pleasure of the chase, were alternately the objects of eager pursuit. Everywhere, on the eastern and western branches of the River Cape Fear, were men of fortune, related by blood or connected by marriage, whose settlements extended almost as far as the then lowly hamlet of Cross Creek, since dignified by the name of Fayetteville, and now swollen into importance by a numerous population.

This general ease and prosperity was highly favorable to the cultivation of polite literature, and to the development of talents of a certain kind. The state of manners tended to awaken a spirit of improvement, which pervaded the whole community. Every family possessed a collection of the best English authors, besides which there was a public library, supported by a society of gentlemen, and styled "the Cape Fear Library." Wit and humor, music and poetry, were drawn into action in social and convivial intercourse. Conversation was cultivated to a high degree. Emanating from letters or science, or rising out of the busy scenes of life, it always teemed with instruction and imparted delight. The point of honor was understood and recognized, and the slightest approach to indignity resented. In this exercise of colloquial talent, the ladies participated and heightened the pleasures. Then they were not, as now, early instructed, or perhaps, were not instructed at all in the rudiments of knowledge; but they derived from reading, and imbibed from an association with eminent persons of the opposite sex, a tincture of taste and elegance, and they had softness, sentiment, grace, intelligence—every quality which in the female sex can inspire and exalt the enthusiasm of romantic passion.

Digitized by Google

In the hospitable conviviality of those times, allurements to dissipation were greater than social life usually presents. The actors were far above the cast of ordinary bon vivants. I once hoped to be able to present a biographical sketch of each of them, but my cares and avocations have compelled me to relinquish the task. Among these was Eustace,* the correspondent of Sterne, who united wit, and genius, and learning, and science; Harnett,† who could boast a genius for music, and a taste for letters; Lloyd,‡ gifted with talents and adorned with classical literature; Pennington,§ an elegant writer, admired for his wit and his highly polished urbanity; Maclaine,* whose criticisms on Shakespeare† would, if they were published, give him fame and rank in the republic of letters; Boyd,‡ who, without pretentions to wit or humor, possessed the rare art of telling a story with spirit and grace, and whose elegiac numbers afforded a striking contrast to the vivid brilliancy of the scenes in which he figured; Moore,§ endowed with versatile talents, and possessed of extensive information—as a wit, always prompt in reply, as an orator, always "daring the mercy of chance;" Howe‖ whose imagination fascinated, whose repartee overpowered, and whose conversation was enlivened by strains of exquisite raillery. Wit and humor, and music and poetry, displayed all their charms among the festive deities, and heightened the glow of delight. Is it to be wondered at that the banquet was often carried to an injurious excess?

*Doctor John Eustace. †Cornelius Harnett, afterwards member of Congress. ‡Colonel Thomas Lloyd. §William Pennington, comptroller of the customs of the port of Wilmington, and afterwards Master of ceremonies at Bath.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Hooper did not escape the contagion. He played his part among these distinguished wits, and shed a classic lustre over these refined revels. He kept, however, his professional pursuits in view, advanced himself, and was considered eminent in 1763.¶ The cause of The State vs. McGufford, tried in the Superior Court of New Hanover county, seemed first to establish his claims to eminence. It was a case of atrocious murder, committed by a master on his slave, tried before a Court of Oyer and Terminer. In that cause he was counsel for the defendant; and he displayed such extent of research, and such powers of argument, as excited universal admiration. Maurice Moore was also employed in the same cause, and displayed great dexterity. He thought, and he thought justly, that nature and feeling would resume their rights in time to defeat the force of eloquence. He, therefore, moved to set aside the commission of Oyer and Terminer, and succeeded.

---

*Archibald Maclaine. †Now in possession of his descendents.
‡The Rev. Adam Boyd. §Judge Maurice Moore. ‖Gen. Robert Howe.
¶(Evidently a mistake; probably intended for 1768.—Copyist.)

Digitized by Google

Mr. Hooper distinguished himself about the same time at Halifax Superior Court, as counsel for the heirs of Governor Dobbs, in a suit instituted for the recovery of a landed estate, against Abner Nash, who had married the widow of Governor Dobbs. In this suit he was opposed by several advocates, and among the rest, by the defendant, Abner Nash.

Such is the effect of impressions early received, that the name of Abner Nash always brings to my imagination the inflamed energy of Demosthenes, and produces some of that perturbation which is felt in reading his orations. The eloquence of Nash and that of Mr. Hooper, must, indeed, have exhibited a very fine contrast. Nash was vehemence and fire; Mr. Hooper was stately and diffusive elegance.

Having noted, in the commencement of this number, those particulars which influence the progress of the mind, let me here observe, that the adverse or the prosperous situation of communities depends very much on the state of manners. This observation will be illustrated by a hasty view of the comparative situation of North and South Carolina at this period.

South Carolina was destined to become a mine of wealth, in consequence of most laborious exertions in opening her swamp lands for the cultivation of rice. Economy preserved what industry acquired.

On the contrary, the planters of Cape Fear, many of them holders of great possessions in lands and slaves, scarcely regarded these lands, though superior undoubtedly, to those of South Carolina, and producing a grain larger, more solid, and more nutritious. Content to raise from naval stores a sufficiency to pay the interest on continually increasing debts, they indulged themselves in habits of ease and dissipation. The consequence is, that while the fruitful lands of South Carolina afford an inexhaustible source of riches, the fertile soil of Cape Fear is destined to remain uncultivated, and to furnish evidence of its superior fertility only in its baneful effects on the health of the inhabitants.

Digitized by Google

CALLISTHENES.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH NO. IV.

Wednesday, Dec. 4, 1822.

To the Editor of the Hillsborough Recorder.

Sir—At this distant day, it is impossible to enumerate the many public appointments which Mr. Hooper filled. It is proper, however, to mention, that he was active in behalf of the government against the insurgents denominated Regulators, who were defeated at Alamance in 1771.

Tryon, the provincial Governor, and Martin, his successor, and also Howard the Chief Justice, distinguished him by their regard, and showed a desire to conciliate his friendship. In 1773, Mr. Hooper represented the town of Wilmington in the General Assembly. In 1774 he represented the county of New Hanover in the same body. There he united himself with a band of patriots, in resisting the demand of the British government, to insert a clause into the bill for establishing a court system, favoring British subjects, on the article of process by attachment, to the prejudice of creditors on this side of the Atlantic.* This measure at once deprived the province of courts, and the gentlemen of the bar of their professional emoluments. On this occasion Mr. Hooper took the lead in legislative debate. He also addressed the people of North Carolina in a series of letters, under the signature of Hampden. These, it is said, were much admired. What effect they produced, in accomplishing the views of the writer, we cannot, at this time,

*Among the papers of the late Archibald Maclaine, of Wilmington, are some memoranda that seem to be intended as the groundwork of a defence of his (Maclaine's) political character, which had been attacked. In one item he refers to his conduct "at the time the ministerial instruction came to alter the attachment law."

Digitized by Google

ascertain. The province remained without a judiciary until 1777, when it was revived under the new order of things; meanwhile the law practitioners sacrificed their dependency for subsistence, and the other classes suffered greatly.

In the provincial and State assemblies, Mr. Hooper, on various occasions, brought forward high-toned and energetic measures, and supported them with all the powers of his persuasive oratory. The patriots most conspicuous in opposition to the arbitrary acts of the British government, at that memorable era, were Ashe,* Iredell,† Johnston,‡ Moore,§ Harvey,‖ Harnett,¶ Caswell, Mclaine,†† Nash,‡‡ Burke,§§ and Henderson.‖‖ These was all eminent men. Some of them were natives of the province, and entitled to great weight from their age, their fortune, and the extent and respectability of their connections. From this band Mr. Hoper, at an early age, with small estate, with but few connections, and those few without influence, was selected for the most important public appointments, and that too at conjunctures which called for first rate talents and undaunted firmness.

How he advanced himself so highly in the esteem and confidence of the people of North Carolina, we can at this time only conjecture. It was probably owing to the wider comprehension of his views, to the uncommon fervor of his zeal, to the fascinating splendor of his eloquence; and above all, to the extraordinary activity and perseverance of his exertions.

---

*Samuel Ashe, afterwards Governor Ashe. †James Iredell, afterwards Judge Iredell. ‡Samuel Johnston, afterwards Governor Johnson. §Maurice Moore, Speaker of the House of Commons, one of the judges appointed by the crown. ‖John Harvey. ¶Cornelius Harnett, one of the members of the first Congress. Richard Caswell, afterwards Governor Caswell. ††Archibald Maclaine. ‡‡Abner Nash, afterwards Governor Nash. §§Thomas Burke, afterwards Governor Burke. ‖‖Richard Henderson, for some time Judge Henderson.

Digitized by Google

In 1775* Mr. Hooper was delegated by the Assembly to Congress, and continued in that capacity till 1777, at which time his private concerns compelled him to resign. The proceedings of the first Congress, having been from policy, conducted with great secrecy, the debates were not recorded. When Mr. Hooper first addressed that illustrious assemblage of compatriots, his speech occupied about half an hour; and it is said, upon authority which seems to be too respectable to be questioned, that he commanded the most profound silence, and was listened to with the most earnest attention. The encomium was, however, qualified with this observation, that the house was seized with astonishment at the display of such powers of elocution from North Carolina. He spoke, it is said, more than once on the floor of the House, and always inspired respect and admiration.

During the same period he was a prominent member and distinguished speaker in the Conventions which sat at Hillsborough and Halifax. At the Convention which sat at the former place, in April, 1776, he reported an address to the inhabitants of the British Empire. This was, without doubt, the exclusive production of his pen, and it was, at the time, universally admired. Many other public documents emanated from the same source.

On the most trying occasions, the loftiness and elasticity of his spirit were strikingly manifest. Events which cast a gloom over the minds of others, had no effect in damping his ardor, or in depressing his hopes. The disastrous result of the battle of Germantown, which spread dismay among the whigs, seemed to give fresh courage to his zeal. When the report of the battle reached Wilmington, he was among a party of patriotic friends, who were overwhelmed with consternation. He instantly started from his chair, with unusual animation, and exclaimed, "We have been disappointed! No matter! Now we have become the assailants, there can be no doubt of the issue."

*(Evidently an inadvertence, intended for 1774.—Copyist.)

Obviously intended for Aug. 1775 (Copyist.)

Digitized by Google

Johnston sometimes endeavored to restrain in him what he considered an excess of zeal. "I have," said that great patriot and statesman, "I have resolved to stake my life and my fortune in the contest for liberty, but I am not without painful apprehension of the result. I am indeed afraid that when independence shall have been achieved, talents and virtue may be thrown into the shade, and the mob may govern." In relating this anecdote to me, in May, 1802, Judge Johnston thought that his prediction was rapidly fulfilling.

In the early part of the Revolutionary War, Mr. Hooper's name was extremely obnoxious to the British officers. The captain of a sloop-of-war stationed in the River Cape Fear, meanly descended to fire a house which he had built about three miles below Wilmington.

On his return to private life, his family resided at his seat on Masonborough Sound, about eight miles from Wilmington. There he continued taking part as occasion required, in public measures, until January, 1781. At this time a force under Major Craig, arrived in Cape Fear River. Mr. Hooper found it necessary to remove his family; and having no place to resort to less dangerous, he removed them to Wilmington, preferring to trust them to the humanity of an open enemy, rather than suffer them to remain exposed in a predatory warfare* He sought for safety for himself by flight into the country. His family remained at Wilmington without any outrage until October,

*He had made arrangements for taking refuge in one of the French West India islands in the event of the success of the British arms. Mrs. Hooper understood him that an arrangement of this kind was projected by all the members of Congress, and that it was understood by the French minister. An exile such as this would have been less irksome to him than to many of his compatriots. His father, who was intimately acquainted with French, gave him a critical knowledge of that language, and it is probable that he would soon have acquired fluency in speaking it.

Digitized by Google

1781, when they with others were ordered at a short notice to leave the town. Mr. Hooper and his family returned to it immediately after its evacuation by the enemy in November of the same year; and shortly afterwards removed to Hillsborough, in Orange county. After this and until about 1787, he continued to hold a distinguished rank in the councils of his country, and to maintain a very high station at the bar. Speaking of him, the late Judge Iredell observed that his latest exertions were equal to the most splendid of his meridian days.

Meeting with opposition in his elections Mr. Hooper became soured,* and seemed inclined to retire. He gradually relaxed his exertions and at length withdrew wholly from public life. His withdrawal excited much speculation. Some ascribed it to a solicitude for the interest of his family, which had suffered much by his devotion to the public weal, and others attributed it to disgust occasioned by some legislative measures of the State. It is probable, however, from circumstances, that a union of both causes influenced him. The few years which he lived after his retirement, were spent in domestic enjoyment, for which, indeed, he was better fitted by his temper and sensibilities, than for public life.

---

*He was probably soured by finding himself in collision with some of his compatriots and best friends. Maclaine, who was one of these, became irritated by the difference of opinion between them. After the ratification of the treaty of peace, Maclaine was anxious to shield the disaffected from persecution, and in the pursuit of this object he exercised no address. Mr. Hooper, who no doubt coincided with him so far as respected the justice and humanity of this course, thought that great prudence and circumspection ought to be observed; and this prudence and circumspection was the more necessary on his part, from the circumstance of all his connections having espoused the royal cause. Aware that his station was such that he ought to be above suspicion, he suppressed, on this occasion, the best and warmest feelings of his heart. In a letter to a friend, dated 18th February, 1785, Maclaine adverts to Mr. Hooper's conduct in this respect, and in the asperity of his temper puts a construction on it which in his cooler moments he would have retracted. In this letter he speaks, in the style of complaint, of the superiority which Mr. Hooper's education gave him, of the deference paid to him by Iredell, and of the homage he received from Johnson, and adds, "I never pay him compliments, but, on the contrary, have opposed him."

On his return from the Assembly, which met for the purpose of carrying into effect the State Constitution, many inquiries were made by the crowds which collected around him, relative to the powers confided to the several departments of the government. Mr. Hooper having satisfied curiosity as to other particulars, one of the crowd asked, "And what powers, sir, have the Assembly given to the governor?" "Power, sir," replied Mr. Hooper, "to sign a receipt for his salary."

Digitized by Google

He died October, 1790, in the forty-ninth year of his age, at Hillsborough, leaving a widow, two sons and a daughter, all of whom, except Mrs. Elizabeth Watters, of Hillsborough, are deceased. There survive also of his descendants, three grandsons, children of his eldest son William, to wit.: William, pastor of the Episcopal Church, and superintendent of the academy in Fayetteville; Thomas, a lawyer; and James, a merchant, all residents of the same place.

In person he was of the middle size, elegantly formed, delicate rather than robust. His countenance was pleasing and indicated intelligence. His manners were polite and engaging. With his intimates and friends, his conversation was frank and animated, enlivened by a vein of pleasing humor, and abounding with images of playful irony. It was sometimes tinctured with the severity of sarcasm, and sometimes marked by comprehensive brevity of expression. His father, himself a model of colloquial excellence, had cultivated this talent in his son with great assiduity.

From the same preceptor he learned the art, rarely attained, of reading with elegance. In this respect the grace and propriety which marked his manner, communicated, it is said, a pleasure even when he read cases from the law reporters, or the ordinary documents of a suit in court. In mixed society he was apt to be reserved. Sincerity was a striking feature in his character. He never practiced disguise. Hospitality he carried to excess.

In his domestic relations he was affectionate and indulgent. Failings he certainly had, but they were not such as affected the morality of his private or the integrity of his public conduct.

As a writer we cannot fairly graduate his pretensions. The letters of Hampden, which would have furnished the best criterion for this purpose, have perished with the prints which contained them.

As a letter writer he was, I think, deficient in ease and simplicity; but his epistolary compositions must have been unequalled. Major Craig intercepted one of these, which impressed him with such an exalted opinion of the writer, that afterwards, when Mr. Hooper, accompanied by Maclaine, visited Wilmington under the protection of a flag of truce, Craig scarcely noticed the latter, while to Mr. Hooper he paid the most marked and respectful attention.

Digitized by Google

On all important occasions he was called upon by the inhabitants of Wilmington and its vicinity to exercise his pen. A very flattering testimony to his talents, considering the number of eminent men who then resided in the same part of the country, some of whom had cultivated the art of composition with great success. Among these were Maclaine, Eustace, Lloyd, Pennington, and Moore.

In classical learning and in literary taste he had few superiors; yet he was never ostentatious in the display of these qualifications. He possessed a talent for elegant versification, which he exercised in his moments of recreation. His ode on the birthday of Washington, which circulated only among a few friends, was pronounced, by a competent judge, superior to any which had been published.* I have never been able to procure the manuscript.

Among his friends were some of opposite political principles, but it produced no change of regard towards them, nor did he in any instance depart from an inherent benevolence, by becoming the persecutor of any on account of his principles or prejudices.

In his private concerns his probity and honor were unimpeached. His estate was moderate, and he was not avaricious.

His religion was that of a sincere Christian, free from bigotry to any sect or denomination.

He appears to have been free from envy. In a letter to Maclaine he describes the death of Judge Henderson in a strain of enthusiastic admiration of the talents of that extraordinary man.

*In 1789.

Digitized by Google

After John Haywood, now Judge Haywood, appeared at the bar, and before his faculties were developed, or perhaps even known to himself, he had to contend with men of great intellectual powers and profound legal science. Mr. Hooper sustained him in the unequal contest. This patronage of rising merit, if it arose from generous feeling, is worthy of mention; and it is not less worthy to be noted if it arose from a sentiment of friendship, for that revered personage* who has rendered the names of Haywood dear to the people of North Carolina, whose boundless benevolence pointed him out as the Atticus of his native State, until more recent events presented him in the sterner aspect of Aristides the Just.

His penetration into character was obvious in the choice of his friends. He always selected them from the most worthy; and he experienced in every instance, that warm reciprocal attachment which was due to the ardor and constancy of his friendship.

The champion of that illustrious band, which in North Carolina first opposed the encroachments of arbitrary power, no man ever entered into the public service on more correct principles, or with purer or more disinterested motives. When he engaged in revolutionary measures, he was fully aware of the dangers to which he exposed his person and estate; yet in spite of untoward events, his enthusiasm never abated, his firmness never forsook him. In times the most disastrous he never desponded, but sustained his situation with increased intrepidity.

CALLISTHENES.

It seems fitting to subjoin to the foregoing memoir some estimates of William Hooper by more recent writers and who are not related to him by ties of blood. Says Wheeler:

"The life and character of William Hooper, who was long a resident and representative of New Hanover county,

*John Haywood, Treasurer of the State.

Digitized by Google

deserve our especial attention. It was most strangely aspersed by Mr. Jefferson, in a letter to John Adams, dated 9th July, 1819, in which he says, that 'we had not a greater Tory in Congress than Hooper.' This remark produced in 1834, Jones' 'defence of North Carolina.' That his prejudices had clouded Jefferson's judgment in regard to this, as well as to our Declaration of Independence at Charlotte, there can be no doubt. It is, however, a matter of no regret, since these very errors have stimulated the sons of North Carolina to examine the records and vindicate her character and the integrity of history. The character of William Hooper has been placed beyond all cavil, and the Declaration of Independence at Charlotte in May, 1775, now rests on as solid foundations for truth and reality, as the National Declaration at Philadelphia, on 4th July, 1776."

Mr. Griffith J. McRee, in his invaluable work, Life and Correspondence of James Iredell, now like Wheeler's History out of print, noting the friendship between Iredell and Hooper, says:

"Mr. Hooper was nine years Mr. Iredell's senior and already a man of mark at the bar and in the Assembly. To estimate at its full value his deference to Iredell, these facts must be borne in mind. Mr. Hooper was a native of Boston, and a graduate of Cambridge, Mass. After studying law with James Otis, he removed to North Carolina in 1764.* He became a citizen of Wilmington. That town and its vicinity was noted for its unbounded hospitality and the elegance of its society. Men of rare talents, fortune and attainment, united to render it the home of politeness and ease and enjoyment. Though the footprint of the Indian had, as yet, scarcely been effaced, the higher civilization of the 'Old World' had been transplanted there and had taken vigorous root." Then, after enumerating the eminent patriots and literati among whom William Hooper figured

*Mr. Hooper did not settle permanently in Wilmington until 1767. See Memoir ante.—[Copyist.]

Digitized by Google

in the Cape Fear region, he continues: "These were no ordinary men. They were of the remarkable class that seem ever to be the product of crises in human affairs. Though inferior to many of them in the influence that attends years, opulence and extensive connections, yet in scholarship and genius Mr. Hooper was pre-eminent. I use the word genius in contradistinction to talent. He had much nervous irritability, was imaginative and susceptible. With a well-disciplined mind and of studious habits, he shone with lustre whenever he pleased to exert himself. He had generous impulses, and his intercourse with his family and friends was marked by a caressing tenderness. In the course of the Revolution he never wavered, though he often desponded. If hope seemed sometimes about to desert him forever, and he felt in his heart the rustle of her wings as she prepared for flight, his deep-rooted principles were never shaken. He lived long enough to see the political edifice, to whose construction he had so largely contributed, completed, and its soaring dome to the nations of the earth 'a lamp unto their feet, and a light unto their path.' As his fame is national, I need not dwell longer upon his career." Life of Iredell, Vol. I., pp. 194, 195, 196.

"Was Jefferson jealous of Hooper?" asks McRee later on. "Was he impatient of what he did not himself possess —splendid elocution, as he was notoriously envious of military fame? Was there a feud between these two eminent men? An affirmative answer to these interrogatories will certainly throw much light upon the calumny of Jefferson, that 'there was no greater Tory in Congress than Hooper,' and explain Mr. Hooper's personal dislike to Jefferson and his followers, in the early days of the Republic. If Hooper's fame, so well defended by Jones, needed further vindiction, his letters to Iredell place upon impregnable ground his virtue and patriotism." Ibid. Note on p. 427.

Dr. Alderman, now President of the University of Virginia, then Professor in the University of North Carolina, in his address on William Hooper delivered at Guilford Battle Ground, July 4, 1894, says: "In the first decades of this century our grandfathers were filled with indignation and astonishment at Mr. Jefferson's remarkable letter to John Adams in which he declared that 'there was no greater Tory in Congress than William Hooper.' Jo. Seawell Jones, choking with rage, rushed to the rescue in his celebrated Defence of North Carolina, and with an uncommon mingling of invective, passion, partizanship, critical power and insight, effectually disposed of his great antagonist. The charge on the face of it was absurd. * * * * It is a hard thing to say of so illustrious a man as Mr. Jefferson, that he had strange moments of liability to post-mortuary slander, but the poisonous scraps of the 'Anas' and the researches of two generations into his accusation against Hooper abundantly and mournfully attest its truth. Mr. Hooper's mental attitude toward the idea of independence is a matter of vital interest to our people, however, and his private and confidential correspondence reveals this attitude in a most complete and perfect way: 'Before April 19, 1775,' said Thomas Jefferson himself, 'I had never heard a whisper of a disposition to separate from the mother country.' 'When I first took command of the army (July 3d, 1775) I abhorred the idea of independence,' said George Washington. Over one year before these words were uttered, April 26, 1774, Hooper wrote a letter to James Iredell in which occurred the following prophetic words: 'They (the Colonies) are striding fast to independence, and ere long will build an empire upon the ruins of Great Britain; will adopt its Constitution purged of its impurities, and from an experience of its defects, will guard against those evils which have wasted its vigor.'" Says Mr. McRee: "Of this letter Jones remarks, 'I look upon this letter as not inferior to any event in the history of the country; and in the boldness and originality of its views,

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

I say that it is a document without a rival at the period of its date. It takes precedence of the Mecklenburg Declaration as that does of the national Declaration of Independence.'" Dr. Alderman adds: "This is the most noteworthy personal letter of the Revolution. It antedates all known expressions on the subject of separation and confers upon William Hooper the proud title of the Prophet of American Independence.* Let me not conclude," says the same writer, "without speaking of Mr. Hooper, as a man. No more fascinating and courtly figure graces the life of our simple, earnest past. His slight, fragile form, his serene, beautiful face wherein is blended masculine strength and womanly sweetness, 'a face that painters love to limn and ladies to look upon' stands out, like some finely wrought cameo, against a background of chaos and revolution. In his letters we catch a glimpse of the ceremoniousness, the sleepless deference, the delicate punctilio of an unhurrying age; in his merry-makings we are able to reproduce the stately minuet, the vanished draperies, the personal royalty expressing itself in stately dignity, of a time forever gone. He was a tender, sensitive, loyal, happy gentleman, a fearless, forceful, vigorous-minded citizen, a great orator—a great lawyer; he loved his friends and was by them beloved. * * * * He loved the people of his state and was willing to spend himself in their service. * * He had that proud faith in family and breeding which taught him the sacredness of noblesse oblige, unfailing self-respect and freedom from sordidness or any sort of stain."

Another accomplished writer of to-day thus concludes an account of William Hooper: "Of Mr. Hooper it may be

*In this letter of April 26, 1774, Hooper pays a warm tribute to Iredell, as follows: "I am happy dear sir, that my conduct in public life has met your approbation. It is a suffrage which makes me vain, as it flows from a man who has wisdom to distinguish and too much virtue to flatter. * * * * While the scene of life in which I was engaged would have rendered any reserve on my part not only improper but even culpable, you were destined for a more retired but not less useful conduct; AND WHILST I WAS ACTIVE IN CONTEST YOU FORGED THE WEAPONS WHICH WERE TO GIVE SUCCESS TO THE CAUSE which I supported.

Digitized by Google

truly said, that as brilliant as were Howe, Harnett, Iredell, Ashe and Moore, and all those renowned names that adorned North Carolina's annals during his time, taking a view of the entire galaxy, none surpassed him in shining talents and fine accomplishments, and none deserves more grateful appreciation by North Carolinians." Noting the historic friendship between Judge Iredell and Mr. Hooper, he quotes the former as writing to Mrs. Iredell: 'I wish to be like him,' adding: "Indeed, the admiration of Judge Iredell for him was unbounded."

Says Capt. S. A. Ashe, of Raleigh, N. C., in a letter under date of June 5, 1905: "Of late years I have come to still further appreciate the influence of Mr. Hooper in determining patriotic action on the Cape Fear. I think he was the leader in stirring up feeling in 1774, in response to Boston sentiment, his connection with Boston being close. And he certainly was the prime mover in calling together the meeting that issued the address requesting the voters in the different counties to elect delegates to the first Provincial Congress."

Still another able writer of the present time, refers to William Hooper, as "one of the greatest and best men of whom the annals of North Carolina can boast."*

SUPPLEMENT.

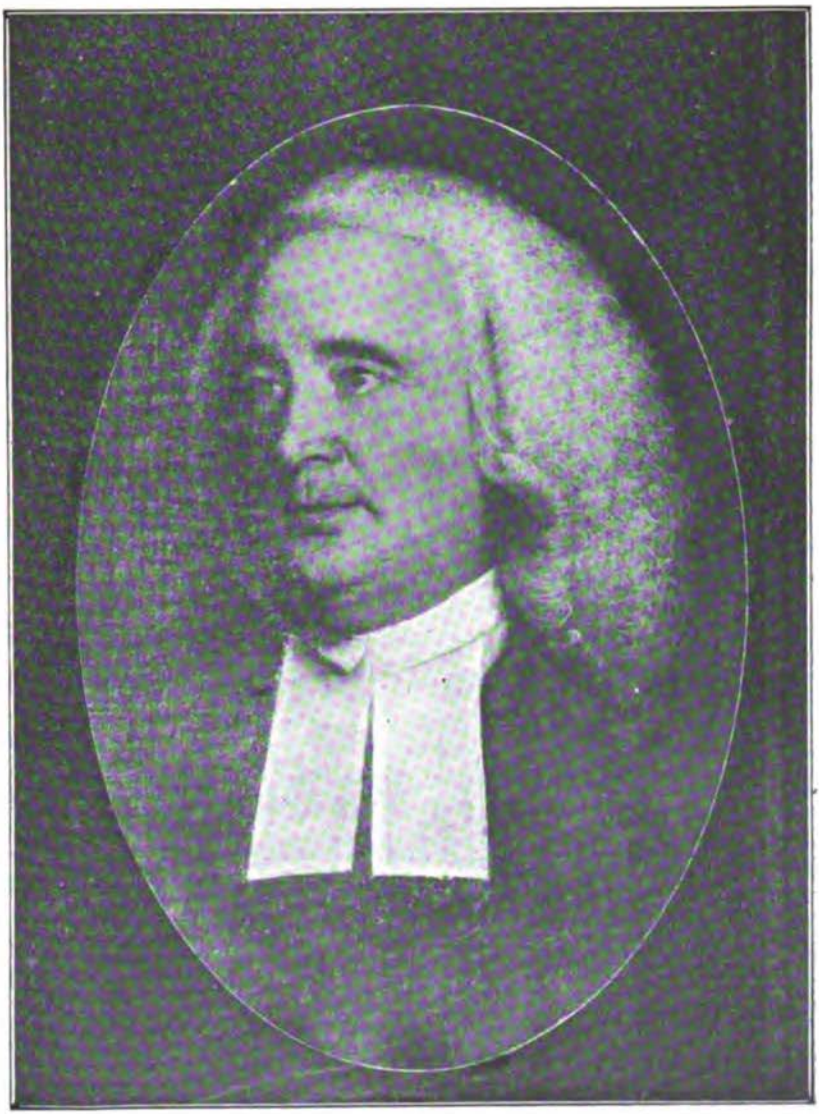
THE HOOPER FAMILY.

(BY MRS. FANNY DEBERNIERE (HOOPER) WHITAKER.)

As William Hooper, Signer of the Declaration of Independence, like the other founders of this Republic, belongs in a sense to the nation, it was hoped that the addition to the reprint of the preceding sketch, of a number of miscellaneous and desultory records relating to himself and his family would not be deemed impertinent and that they would

*Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood, of Raleigh, N. C., in his LIFE OF GOVERNOR TRYON.

Digitized by Google



William Hooper

Rev. Wm. Hooper. (1704–1767) second Rector of Trinity Church, Boston, from 1747 to 1767; father of William Hooper, Signer of the Declaration of Independence.

Digitized by Google

be found of interest to that public the foundations of whose existence and prosperity he aided in establishing. Furthermore, mistakes have been made by certain persons whose names are on the Lineage Books of the "Daughters of the American Revolution," in entering that Society through alleged descent from him, whose claims to this descent can not be other than apocryphal, as a careful perusal of the documents referred to would show.

Doubly descended from the Rev. William Hooper, of Boston, Mass., who was the founder of his family in this country and second Rector of Trinity Church in that city, from 1747 to his death in 1767—on my mother's side through his son, the Signer, and on my father's through his son George—and having made a study of the family history, I may be pardoned a double interest in its exposition as the facts warrant. In the pursuit of this object, by investigation and by the collection of all available data bearing upon the subject, no pains have been spared and much expense has been incurred, and it was intended, as above-intimated, to publish, in connection with the foregoing memoir, the documents obtained, but the plan has been found incompatible with the limits of this periodical, and the following outline of the family is submitted.

The name Hooper is widespread in America, only less so, perhaps, than those respectable and time-honored patronymics Smith and Jones, and embraces very many entirely unconnected families. That to which William Hooper, Signer of the Declaration, belongs, is restricted to well defined and demonstrably narrow limits. The frequent occurrence in this family of the names William and Thomas, renders somewhat difficult, without awkward circumlocution or repetition, a perfectly clear account of it, the Rev. William Hooper, of Boston, his son William, his grandson William and his great-grandson, Rev. William Hooper, of North Carolina, each having had sons by those names. It is convenient in this account to speak of the second William as the Signer. As stated in the memoir, he married on 1767, Anne Clark, of Wilmington, sister to Thomas Clark, Jr., Colonel and Brevet-Brigadier-General in the Revolutionary army, and his children were three in number, namely:

Digitized by Google

William,
Elizabeth,
Thomas.

Thomas died, unmarried, about 1806, probably in Brunswick county, where he owned considerable property and most likely resided.

Elizabeth married in 1790, Col. Henry Hyrn Watters,* and her only child, Henry H. Watters, Jr., died, unmarried, at Wilmington, Nov., 1809, aged eighteen years, while at home on vacation from the University.

William, the eldest, married, June 26, 1791, Helen Hogg, daughter of James Hogg, of Hillsboro, and died in Brunswick county, July 15, 1804, leaving, like his father, three children, as follows:

William (Rev.),
Thomas,
James.

Of these, James, born in Hillsboro in 1797, married Margaret Broadfoot, daughter of Andrew Broadfoot, of Fayetteville, N. C., and died, without issue, in Fayetteville, June 26, 1841.

Thomas, born in Hillsboro, 1794, married, May 25, 1825, Eliza Donaldson, daughter of Robert Donaldson, of Fayetteville, and he also died childless, Nov., 1828, at Chapel

*Col. Henry H. Watters is said to have commanded a regiment of Continental troops at the battle of Cowpens. He died at Wilmington, October 1809. Mrs. Watters died June 30, 1844, aged seventy-four years.

†Mrs. Helen Hogg Hooper married August 17, 1809, Rev. Joseph Caldwell, D. D., first President of University of North Carolina, and died October 30, 1846. There were no children by this marriage.

Digitized by Google

Hill, his wife having died October, 1825, within five months of their marriage.

The line of descent was thus left in the eldest son, Rev. William Hooper, of North Carolina, who was born in Hillsboro, 1792, married in 1814, Frances Pollock Jones,* eldets daughter of Edward Jones for many years Solicitor General of North Carolina, and died at Chapel Hill August 19, 1876. He was father of seven children, namely: William, M. D., Edward, M. D.,† Mary,‡ Joseph,§ Elizabeth, Thomas‖ and Duponceau, M. D.,¶ all of whom, except Elizabeth and Duponceau, are represented by posterity, and concerning whom and their posterity, information may be had from the latter.

It is thus apparent that two (Elizabeth and Thomas) of the Signer's three children, and three (Henry H. Watters, Jr., and Thomas and James Hooper) of his four grandchildren, having died leaving no issue, the line of descent from him was left solely and exclusively in his grandson, Rev. William Hooper, of North Carolina, and that no one not descended from the latter has a right to claim descent from his grandfather, William Hooper, Signer of the Declaration. Which, as above said, may be demonstrated.

In this account we shall go no further back than the Rev. William Hooper, of Boston. His children were:

---

*Mrs. Hooper died in Fayetteville, March 10, 1863.

†Dr. Edward Hooper's daughter, Theresa, is wife of ex-Governor Joseph F. Johnston, of Alabama.

‡Mary, my mother, who married her 4th cousin, John DeBerniere Hooper, son of Archibald Maclaine Hooper.

§Joseph, sole survivor of these—"84 years young"—now residing in Jacksonville, Florida.

‖Thomas spent his life in teaching. One of his sons, James S. Hooper, is in business in Wilmington, N. C.

¶Dr. DuPonceau Hooper, Assistant Surgeon 8th Fla. Reg., mortally wounded at the battle of Fredericksburg, died at Fayetteville, unmarried, April 4. 1863.

Digitized by Google

William (the Signer),
John,
George,
Mary,
Thomas.

Mary married in 1768, John Russell Spence, of London, who died in Boston, Nov. 1771. John died about 1795. Administration on his estate, granted in Boston in that year, does not mention widow or children. George and Thomas, like their eldest brother William, whose history is recounted in the foregoing pages, came to North Carolina, and both prospered in merchandising. Thomas married, Dec., 1778, Mary Heron, daughter of Capt. Benj. Heron, of Bertie county, North Carolina, removed to South Carolina and died without issue, Aug. 1, 1798, in the 48th year of his age, being survived by his widow twenty-two years.

George, though a loyalist from conviction, was a man of unimpeachable integrity, and charming personality, and possessed the esteem and confidence of his acquaintances. He was considered by competent judges to be the equal of either of his brothers in ability and literary taste. He married Catharine Maclaine, only daughter of Archibald Maclaine, an ardent Revolutionary patriot of North Carolina, and died in 1820 or 1821, leaving two children, Archibald Maclaine Hooper, and Mary; Spence, an intermediate child, having died in infancy.

Archibald Maclaine Hooper, lawyer and journalist, "a ripe scholar and one of the most graceful and accomplished writers of his day," was born in Wilmington, North Carolina, December 7, 1775, married, June 8, 1806, Charlotte DeBerniere, daughter of Lieut. Col. John A. DeBerniere,* of the 60th Regiment of the British Army, and died Sept. 25, 1853, aged 78 years. Of his children may be mentioned

*Lieut.-Col. John A. DeBerniere, emigrated to America in 1799, grandson and namesake of the Huguenot refugee, Jean Antoine DeBerniere, who fled from France about the time of the Revocation, and settled in Ireland.

Digitized by Google

Yours very truly
W. Hooper

William Hooper, D. D., LL. D., for many years Professor of the University of North Carolina and other institutions of learning; President Wake Forest College, N. C., 1846 to 1849; an instructor of youth for sixty-five years. He was eldest son of William and Helen (Hogg) Hooper, and grandson of William Hooper, Signer of the Declaration of Independence, and Anne (Clark) Hooper. Born Aug. 31, 1792, died at Chapel Hill, Aug 19, 1876.

Digitized by Google

George D., (1809-1892), who was a member of the bar of Columbus, Ga., for a time chancellor of the east division of Alabama, and one of the best known supreme court and chancery lawyers of the state; John DeBerniere, (1811-1886) for many years Professor of Languages in the University of North Carolina, said by Mr. McRee to be, in his opinion, "the most accurate Greek and Latin scholar of his age and day;" Johnson J., (1815-1862) author of Simon Suggs and other humorous works, and Secretary of the Confederate Provisional Congress; Louisa and Mary, remarkable for their personal beauty and loveliness of character, of whom Mary died at Pittsboro, Aug. 1837, aged about eighteen years; Louisa married first, Rev. Daniel Cobia, of South Carolina, "but to smooth his path to the grave;" second, Sept. 20, 1842, Rev. John J. Roberts,* and died June 16, 1846, in the 30th year of her age, leaving two children, John DeBerniere Roberts, and Mary Charlotte Roberts. The latter is now the widow of Thomas McCrady, whose home was Charleston, S. C., and resides with her children at Cambridge, Mass.; the former married Miss Lapham and died young, leaving an only child, John Lapham Roberts.

Mary, daughter of George (brother of the Signer) and Catharine (Maclaine) Hooper, married, first, Mr. Shaw,† a daughter, Catharine, being the only child of the marriage; second, June 6, 1806, James Fleming,‡ a merchant of Wilmington. The children of the second marriage were Mary, who married Col. Haynes Waddell, Elizabeth, wife of Rev. Thos. F. Davis, afterwards Bishop of South Carolina from 1853 to 1871; Charlotte, wife of Rt. Rev. Wm. M. Green, of North Carolina, Bishop of Mississippi from 1850 to 1887; and James, who died young, unmarried. There are numerous descendants of these three sisters, prom-

---

*Rev. John J. Roberts, D. D., now living, and resides alternately in New York City and Sandwich, Mass.

†The Shaw line is now extinct.

‡Mr. Fleming was killed by a horse, about 1811. Mrs. Fleming died of a lingering malady, in 1861.

Digitized by Google

inent among whom are Rev. DeBerniere Waddell, Mr. Thos. F. Davis, of Yazoo City, Miss., Rev. Stephen H. Green and many others.

Most of the children of George D. Hooper, of Alabama, died in infancy. Of those who survived to maturity, the following may with propriety be mentioned. George W. and Charles M. joined volunteer companies of the Confederate Army at the beginning of the War for Southern Independence. George went into the battle of Seven Pines, as Captain in the 6th Alabama Regiment, was shot in the side, had the bones of both legs broken and lost the use of his right hand. He was highly complimented by Gen. Rhodes for his courage and ability and received promotion as Lieutenant Colonel for that day's fight. He was then about twenty years old and this was his only battle, but he afterwards performed for the Confederate States Army, several commissions such as were possible to a cripple. After the war he was Prosecuting Attorney for Russell county, Alabama, was a successful lawyer and died in 1883, leaving a widow and children. His brother, Charles, was promoted from Second Lieutenant to Lieutenant Colonel on the battle field of second Manassas, for distinguished gallantry in the face of the enemy, was afterwards awarded a medal of honor authorized by the Confederate Congress, and made Colonel on the recommendation of General Lee himself. John DeBerniere, the youngest son, was the first Inspector of Mines in Alabama and is a Civil and Mining Engineer in that State.

Johnson J. Hooper, author of Simon Suggs and Secretary of the Confederate Provisional Congress, who died in Richmond, Va., in June, 1862, left two children, William and Adolphus, both of whom met tragic deaths. William was in the Confederate Army, and after the war studied and practiced law at Aberdeen, Mississippi. He was a young man of the highest character and brilliant promise. He was shot down in the court-house at Aberdeen in 1875, and was survived by a widow, two sons and a daughter. Adolphus was too young to enter the army. He also was a man of talent and lovable qualities, was successful in business and always had the confidence of those who knew him. He was killed in New Orleans about 1895, by a railroad train. There were several side tracks at the place where he was standing, two trains were passing at the same time, and in stepping back to avoid one he was struck by the other. He was unmarried.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

MONUMENT AT GUILFORD BATTLE GROUND

Digitized by Google

Genealogical Department.

NORTH CAROLINA
Society Daughters of the Revolution.

YOUR NORTH CAROLINA ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED.

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, records of the different counties, family papers and State histories will be readily examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced. Their ancestors must have resided in the State of North Carolina during the Revolutionary and Colonial periods.

Fee for such researches, $5.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE HOOPER WILLS,
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS OF ARMS EMBLAZONED AT REASONABLE RATES.

PICTURES OF OLD HOMES AND PORTRAITS SECURED IF OBTAINABLE.

For Coats of Arms, etc., address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

THE GREAT STATE FAIR

October 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21, 1905. RALEIGH, N. C.

Let everybody come to see and hear President Roosevelt.

Brilliant Midway and Attractions

Great Reunion of the Fraternal Orders of the State and Other Special Features.

RALEIGH, N. C.
W. S. SHERMAN, PRINTER
1905

Digitized by Google

SOME BOOKLETS FOR SALE.

VOL. I.

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kenneday.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.
"Pettigrew's Charge at Gettysburg," Capt. Samuel Aycourt Ashe.

VOL. II.

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Maravian Settlements in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs, and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congress." Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Historic Homes" Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays, Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"Historic Homes, The Groves, Cape Fear, Wakefield," Burgwyn, Waddell, Haywood.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

VOL. III.

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Cherokee Indians," Major W. W. Stringfield.
"Volunteer State Tennesse as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?," Mrs. L. A. Mc Corkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL. D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. S. C. Noble.

VOL. IV.

"Lord's Proprietors of N. C.," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Battle Ramsaur's Mill 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham,
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence," John Penn and Joseph Hewes, by T. M. Pittman, of Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.
"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C." Judge James C. McRae.
"The Scotch Irish Settlement,
William Hooper, "the Signer," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

Vol. 1. 25, cents; Vols. 2, 3 and 4, 15 cents each.
EDITORS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Digitized by Google

MECHANICS AND INVESTORS UNION.

JOHN C. DREWERY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

A HOME INVESTMENT COMPANY FOR MONTHLY SAVINGS.
A HOME LOAN COMPANY,
To Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money. It promotes Economy, Thrift and Punctuality in Business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 Will Mature a $100.00 Certificate.
One Hundred Payments Will Secure a Home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, SECRETARY, 22 Pullen Building.

...ALLEN'S FORTY LESSONS IN BOOK-KEEPING...

Over 7,000 copies have been used in Schools and Colleges. Commended by Teachers and Business Men. PRICE $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, RALEIGH.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery.

Aside from a Large Line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc.. we will take care of Your Orders for

RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

All Orders given our Personal Attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.,
RALEIGH, N. C.

ESTABLISHED IN 1891.

The Commercial and Farmers Bank,

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock,	$100,000.00
Surplus,	60,000.00
Deposits,	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian. Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent. Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSON, Asst. Cashier.

Digitized by Google

THE

NEWS AND OBSERVER,

RALEIGH, N. C.

PUBLISHED AT THE CAPITAL CITY.
IT REACHES THE WHOLE STATE.

Largest Circulation in North Carolina.
The State's Representative Newspaper.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Editor.

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION.

1894,	1,800	Subscribers	1900,	5,700	Subscribers
1895,	2,400	"	1901,	6,500	"
1896,	3,100	"	1902,	7,054	"
1897,	4,200	"	1903,	8,201	"
1898,	4,880	"	1904,	9,111	"
1899,	5,200	"	1905,	10,000	"

Digitized by Google

NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY LAWS OF 1903.

MEMBERS:

W. J. PEELE, CHAIRMAN,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNER, SECRETARY,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER,.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT,.....ROPER, N. C.

The Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners.

The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in thier efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary

Digitized by Google

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

Capital Stock, $30,000

¶A personal investigation will convince anyone that King's is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing. Reference: Every bank and leading business concern in Raleigh or Charlotte. College Journal and Special Offers Free.

We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand or Penmanship by mail.

Address, KING'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

50,000 OLD BOOKS FOR SALE!

Plates, Prints, Stamps, Coin and Old Mahogany Furniture. 1,000 Titles on North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia History and the South. Send for list. Mention your duplicate for exchange. We want all North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia Laws, Journals, Documents and Histories.

BOOK EXCHANGE,

RALEIGH, N. C., —AND— RICHMOND, VA.

GOVERNOR WILLIAM TRYON AND HIS ADMINISTRATION IN THE PROVINCE OF NORTH CAROLINA, 1765-1771,

BY

MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.

Quarto, 223 pages, thoroughly indexed, bound in cloth, printed on heavy paper and handsomely illustrated.

"An excellent example of sound and scholarly investigation."—NEW YORK SUN.

"Colonial records, old histories, letters, diaries and other documents have yielded up much to sustain Mr. Haywood's views."—NEW YORK TIMES.

"The student of history will be grateful for this presentation by an able writer who has obtained access to original documents, and whose industry, judgment and literary ability are amply displayed in the work. Paper, print and binding are excellent."—NEW ENGLAND HISTORICAL AND GENEALOGICAL REGISTER.

"Tennesseans cannot fail to be interested in this graphic account of one period of history of the Old North State, closely identified as we are with her. The book is full of names, and incidents in the careers, of men from whom many of our citizens are descended."—NASHVILLE AMERICAN.

"Mr. Haywood, * * * who has a genius for research and writes uncommonly well, presents in this volume a story which is as interesting as a novel."—CHARLOTTE OBSERVER.

"So charming is the author's style, so clear his course of reasoning, so evident is the impartial spirit of the historian displayed, that the book is bound to command the attention of the reading public." — REVIEW BY R. D. W. CONNOR, (MEMBER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION), IN THE NEWS & OBSERVER.

For sale at $2 per copy, expressage or postage prepaid.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO., Raleigh, N. C.

Digitized by Google

US 130

VOL. V. OCTOBER, 1905 NO. 2

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS:

	PAGE
HISTORY OF THE CAPITOL By Charles Earl Johnson	73
SOME NOTES ON COLONIAL NORTH CAROLINA—1700-1750 By J. Bryan Grimes	90
NORTH CAROLINA POETS By Hight C. Moore	150

(ILLUSTRATED)

SINGLE NUMBERS 30 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Digitized by Google

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

VOL. V.

Genesis of Wake County.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations.
Richard Dillard, M. D.

North Carolina Signers of the National Declaration of Independence: Part II., William Hooper.
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

North Carolina at King's Mountain.
Social Conditions in Eastern Carolina in Colonial Times.
Hon. J. Bryan Grimes.

North Carolina Poets.
Rev. Hight C. Moore.

The History of the Capitol.
Col. Charles Earl Johnson.

Cornelius Harnett.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Edward Moseley.
Prof. D. H. HILL.

Governor Jesse Franklin.
Mr. S. Porter Graves.

Governor Thomas Pollock.
Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

Battle of Cowan's Ford.
Maj. William A. Graham.

THE BOOKLET will be issued by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning May, 1905. Price, $1.00 per year. Parties who wish to renew their subscription to THE BOOKLET for Vol. V., are requested to notify at once.

Address MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, N. C.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

Digitized by Google

VOL. V. OCTOBER, 1905 No. 2

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

"CAROLINA! CAROLINA! HEAVEN'S BLESSINGS ATTEND HER!
WHILE WE LIVE WE WILL CHERISH, PROTECT AND DEFEND HER."

PUBLISHED BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

Digitized by Google

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1903-1905:

REGENT:

MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

VICE-REGENT:

MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENTS:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER,

(Nee Hooper),

MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

SECRETARY:

MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

TREASURER:

MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:

MRS. ED. CHAMBERS SMITH.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:

MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

Digitized by Google

THE FIRST CAPITOL OF NORTH CAROLINA DESTROYED BY FIRE JUNE 21st, 1831.
(From an Old Engraving.)

Digitized by Google

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. V. OCTOBER, 1905. No. 2.

HISTORY OF THE CAPITOL.

BY CHARLES EARL JOHNSON.

The history of the Capitol cannot be written without some account of the city of Raleigh. Raleigh is one of the few cities in this country, or in any country for that matter, which sprang into full-fledged existence without having been the enlargement of a previously existing town. In this it is unique, and to this it owes much of its beauty, since in the beginning there was only a wide expanse of farming land and forest, thus allowing streets and lots to be laid out with mathematical precision under the direction of skilled engineers.

The first General Assembly, of which we have much information, met at the house of Captain Richard Sanderson, on Little River, in the County of Perquimans, in the year 1715. In 1720 the Legislative body met at the general court-house at Queen Anne's Creek, in Chowan precinct. In 1723 it met at Edenton. After that it drifted about, at various times sitting at Edenton, Wilmington, New Bern, Kinston, Halifax, Smithfield, Wake Court-House, Hillsboro, Salem and Tarborough. In 1787 at Tarborough the General Assembly resolved that it: "Be recommended to the people of the State to authorize and direct their representatives in the Convention called to consider the Federal Constitution to fix on the place of an unalterable seat of government."

Digitized by Google

This Convention was held at Hillsboro in July and August, 1788, and I give below extracts from the journal of that body, which explain more fully than any description I might give just why the seat of government came to be located where it now is.

EXTRACTS FROM JOURNAL:

"Thursday, July 31st, 1788: On motion made by Mr. Rutherford, and seconded by Mr. Steele, Resolved, that the Convention will to-morrow at four o'clock in the afternoon, proceed to fix on a proper place for the seat of government of this State."

"Mr. John G. Blount obtained leave for himself and others to enter a protest on the journal against the above resolution.

"Friday, August 1st, 1788: Ordered that Mr. Iredell, Mr. Maclaine and Mr. Jones be a committee to prepare and bring in an ordinance to establish the seat of government at the place hereafter to be fixed on by this Convention.

"On a motion made by Mr. Joseph McDowell and seconded by Mr. Benj. Smith, Resolved, that the Convention will ballot for the place at which the seat of government shall be fixed.

"The yeas and nays were demanded on this resolution, and it prevailed by a vote of 134 to 117.

"Saturday, August 2nd, 1788: On motion of Mr. Willie Jones, seconded, by Mr. Thomas Alderson, it was decided to allow the Legislature to fix the exact place of the seat of government, only it must be within ten miles of the place designated by the Convention.

"Resolved, that the several places hereafter named be in nomination for the seat of government of this State, to-wit: Smithfield, nominated by Mr. James Payne; Tarborough, nominated by Mr. Robert W. Williams; Fayetteville, nominated by Mr. Wm. Barry Grove; Mr. Isaac Hunter's, in Wake County, nominated by Mr. James Iredell; Newbern, nominated by the Hon. Mr. Spencer; Hillsborough, nominated by Mr. Alexander Mebane; the Fork of Haw and Deep Rivers, nominated by Mr. Thomas Person. And that Mr. Elijah Mitchell, Mr. Benjamin Williams, Mr. Nathaniel Jones and Mr. John Caines be appointed Commissioners to superintend and conduct the balloting.

Digitized by Google

"Adjourned until ten o'clock.

"Met according to adjournment. The Commissioners reported no choice, and a second ballot was ordered.

"Adjourned until four o'clock.

"Met according to adjournment. The Commissioners reported a majority of votes in favor of Mr. Isaac Hunter's in Wake County.

"Mr. Iredell, from the Committee heretofore appointed, brought in a bill to establish the seat of government, etc., which was read, passed and ordered to be ratified.

"Ordered, that all who desired to do so should have leave to enter their protest on the journal.

"Monday, August 4th, 1788: Mr. William Barry Grove presented a protest signed by over one hundred members."

Not until 1791 did the General Assembly, which met at New Bern, carry into effect the ordinance passed at Hillsborough in 1788. The act passed by the General Assembly provided that nine persons should be appointed to lay off and locate the city within ten miles of Isaac Hunter's; and five persons "To cause to be built and erected a State House sufficiently large to accommodate, with convenience, both the houses of the General Assembly, at an expense not to exceed ten thousand pounds." The nine persons chosen as Commissioners were: Joseph McDowell, the elder, James Martin. Thomas Person, Thomas Blount, William Johnston Dawson, Frederick Hargett, Henry William Harrington, James Bloodworth and Willie Jones. The Building Committee selected were: Richard Bennehan, John Mcaon, Robert Goodloe, Nathan Bryan and Theophilus Hunter.

Digitized by Google

It has been supposed that on April the 4th, 1792, there assembled at the house of Isaac Hunter five of the nine Commissioners, and that they then proceeded to determine the site for the city, but I have before me an autograph letter of Joel Lane to General Harrington, which I give in full:

"WAKE COURT-HOUSE, 13th MARCH, 1792.

DEAR SIR:—On the 20th instant the Commissioners for fixing on the place for the seat of government are to meet, and as I am not certain you have been notified of it. I take the liberty to request your attendance, having reason to believe that unless you are present the Eastern interest will fix it on the north side of Neuse River.

"I am Dr. sir Yours,

"Respectfully, JOEL LANE."

However, General Harrington did not attend, for some time between the 20th and 22nd of March a majority of the Commission, six in number, to-wit: Frederick Hargett, Willie Jones, Joseph McDowell, Thomas Blount, William Johnston Dawson and James Martin arrived on the scene. They proceeded to ride over and investigate the different tracts of land offered, and also, according to tradition, had a good old time generally. They seem to have kept this up for about a week, for on the 29th of March, 1792, the Commissioners, according to their report, chose as their Chairman Frederick Hargett, and proceeded to ballot, with the result that there were cast for John Hinton's three votes, for Joel Lane's two votes, and for Henry Lane's one vote. Another ballot was taken and resulted in three votes for John Hinton's, two for Joel Lane's, and one for Nathaniel Jones'. Mr. Nathaniel Jones lived where Cary now is. The Commissioners then adjourned, and when they met at nine o'clock next morning Joel Lane's tract got five votes, and John Hinton's offer received only one vote, which goes to prove that

Digitized by Google

Joel Lane was a good politician, and would have graced Raleigh's present Aldermanic Board had he lived in this, our day and generation. It is worthy of remark that one of the items in the Commissioner's report reads as follows: "Joel Lane was allowed for entertaining the Commissioners fourteen days, forty-four pounds, sixteen shillings." One might reasonably ask, why the sixteen shillings?

On the 5th of April, 1792, the deed for one thousand acres was executed by Joel Lane, and as this deed has never before been published, I give it here in full. It is more than probable that this deed would have been lost but for the care and energy of our present Secretary of State, Hon. J. Bryan Grimes, who rescued it a short while back from some discarded rubbish:

"This indenture, made the fifth day of April, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, between Joel Lane, Esquire, of Wake County, of the one part, and Alexander Martin, Esquire, Governor of the State of North Carolina, of the other part, Witnesseth: that the said Joel Lane, for the sum of one thousand three hundred and seventy-eight pounds, current money of North Carolina, to him paid by Frederick Hargett, Esquire, Chairman of the Board of Commissioners appointed, by act of Assembly passed in Decr., in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, to determine on the place for holding the future meetings of the General Assembly, and for the residence of the Chief Officers of the State of North Carolina, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged: Hath granted, bargained and sold, aliened, enfeoffed, released and confirmed, and by these presents doth grant, bargain and sell, alien, enfeoff, release and confirm to the said Alexander Martin, Esquire, and his successors in office for the time being, a certain tract or parcel of land in Wake County, to the Eastward of and near to Wake Court-House, containing one thousand acres, more or less, and bound as follows: Beginning at four sasafras, two white oaks, two persimmons and an elm on Rocky Branch, thence North ten degrees East three hundred and thirty-four poles to a stake in the run of a spring branch; then East three hundred and twenty-seven poles to a small hickory and red oak, near a craggy rock; then North forty poles to a stake near a red oak; then East one hundred and fifty-eight poles to a stake in the center of a red oak a hickory and two post oaks; then South two hundred and eighty-one poles to a white oak in Joshua Suggs' line; then South fifty-seven degrees West two hundred and fifty-six poles to a young hickory; then North eighty-four degrees West one hundred and thirty poles to a post oak; then West one hundred and forty-eight poles to a white oak on the Rocky Branch; then up the branch, the various courses thereof, to the beginning; and all woods, timber trees, ways, waters, springs, emoluments and advantages to said tract of land belonging: To have and to hold the said tract of land, with the appurtenances, to the said Alexander Martin, Esquire, and his successors in office, for the time being, for the sole use and benefit of the State of North Carolina, forever. And the said Joel Lane, for himself and his heirs; doth covenant, bargain and agree to and with the said Alexander Martin, Esquire, and his successors in office, that he, the said Joel Lane and his heirs, shall and will warrant and defend the premises, with the appurtenances, to the said Alexander Martin and his successors in office, for the time being, for the benefit of the State as aforesaid, against himself and his heirs, and against the lawful claim of all persons forever.

Digitized by Google

"In witness whereof, the said Joel Lane hath hereto put his hand and seal, the day and year first above-mentioned.

"Ackd. JOEL LANE," (Seal.)

Signed, sealed and delivered in presence of

WM. CHRISTMAS,
WILLIE JONES,
April 5th, 1792. JOSEPH BROWN.

Digitized by Google

"Received of Frederick Hargett, Esquire, Chairman of the Board of Commissioners, authorized to purchase lands for the permanent seat of government, a warrant on the Treasurer for the sum of one thousand three hundred and seventy-eight pounds currency, in full, of the consideration money above-mentioned.

"Ackd. JOEL LANE.
"Witness: THOS. BLOUNT.

"Wake County, June Term, 1792.

"Then was the above deed duly acknowledged in open Court, by Joel Lane, Esq., and ordered to be registered.

"H. LANE, C. C.

"Enrolled in the Register's Office of Wake County, in Book L, and page (illegible) this 6th day of June, 1792.

"JAS. HINTON, Register.

"Examined by Sol. Goodrick."

Upon receiving this deed the Commissioners proceeded to lay off the plan of a city containing four hundred acres, arranged in five squares of four acres each, and 276 lots of one acre each. One of the squares was named Caswell Square, in honor of Governor Caswell. This is now the site of the Institution for the Blind. The Northeastern Square was named after Thomas Burke, also Governor, and here now is located the Governor's Mansion, though formerly the site of the old Raleigh Academy. Nash Square was in the southwestern portion of the city, and is now a beautiful resting place just opposite the Union Depot. Moore Square was in the southeastern section of the city, and is still kept open as a pleasant breathing place for the inhabitants of that portion of the city. The central square was named Union Square, and on it now stands our beautiful Capitol building, formerly called the State House.

Digitized by Google

The first Gubernatorial Mansion was a plain two-story frame building painted white, and stood on lot number 131 of the original plan of the city. An office for the Governor was erected in the corner of this lot just where the present Raleigh Banking and Trust Company stands. In 1813 the General Assembly appointed a committee composed of Henry Porter, Henry Seawell, William Hinton, Nathaniel Jones, of Crabtree, Theophilus Hunter and William Peace to erect a new and more commodious dwelling for the Governor at a cost not to exceed five thousand pounds. The site selected for the new Governatorial residence, which was called the Governor's Palace, was at the foot of Fayetteville street, directly south of and fronting the Capitol, just where the Centennial Graded School now stands. The edifice was completed during Governor Miller's administration, and he was its first occupant.

In 1792, with appropriate ceremonies, was laid the corner stone of the first State House, as it was then called. The term Capitol was not adopted until 1832. The architect was Rody Adkins. The brick were made in brick yards located at lots numbers 138 and 154, and the maximum cost of the building is said to have been fixed by the committee at twenty thousand dollars. The building was of brick, of a dingy, reddish color. The General Assembly met for the first time in the completed State House in the fall of 1794. Richard Dobbs Speight, the elder, was then the Governor. Eight years afterwards he was killed in a duel by John Stanly. Although the exterior of the building was exceedingly plain, and the building itself much smaller than the present structure, the interior arrangement was somewhat similar, having broad passages running the entire length of the building from north to south, and from east to west. There was a dome, and there was a rotunda at the intersection of the passages. In this rotunda was placed the famous statue of Washington by the great sculptor Canova. This statue did not survive the destruction of the building by fire on the 21st of June, 1831. An attempt, however, was made to restore it, and three thousand dollars was appropriated for that purpose. At the suggestion of Judge Gaston, a sculptor named Hughes was employed to restore it. Hughes asked for an advance of $500 for preliminary expenses, and it is said that his signing the receipt for this money was the first, last and only act done by him in performance of the work. The remains of the statue are now in the Hall of History.

Digitized by Google

The State House was literally the house of the people, and the State House bell was for many years the only bell in Raleigh. This bell was used for all public purposes. The State House itself, and the grounds about it, were often used for all conceivable purposes. There not being either church or theatre yet built in the young city, the people assembled in its halls on Sunday to worship God, and on week days, as occasion offered, to witness theatrical and slight-of-hand performances, and to listen to lectures and orations. Balls and receptions were of frequent occurrence, while patriotic observance of the 4th of July was always a feature. I can not refrain from quoting a contemporaneous account of the thirty-third celebration of the 4th of July:

"The thirty-third anniversary of American Independence was celebrated in this city in the usual manner on the 4th inst. At 12 o'clock a procession of citizens and strangers with Capt. Willie Jones' troop of cavalry at the head, formed at the court-house—agreeably to previous arrangements, and directed by Capt. Scott, proceeded up Fayetteville street to the State House, during the ringing of the State House, court-house, Academy and town bells, and firing of cannon. Being seated in the Common's Chamber, an ode in honor of the day, composed for the occasion, was sung by a choir of about 70 voices, conducted by Mr. Seward, accompanied by a band of instrumental music.

Digitized by Google

"The Rev. Mr. Turner then rose and delivered an oration of the merits of which we shall at present forbear to speak, as we intend to solicit a copy for publication.

"At 3 o'clock the company sat down to an excellent dinner, prepared by Mr. Casso at the State House, at which Col. Polk and Judge Potter presided.

"The Supreme Court of the State being in session, the celebration was honored with the presence of the judges, gentlemen of the bar, and many other characters of respectability from almost every part of the State.

"In the evening a ball was given to the ladies."

Where are now the brave fellows who proudly marched up Fayetteville street to the glad strains of martial music on that 4th of July, nearly one hundred years ago? Where are now the smart young beaux and the smiling belles, who thread the happy mazes of the reel and bowed through the stately minuet at that gay ball in those halls? Gone is the old State House, gone are they. Where will we be a hundred years hence?

About 1819 the Governor was authorized to improve the State House under the direction of the State Architect. East and west porticoes were added, additional elevation was given to the walls, and the whole was covered with stucco in the imitation of stone. This work was done under the supervision of Wm. Nichols, who had recently been appointed State Architect, and the work was completed early in the summer of 1822.

On the morning of the 21st of June, 1831, the citizens of Raleigh were startled by the cry of fire, and smoke was seen to be issuing from the eaves of the Capitol. It was impossible to stay the flames, or to remove the statue of Washington. In a short while the building was a complete wreck. Most of the public documents were saved, as the fire worked downward from the roof.

As a description of this fire will doubtless prove interesting, I give the account which appeared in the Raleigh Register of Thursday, June 23d, 1831:

Digitized by Google

"Awful conflagration! It is our painful and melancholy duty again to announce to the public another appalling instance of loss by fire, which will be deeply felt and lamented by every individual in our State. It is nothing less than the total destruction of the Capitol of the State, located in this city. Of that noble edifice, with its splendid decorations, nothing now remains but the blackened walls and smouldering ruins. The State Library is also entirely consumed, and the Statue of Washington, that proud monument of national gratitude, which was our pride and glory, is so mutilated and defaced that none can behold it but with mournful feelings, and the conviction involuntarily forces itself upon their minds, that the loss is one which can not be repaired. The most active exertions were made to rescue this chef d'ouvre of Canova from the ravishes of the devouring elements, nor were they desisted from until the danger became imminent.

"The alarm was given about seven o'clock on Tuesday morning, and it was presently evident that all attempts to extinguish the fire would prove perfectly fruitless. The efforts of the bystanders were then directed towards the protection of the public offices on the Square, and the adjacent private buildings, and to the preservation of the official archives. We are happy to add that none of the former were injured, and that the latter, including the Legislative records, were all saved. The beautiful grove of oaks, of which the Capitol was the center ornament, did more towards staying the progress of the flames than any human effort, and inculcates most forcibly the propriety of cultivating shade trees in cities, on the score of security from fire alone, to say nothing of other considerations. Seldom has the eye witnessed so awful a spectacle as this vast building in one concentrated blaze, streaming from every window, and a vast column from the roof, forming altogether a scene not adequately to be described.

Digitized by Google

"The origin of the fire is not certainly known, but we believe the general impression is, that it was the result of most culpable carelessness on the part of a man who had been employed to assist in soldering the new zinc roof, as he was seen that morning carrying up a coal of fire between two shingles considerably ignited, a spark from which, in all probability, fell amongst some combustible matter between the roof and ceiling, which took fire while the hands were at breakfast.

"Considering the rapidity with which the fire progressed it is an alleviating circumstance that the public papers were all secured. Besides the papers of the Clerks of the two houses of the Legislature, and those of the Comptroller and of the Clerk of the Supreme Court, the fine copy of Stewart's painting of the Father of our Country, and some articles of furniture of the Legislative chambers, were preserved from the flames.

"It will be seen from the accompanying resolutions, that the congregation and pew-holders of the Presbyterian church, with laudable public spirit, have tendered to the Governor the use of their buildings for the temporary accommodation of the Legislature.

"RALEIGH, JUNE 21st, 1831.

"At a meeting of the congregation and pew-holders of the Presbyterian church of this city, the Reverend William McPheeters was called to the chair, and H. M. Miller, Esq., was requested to act as secretary.

"The meeting, taking into consideration the very distressing calamity with which the city of Raleigh and the State generally has this day been visited, in the destruction by fire, of that noble edifice, the State House, which was the pride and ornament of the State, adopted unanimously the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That they do hereby respectfully offer to His Excellency, the Governor of the State of North Carolina, and through him to the General Assembly of the State, this church with the Session House thereunto attached, as a temporary accommodation for holding the sessions of that honorable body until a more convenient and permanent building shall be provided.

Digitized by Google

"Resolved, That should any alteration in said church be deemed advisable for the better accommodation of the members of the Assembly, that they do hereby allow and authorized said alterations to be made.

"Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions, signed by the Chairman and counter-signed by the Secretary, be handed to His Excellency the Governor.

"WILLIAM McPHEETERS,
Chairman.

"H. M. MILLER,
Secretary.

"We learn also that the use of the Session House of the Presbyterian church has been politely offered to the judges and bar of the Supreme Court, at present in session, and the offer has been thankfully accepted."

This building had previously narrowly escaped destruction by fire. During the administration of Governor Ashe, and covering the period of 1796, 1797 and 1798, it was discovered that numerous frauds had been perpetrated in the office of the Secretary of State. James Glasgow, who had enjoyed a high reputation, and had the confidence of the public, was then the Secretary of State. It was found that with the assistance of confederates he had been issuing fraudulent grants of land in Tennessee and Western North Carolina. Certain documents incriminating Glasgow and his confederates were in a trunk or trunks in the Secretary of State's office, and Governor Ashe received a confidential message from Nashville warning him of a conspiracy to burn the State

Digitized by Google

House in order to destroy these papers. After this information was received a guard was kept about the Capitol for the next two months, but one night when a ball was being given at Casso's Hotel to the bridal party shortly after the second marriage of the public Treasurer, the festivities were interrupted by the hasty entrance of a messenger with the information that some one was forcing his way into the window of the office where the trunks containing the records in question were deposited. The man was caught, was ascertained to be the slave of one of the persons charged with fraud, was convicted of burglary and executed.

After the destruction of the State House, rivalry as to the seat of government again broke out. Politicians all over the State commenced to manœuvre with the dual object of obtaining the Capitol for their own community, and at the same time advancing their political fortunes. To Judge Henry Seawell, Senator from Wake, has generally been given the credit of saving the day for Raleigh. It is a matter of tradition that the town of Haywood at the junction of the Haw and Deep Rivers failed to secure the Capitol by only one vote, but this is not borne out by the records, as the vote shows that the bill appropriating $50,000 for re-building on the old site passed in the House by 73 to 60, and in the Senate by 35 to 28.

The Commissioners selected to have in charge this important work were Henry Seawell, Romulus M. Saunders, Duncan Cameron, William S. Mhoon and William Boylan. All were Raleigh men except William S. Mhoon, who was from Bertie, but was at that time residing in Raleigh, as State Treasurer. These Commissioners did the very wise thing of spending the whole of the small appropriation on the foundations. The subsequent General Assemblies had to make additional appropriations from time to time, until in 1840, which year marked the completion of the Capitol, the cost had amounted to the not inconsiderable sum of $530,-684.15.

Digitized by Google

THE PRESENT CAPITOL AT RALEIGH, BUILT BETWEEN 1831 AND 1840.

Digitized by Google

The original Commissioners re-signed in 1836, and were succeeded by Samuel F. Patterson, Beverley Daniel, Charles Manly, Alfred Jones and Charles L. Hinton. Beverly Daniel acted as Chairman of the Commission.

The work at first was under the supervision of the State Architect, William Nichols and I. Town, of New York, but David Paton was the draughtsman and may be considered the real architect of the noble structure. Stone cutters and masons were brought from Scotland to work upon the building, and some of Raleigh's most substantial and highly esteemed citizens of to-day are descendants of those who came from over the waters for that purpose. The stone was taken from a granite quarry southeast of the Capitol, and about one mile distant. The stone was conveyed from the quarry to the workmen engaged in the erection of the building by means of a railroad with horse power. This, the first experimental railroad ever operated in North Carolina, and said to have suggested the building of the North Carolina Railroad, according to tradition, was first proposed by Mrs. Polk, the wife of Colonel Polk.

The following is a full and particular description of the present Capitol, written by the architect David Paton:

"The State Capitol is 160 feet in length from north to south, by 140 feet from east to west. The whole height is 97 1-2 feet in the centre. The apex of pediment is 64 feet in height. The stylobate is 18 feet in height. The columns of the east and west porticoes are 5 feet 2 1-2 inches in diameter. An entablature, including blocking course, is continued around the building, 12 feet high.

"The columns and entablature are Grecian Doric, and copied from the Temple of Minerva, commonly called the Parthenon, which was erected in Athens about 500 years before Christ. An octagon tower surrounds the rotunda, which is ornamented with Grecian cornice, etc., and its dome is decorated at top with a similar ornament to that of the Choragic Monument of Lysicrates, commonly called the Lanthorn of Demosthenes.

Digitized by Google

"The interior of the Capitol is divided into three stories:

"First, the lower story, consisting of ten rooms, eight of which are appropriated as offices to the Governor, Secretary, Treasurer and Comptroller, each having two rooms of the same size—the one containing an area of 649 square feet, the other 528 square feet—the two Committee rooms, each containing 200 square feet, and four closets; also the rotunda, corridors, vestibules and piazzas, contain an area of 4,370 square feet. The vestibules are decorated with columns and antæ, similar to that of the Ionic Temple on the Ilissus, near the Acropolis of Athens. The remainder is groined with stone and brick, springing from columns and pilasters of the Roman Doric.

"The second story consists of Senatorial and Representatives' chambers, the former containing an area of 2,545 and the latter 2,849 square feet. Four apartments enter from Senate chamber, two of which contain each an area of 169 square feet, and the other two contain each an area of 154 square feet; also two rooms enter from Representatives' chamber, each containing an area of 170 square feet; of two Committee rooms, each containing an area of 231 feet; of four presses and the passages, stairs, lobbies and colonades, containing an area of 3,204 square feet.

"The lobbies and hall of Representatives have their columns and antae of the Octagon Tower of Andronicus Cyrrhestes, and the plan of the hall is of the formation of the Greek theatre, and the columns and antae in the Senatorial chamber and rotunda are of the Temple of Erectheus, Minerva Polias and Pandrosus, in the Acropolis of Athens, near the above-named Parthenon.

"Third, or attic story, consists of rooms appropriated to the Supreme Court and Library, each containing an area of 693 square feet. Galleries of both houses have an area of

Digitized by Google

1,300 square feet; also two apartments entering from Senate gallery, each 169 square feet, of four presses and the lobbies' stairs, 988 square feet. These lobbies, as well as rotunda, are lit with cupolas, and it is proposed to finish the Court and Library in the florid Gothic style."

These halls have heard in debate the great men who have figured in North Carolina history for nearly a century—Badger, Iredell, Morehead, Graham, Vance—but why call the roll of the mighty host! Their voices are hushed forever to our earthly ears, but as we stand where they once stood we can not but feel a vibrant inspiration from the atmosphere which once sounded their words of counsel and resounded with the people's applause. This building is hallowed by memories of our illustrious dead—the very stones are sacred. It stands a beautiful monument of the past and the present, linking one generation with another. Leave us our Capitol as it is! Let no vandal hand touch it! The additional room needed for State offices can be supplied by acquiring property facing upon the square, and erecting permanent buildings thereon of a character in harmony with the Capitol itself. Let the Executive, Treasury, and other offices be arranged in these buildings, which could be made fire-proof as well as comfortable, and leave for the Legislature and its committees the grand old structure in its solid majesty, and with its historic memories unmarred by change. We would indeed then have a Capitol and State buildings of which every North Carolinian might be proud.

Raleigh, N. C., August 15th, 1905.

Digitized by Google

SOME NOTES ON COLONIAL NORTH CAROLINA 1700-1750.

By J. BRYAN GRIMES.

In writing of Colonial North Carolina I can not do a better service than to present bare facts with sources of information rather than give an expression of my views and conclusions as to social conditions in our province before 1750. Before the middle of the eighteenth century we had no press and the world heard of us only from the print of the outsider who, from jealousy, ignorance or prejudice, did not do us justice. Having no historian of our own in Colonial times, our writers have relied as an authority upon Chalmers, whose every chapter was a continued vituperation or misrepresentation of our State. George Chalmers was born in Scotland, in 1742, and "emigrated to Maryland where he practiced law for ten years, till the troubles of the Revolution began, and then he returned to England." He was a bitter loyalist who had no patience with the spirit of American independence. The first of his historical works was published in 1781 during the Revolutionary War.

Of our history Col. Saunders says: "The first search made in London for information in regard to North Carolina affairs was doubtless that made by the historian George Chalmers, who, in 1780, published his Political Annals of the Present United Colonies, the fruit of his labors in the British Record Office to which the official position he held gave him access. This volume has been the standard authority with all later Carolina historians. Its general accuracy as to matters of fact is by no means perfect, and Mr.

Digitized by Google

Chalmers' bitter prejudices as a loyalist render his conclusions utterly unreliable.

At a later date the historian Williamson, who desired copies of certain papers in London relating to Carolina, hoped that Mr. Chalmers would furnish him therewith or assist him in obtaining them. Mr. Chalmers would do neither and threatened to interfere if application should be made to the head of the proper department."

Let us glance at some of the writings of this "Standard authority with all later North Carolina historians" and compare them with the pages of Bancroft.

Of this colony just before the Culpeper rebellion Chalmers says:

"Originally a sprout from Virginia, the unprosperous plantation of North Carolina naturally produced the same unpleasant fruits, during that boisterous season. Alteration of system, no less than change of governors had long prevented the revolt of a colony, which, in 1675, contained only four thousand inhabitants, who derived, unhappily, no benefit from the coercion of laws or the influences of religion." a

Of this same period Bancroft says:

"The government had for about a year been left in what Royalists called 'Ill order and worse hands.' That is, it had been a government of the people themselves, favoring popular liberty, even to the protection of the friends of Colonial Independence." b

Chalmers writes again:

"North Carolina enjoyed unusual quiet for some time after the expulsion of Sothell, because continued anarchy often prompts a desire for fixed repose. * * * The most inconsiderable community of North Carolina has never relinquished the flattering gratifications of self-rule, even when they were inconvenient. Having refused to join in a Chal., p. 166.

b Ban., Vol. 2, p. 157.

Digitized by Google

legislation with their Southern neighbors, the inhabitants were delivered over to their discontents; having denied submission to the Deputy-Governor sent them from Charleston, the proprietaries seem in despair to have relinquished them to their own management, in 1695, without inquiring for seven years after, whether they prospered or declined." a

In contrast to the above Bancroft writes:

"Here was a double grief to the proprietaries; the rapacity of Sothell was a breach of trust; the judgment of the Assembly an ominous usurpation. * * * The planters of North Carolina recovered tranquility so soon as they escaped the misrule from abroad, and sure of amnesty, esteemed themselves the happiest people on earth. They loved the pure air and clear skies of their 'summer land.'" * * *

"The planters of Albemarle were men who had been led to the choice of their residence from a hatred of restraint, and had lost themselves among the woods in search of independence. Are there any who doubt man's capacity for self-government, let them study the history of North Carolina; its inhabitants were restless and turbulent in their imperfect submission to a government imposed on them from abroad; the administration of the colony was firm, humane and tranquil when they were left to take care of themselves. Any government, but one of their own institution, was oppressive. * * * North Carolina was settled by the freest of the free; by men to whom the restraints of other colonies were too severe. But the settlers were gentle in their tempers, of serene minds, enemies to violence and blood-shed. * * * Freedom, entire freedom, was enjoyed without anxiety as without guarantees; the charities of life were scattered at their feet, like the flowers in their meadows; and the spirit of humanity maintained its influence in the Ara Chalmers, pp. 264, 399.

Digitized by Google

cadia, as Royalist writers will have it, of 'rogues and rebels' in the paradise of Quakers." a

After a half page of sneers at North Carolina to cover a period of her history, he, Chalmers, ends a chapter thus:

"And this wretched province was continually branded as the general receptacle of the fugitive, the smuggler and the pirate; as a community, destitute of religion to meliorate the heart, or of laws to direct the purpose of the will. * * * In North Carolina disorder is said to have continued its natural progress from the epoch of its settlement to the accession of George the Second. Destitute of the kindly influences of religion and of law, the planters acquired peculiar habits from acting a singular part amidst perpetual tumult. * * * Owing to his usual inattention, the Duke of Newcastle sent Burrington, a man still more weak and corrupt, and intemperate than his predecessor to rule such a people during such a season. * * * In April, 1733, Johnston, a domestic of Lord Wilmington, was appointed his successor, a man of sufficient knowledge and prudence, but whose experience degenerated a little into cunning. * * * And during the year 1749 North Carolina was found to 'be a little better than an asylum for fugitives since it was destitute of any regular government.' Such are the unpleasant incidents which occupy the story of an inconsiderable settlement, that gradually filled with people as the law offered protection to the vagabond, as every one lived without control, and all enjoyed in security what a trivial labor had gained." b

While the North Carolina patriots were blazing the way for American independence, and a year or two before their armed resistance to Great Britain, this man Chalmers, who for a century was accepted as authority on our Colonial history, dismisses us from history in these words:

"The story of this tumultous settlement is from this period filled with nothing but the play of parties, the wailings of imbecility and the complaint of recrimination." c a Ban., Vol. 2, pp. 158, 164, 165.

b Chalmers, Vol. 2, pp. 81, 163, 164, 165 and 197.
c Chal., Vol. 2, p. 361.

Digitized by Google

In the earliest time of our colonization, because we gave protection to the defeated patriot followers of Bacon, Gov. Berkeley in his murderous wrath slandered and maligned us.

In the settlement of our northern boundary line, because we could not be outwitted or cajoled, Col. Byrd ridiculed us, and the people who were esteemed as Virginians, when they were found to reside on the south of the boundary line, were aspersed as North Carolinians. *

When North Carolina spent her blood and treasure in the defence of other colonies especially Virginia, in the war against the French and Indians on the Ohio, Sparks, writing of the Commander-in-Chief, James Innes, and his Carolinians, gravely and seriously remarks: "But, aside from the incompetency of this officer, he was an inhabitant of North Carolina, and, as such, unacceptable to the Virginia troops" a

* * * * * * * * *

"Ill fares it with a State whose history is written by others than her own sons!"

For a century and a half no native Carolinian attempted to tell the story of his people—we had neither pen nor type to speak for us. Printing was introduced into North Carolina by James Davis in 1749. Previous to that time our printing was done in London, in Virginia and at Charleston.

The first newspaper we had was in 1764—The North Carolina Magazine and Universal Intelligencer, published by James Davis, "on a demi-sheet in quarto pages, but it was a The Writings of Washington, Vol. 2, p. 262 note.

* NOTE.—Col. Byrd, in spite of his ridicule of our people, seemed to think well of our soil and climate, as he wrote Gov. Burrington in 1731: "It must be owned North Carolina is a very happy country where people may live with the least labor that they can in any part of the world." C. R., Vol. 3, p. 194.

In 1733 he secured twenty thousand acres of land in North Carolina on the Virginia line of which he writes as "the Land of Eden." Gen. Jas. D. Glenn and Hon. R. B. Glenn now own three thousand acres of this same tract—Gov. Glenn informs me that a beech tree, one of the original corners of the Byrd survey is still standing with the initials of Col. Byrd cut thereon. This tree is one of the corners of the Glenn estate, and is now fenced and carefully protected from depredations.

Digitized by Google

filled with long extracts from the works of theological writers, or selections from British magazines." a *

Our first newspaper controversy of which I find record was in 1732, when Gov. George Burrington published a proclamation in Timothy's Southern Gazette in regard to our southern boundary line, and Gov. Johnston replied with a counter proclamation, setting forth South Carolina's claim in the same issue." b

"The second newspaper in North Carolina was called the North Carolina Gazette and Weekly Post Boy. It was printed at Wilmington, by Andrew Stewart, a Scotchman, and contained intelligence of current events. The first number was published in September, 1764. The Cape Fear Mercury was established by Adam Boyd in October, 1767. Boyd was a zealous patriot, and was an active member of the Committee of Safety of Wilmington." c

In the space of an article of this nature it will be impossible to attempt a portrayal of conditions in North Carolina in the colonial period, so I will give some notes on North Carolina before the middle of the eighteenth century, when, with the fall of the fortunes of the house of Stuart, that great immigration set in that brought many thousands of Scotland's best people to us. This immigration made North Carolina second in growth and development to no province a Lossing.

---

b Saunders, P. N., Vol. 5, 36; C. R., Vol. 5, 373.
c Lossing.

* NOTE.—The first newspaper in America was at Boston in 1704 called the Boston News-Letter, a weekly gazette by Bartholomew Green; Holmes' Annals, Vol. 1, p. 490, and until 1719 this was the only paper printed in the British North American Colonies. Printing was first introduced into Virginia by William Parks in 1726. Holmes' Annals, Vol. 1, p. 539. The first paper published in Virginia was issued "at Williamsburg in 1736, a sheet about twelve inches by six in size. It was printed weekly by William Parks, at fifteen shillings per annum. No other paper was published in Virginia until the Stamp Act excitement in 1765-6." Lossing. A printing house was opened in Charleston by Eleazer Phillips, in 1730, who died the following year. Thomas Whitemarsh arrived soon after with a press and began the publication of a newspaper, the first printed in the Carolinas. Holmes' Annals.

Digitized by Google

in America. It is unfortunate that we had no contemporary chronicler to draw a true picture of the social and industrial conditions of those times—the home-life of our people.

The absence of cities, which are usually the literary centers, and want of known depositories where records could be collected and preserved, has permitted the destruction of most of the literature, papers and personal correspondence of our early colonial times. This absence is accounted for by an historian as follows:

"Nor are the towns of any considerable note. This last circumstance is owing to the vast commodiousness of water carriage, which everywhere presents itself to the plantations of private planters, and scarcity of handicraft." a

Such papers and records as have been preserved throw more light upon the public and political questions of the day than upon the personal, social and industrial life of the early Carolinian. Probably the richest sources from which to gather information of the social life of that day are the wills and inventories filed in the office of the Secretary of State. This is a field of exploration that will yet bring out much truth and make a fair presentation of our social conditions of which we will not be ashamed. North Carolina authors have relied for the picture of the home-life of our people largely upon the writers in other colonies, who have denied us justice, and in some cases seemed to feel it necessary to bolster the glories of their own colonies by disparaging North Carolina and making comparison therewith.

I do not intend to exaggerate the virtues and excellencies of our colonists, but will try to give a brief view of our province, relying on the cotemporary records, and wherever possible, quote the words of the writers which paint her just as she was, "warts and all."

It is admitted that the physical conditions of a country largely determine the character, industry and habits of its

a Holmes' Annals, Vol. 2, p. 117.

Digitized by Google

people. Under the second charter of Charles II, Carolina embraced over a million square miles. It included all the land on the American Continent between 29 and 36 degrees 30 minutes North latitude. The northern boundary line became the line of the famous Missouri Compromise. After the separation of North Carolina and South Carolina, the northern colony was confined to the territory between 34 degrees and 36.30 N. latitude. This is the choicest belt of the temperate zone. The greatest nations of the earth have been the product of this latitude. In this paper we will have reference only to that part of North Carolina lying on the seaboard and watered by the Chowan, Roanoke, Neuse and Cape Fear rivers, being the only part that was settled during the period under consideration. The coastal plain region of North Carolina lies in "the same parallel of latitude as the central Mediterranean basin, that climatically most favored region of the globe."a

Dr. Emmons says "middle and Eastern North Carolina correspond to middle and Southern France, and Western North Carolina to Northern France and Belgium—all the climates of Italy from Palermo to Milan and Venice are represented."

The soil of Eastern North Carolina in variety and fertility is unsurpassed, ranging from the black or sandy loam to the most retentive clays—our rich swamp soils show "a greater capacity for endurance than the prairie soils of Illinois." b

For agricultural and stock-raising advantages, the climatic and soil conditions in tide-water North Carolina are unequalled. With a mean temperature of 61 degrees Fahrenheit, and a precipitation of 55 inches, everything can be raised that can be grown in the North temperate zone. So varied are her agricultural products that North Carolina is the only State that fills every divisional column of the cen-

a North Carolina and its Resources.
b Dr. Emmons.

Digitized by Google

sus reports. One viewing the State with a critic's eye must exclaim with Hon. W. D. Kelly, of Pennsylvania, "North Carolina is the fairest portion of God's earth on which my feet have ever rested." a

In Barlowe's account of his first voyage to North Carolina he says: "The soil is the most plentiful, sweet, fruitful and wholesome of all the world."

Robert Horne, writing in 1664 of the Cape Fear Country, says: b

"Is there therefore any younger brother who is born of gentle blood and whose spirit is elevated above the common sort, and yet the hard usage of our country hath not allowed a suitable fortune? He will not surely be afraid to leave his native soil to advance his fortunes equal to his blood and spirit, and so he will avoid those unlawful ways too many of our young gentlemen take to maintain themselves according to their high education, having but small estates; here, with a few servants and a small stock, a great estate may be raised, although his birth has not entitled him to any of the land of his ancestors, yet his industry may supply him so as to make him the head of as famous a family. Such as are here tormented with much care how to gain a comfortable livelihood, or that with their labor can hardly get a suitable subsistence, shall do well to go to this place, where any man whatever, that is but willing to take moderate pains, may be assured of a most comfortable subsistence, and be in a way to raise his fortunes far beyond what he could ever hope for in England. Let no man be troubled at the thought of being a servant four or five years, for I can assure you that many men give money with their children to serve seven years, to take more pains and fare nothing so well as the servants on this plantation will do. Then it is to be considered that so soon as he is out of his time he has land and a North Carolina and its Resources.

---

b Hawks, Vol. 2, p. 41.

Digitized by Google

tools, and clothes given him, and is in a way of advancement. Therefore all artificers—as carpenters, wheelwrights, joiners, coopers, bricklayers, smiths, or diligent husbandmen and laborers, that are willing to advance their fortunes, and live in a most pleasant, healthful and fruitful country, where artificers are of high esteem, and used with all civility and courtesy imaginable may take notice."

Lawson tells us that in 1700 an extensive traveller assured him that Carolina was the best country he could go to.

In writing of North Carolina Lawson says:

"A second Settlement of this Country was made about fifty Years ago, in that part we now call Albemarl-Country, and chiefly in Chuwon Precinct, by several substantial Planters from Virginia and other Plantations; Who, finding mild Winters and fertile Soil beyond Expectation, producing everything that was planted to a prodigious Increase; their Cattle, Horses, Sheep and Swine, breeding very fast, and passing the Winters without any Assistance from the Planter; so that everything seemed to come by Nature, the Husbandman living almost void of Care, and free from those fatigues which are absolutely requisite in Winter-Countries. * * * Nevertheless, I say, the Fame of this new-discovered summer country spread thro' the neighboring Colonies, and, in a few Years, drew a considerable Number of Families thereto, who all found Land enough to settle themselves in (had there been many Thousand more), and that which was very good and commodiously seated, both for Profit and Pleasure. And, indeed, most of the Plantations in Carolina, naturally enjoy a noble Prospect of large and spacious Rivers, pleasant Savannas and fine meadows." * * *

"The Planters possessing all these Blessings and the Produce of great Quantities of Wheat and Indian Corn, in which this Country is very fruitful as likewise in Beef, Pork, Tallow, Hides, Deer-Skins and Furs; For these Commodities the New-England-Men and Bermudians visited Carolina in their

Digitized by Google

Barks and Sloops, and carry'd out what they made, bringing them in Exchange Rum, Sugar, Salt, Molasses and some wearing Apparel, tho' the last at very extravagant prices." * * * "The inhabitants of Carolina, thro' the richness of the Soil live an easy and pleasant life. * * * The country in general affords pleasant Seats, the Land (except in some few places) being dry and high banks, parcell'd out into most convenient Necks (by the Creeks), easy to be fenced in for securing their Stocks to more strict Boundaries whereby, with a small trouble of fencing, almost every Man may enjoy, to himself, an entire Plantation, or rather Park." * * * "As the land is very fruitful, so are the Planters hospitable to all that come to visit them; there being very few housekeepers but what live very nobly and give away more Provisions to Coasters and Guests who come to see them, than they expend among their own Families." a

"Carolina was settled under the auspices of the wealthiest and most influential nobility, and its fundamental laws were framed with forethought by the most sagacious politician and the most profound philosopher of England." Later, "the colonists repudiated the Constitutions of Carolina," adopting only those parts most suited to their needs. b

The early settlers of North Carolina were English, from Virginia, New England and Old England and Barbadoes; French Huguenots and German Palatines. The English settled in Albemarle and Bath counties; the French on Pamlico, Neuse and Trent Rivers in Bath, and the Germans on Neuse and Trent. The Barbadians who first settled at Cape Fear did not follow Yeamans to South Carolina. They went up to the Albemarle settlement and to Nansemond County, in Virginia, in part, and in part to Boston. In this fact is to be found an easy explanation of the increase at this time in Albemarle both from New England and from Barbadoes. c a Lawson, pp. 63, 64.

---

b Bancroft, Vol. 2, p. 128.
c S. P. N., Vol. 1, p. 10.

Digitized by Google

Those in New England kept up their relations with their kinsmen in North Carolina. The New England skipper and trader practically controlled the commerce of this province by exchanging their manufactures for our produce. There was increasing immigration from New England to North Carolina which continued until the Civil War of 1861.

In 1700 there were only about five thousand people in the province—at the beginning of the Tuscarora War there were ten or eleven thousand inhabitants. Bath County was the seat of this war. This county embraced Pampticough, Wickham and Archdale precincts, and extended into the wilderness on the South and West. Pampticough and Wickham precincts covered the territory between the Roanoke and Pamlico Rivers. Archdale precinct claimed the land between Pamlico and Neuse rivers, and also the Neuse settlements on both sides Neuse River. a These precincts are now Beaufort, Hyde and Craven Counties.

At the time of the Tuscarora war the white settlers were fringed along the coast and the Indians occupied all other lands. Chocowinity was the frontier, and tradition says that on the morning of the Indian massacre John Porter's house at Chocowinity was the first to be fired. On the Roanoke were the forts of the Cheeweo and Resootska. On the Tar near the present town of Washington, was Nakay—there was also a fort just about two miles above Bear Creek, on what is still known as Indian Fort branch on Grimesland plantation. *

---

a C. R. Vol. 1, p. 629.

* NOTE.—A field of about ten acres cleared by the Indians on Indian Fort Branch in the west corner of a seventy-five-acre field (Pridgen cut) is still in cultivation.

Digitized by Google

Further up the Tar about two or three miles below the present town of Greenville was King Blount's town, Ucohnerunt. On the Contentnea were Conneghta, Tahunta and Hookerooka Forts and Hancock's town. a. To the South and West was the unknown wilderness and the Indian towns of Keeouwee (old town) Totero Fort, Uharee, Acconeechy, etc. *

After the war most of the Tuscaroras went to their kindred in New York. King Blount and his people were given a reservation between Tar and Neuse River, but were soon moved at his own request to lands on Roanoke River where fifty-three thousand (53,000) acres were given them in Bertie County, and a fort was built for their defence from enemy Indians. b Here they lived under their Kings, Tom Blount and his son, James Blount, many years. They were afterwards joined by the Supponees and the Chowans. c a See map Eman. Bowen.

---

b C. R., Vol. 2, pp. 283, 484, 496.
c C. R., Vol. 3, p. 538.

* NOTE.—In the preliminary articles of peace signed November 25th, 1712, between Major General Thomas Pollock for the colonists and Tom Blount, Saroonha Hounthanohnoh, Chaunthorunthoo, Newoonttootsery and Herunttocken for a number of Indian towns, it was agreed among other things: "Imprimis, The afsd great men Doe hereby Covenant & agree to & with ye said presidt & Councill that they shall and will, with ye utmost expedition & Dilligence, make Warr agt. all ye Indyans belonging to ye Townes or Nations of Catechny, Cores, Nuse & Bare River and pamptico, and that they shall not nor will not give any Quarter to any male Indyan of those Towns or Nations above ye Age of fourteen yeares, and also that they shall & will sell off & dispose of all ye males under that age. And that further, after they shall have destroy'd those townes or soe soone as this Governm't shall think proper to require it the said great men doe hereby promise to Join ye English with Soe menny Men as may be thought proper to destroy & cutt off all ye Matchepungo Indyans. * * *

4thly.—It is hereby farther Agreed by ye Great Men af-sd that these Severall Townes of Tostehant, Rauroota, Tarhuntah, Keutah, Toherooka, Juninits & Caunookehee, nor any of ye Indyans belonging to them or either of them, shall not nor will not Hunt nor rainge among ye English plantations nor Stocks without leave, nor then above ye number of three at one tyme, neither shall they Claime any property in ye lands on ye South Side of Nuse called Chatookae River, nor below Catachney Creek on Nuse, nor below Bare Creek ate not-sha-hun-han-rough on ye Noth (south) side of pamptico river." See original treaty framed in State Hall of History.

Digitized by Google

These Indians also removed to New York, but they held their lands on the Roanoke and collected rents for them well on into the nineteenth century.

The Indians remaining in the province about 1730, through their Chiefs, King Tom Blount, of the Tuscaroras; King Hoyter, of the Chowans, and King Durant, of the Yawpims, paid a yearly tribute to the Governor. b

The Tuscarora war and the hardships following caused many people to leave the province, but this war was a blessing in disguise. As soon as the Indian troubles were finally disposed of, settlers sought the desirable lands higher up on the Roanoke, Tar and Neuse Rivers and their tributaries. In a few years settlements were begun on the Cape Fear. In the war we were aided by South Carolina and some of her leading citizens were so favorably impressed with our country that many of them and their friends soon moved here.

From a population of eleven thousand two hundred (seven thousand five hundred white, three thousand seven hundred negro) in 1715 c just after the Indian war the province of North Carolina had grown to thirty-six thousand, in 1730 at the end of the Proprietary period. From that time until the Revolution probably no province in America grew faster in wealth and population. In 1752 our population was ninety thousand d, seventy thousand white, twenty thousand negro, having been tripled in twenty years.

The Indian captives, more than six hundred, taken by Cols. Barnwell and Moore and their soldiers and ally Indians, were sent to South Carolina as slaves. Those taken by our people were sold into slavery in the West Indies or kept in bondage here. An Indian slave was valued at about £10, and was generally sold away from home. Negroes

b C. R., Vol. 4, pp. 34, 446.
c Chalmers. d S. P. N., Vol. 4, 22.

Digitized by Google

commanded higher prices as they were more docile and capable of greater labor.

In the Indian war our ally Indians were offered "a reward of six blankets for the head of each man of the said Indians killed by the (friendly) Tuscaroras, and the usual price of slaves for each woman and child delivered captives." a The white people after capturing Indians sometimes indulged in barbarities, as DeGraffenreid gives us an account of the roasting of an Indian King in 1711. b

Even as late as 1760 a law was passed making Indian captives slaves and "the absolute right and property of who shall be the captor of such Indian," and ten pounds was given for an Indan scalp taken by a citizen, and five pounds was given for a scalp captured by a solider. To some of our people it seemed profitable for the Indians to raise disturbances, but this province was never directly charged with inciting them to war for sinister purposes. Of one of our neighbors an historian says: "This province long continued 'that barbarous practice' which was then introduced (1680) of promoting Indian hostility that they might gain by the traffic of Indian slaves." c

"The moving causes of immigration to Albemarle were its delightful climate, magnificent bottom lands and bountiful products." d

Land-holding gave dignity and importance. The large land-holders, then as now, wielded great influence in their communities. They were the aristocracy of the country and the governing classes; their sons inheriting prestige and leadership with their estates.

Many of the early settlers came from other colonies for the rich lands along our river bottoms, which were found to be cheap, fertile and abundant. These "river plantations"

a C. R., Vol. 1, p. 15.
b C. R., Vol. 1, p. 946.
c Chalmers, Vol. 2, p. 172.
d Saunders.

Digitized by Google

of North Carolina and the South were to become famous all over the world. Land could be easily secured. A planter starting life with modest beginnings would, by the productiveness of this soil and the natural fruitfulness of his slaves, horses, cattle and hogs, die rich in old age.

Brickell, who for awhile lived at Edenton, writing about 1735 says the Albemarle Country was settled by "Persons from Virginia and other Northern Colonies who, finding the Soil so very good and fertile, settled here, and are become very Numerous and Rich; for the lands here produce everything Planted in them in great abundance, Horses, Cows, Sheep and Swine breeding in vast numbers, the winter being very short, and that so mild that the Planters are at little or no Labour or Expense in providing Fodder for their Stock to what other Northerly Countries are." a

Among the planters were gentry who lived as much like their relations in England and Scotland as conditions in a sparsely settled country would admit. Some of the early planters came here in official positions as deputies of the Lords Proprietors, bringing with them their friends, retainers and tenants. With the various governors came their kinsmen, supporters and adherents. An examination of the wills in the office of the Secretary of State will show from the signatures with seals bearing imprinted theron crests and coats of arms of signers, that many of the leading men of Carolina belonged to the gentry of England and Scotland. Many of them were highly educated and classical scholars of great learning. The drafts of old laws, state papers, wills and letters of that day will, in phraseology and elegance of diction, compare most favorably with the productions of the best scholars of to-day.

At the close of the Proprietary period, it may not be far wrong to suggest that the per cent of highly educated and leading men in the colony in proportion to population (which a Brickell, p. 9.

Digitized by Google

was thirty-five thousand) was as great as it is in North Carolina to-day, but the masses for many years had little opportunity for education.

Of the great families of the province at that time, during the second quarter of the eighteenth century, may be mentioned the Swanns, Porters, Gales, Moseleys, Moores, Pollocks, Vails, Blounts, Bryans, Maules, Ashes, Johnstons, Herritages and others. It is safe to say that in honor, character, virtue and accomplishments, they were not excelled by any families on the American continent. They were people of education, refinement, culture and abundance. Without great wealth they lived in comfort and plenty. With lands, slaves, books, plate, horses and carriages they were leaders in a social life that rivaled the best in the adjoining colonies.

The early settlers took up the choicest lands on the rivers to such an extent that laws were passed to prevent the entering of too much land on the rivers to the exclusion of other settlers. In laying out the lands the enterer was at first allowed to take up 640 acres or a square mile in one tract on the river, a, but the act further provided that the surveyor should not "lay out two several tracts of land for any one person within two miles at least of each other, unless by particular warrant from the Lords Proprietors for that purpose." It must have been easy to obtain this "particular warrant from the Lords Proprietors for that purpose," or the law was not strictly observed, as we find many men in the province owning large bodies of land before North Carolina became a Royal Province. Of the large landed proprietors, some of them owning as much as fifty thousand acres, may be mentioned George Burrington, Frederick Jones, Roger Moore, Edward Moseley, Maurice Moore, John Lovick, William Maule, Dr. Patrick Maule, Seth Sothell, Robert Forster, Martin Franks, a Chap. 33, Sec. 4, Laws 1715.

Digitized by Google

Christopher Gale, John Porter, Thomas Pollock, Cullen Pollock, William Stephenson, John Baptista Ashe and others. *

To prevent non-residents entering land for speculation, one was required to have resided in the province for two years before they could sell their rights and lands. a All persons entering land were required to pay on the 29th of September one shilling for every fifty acres as quit rents, and were to be allowed three years to seat and plant, and the patentee was required to build a habitable house and to clear and fence and plant at least one (1) acre of land within the time limited. b In the Council Journal March 31, 1726, we read: "For saving of lands for the future, every house shall be fifteen foot long, ten Broad, Made tight and habitable of Clapboards or Loggs squared, with a roof and chimney-place and a Door-place. The whole acre cleared well, the major part of it broke up and planted with either fruite, trees or grain." c The large land-owners probably built one or two log houses on each tract of land, and placed thereon an overseer with several slaves. The overseers were frequently indentured servants in bond or those who had served their term and were in the employment of their former masters. They were sometimes hired for wages, but often for a part of the produce of the land. The customary wages being "for which Service he is allowed every seventh Calfe, seventh Fole and half of all young hogs that are bred during his stewardship, a Laws 1715, C. 2.

b Laws 1715, Ch. 26.
c C. R., Vol. 2, p. 607.

* NOTE.—Bernheim, Vann and other writers say Martin Franks came to North Carolina in 1732. This is an error. He was treasurer of Craven precinct before that time (Page manuscript laws, in Everard's time) and was one of the signers of a petition in 1711-12. (Hawks.) In Grant records, Book 2, page 254, is recorded, Apr. 14, 1730, a grant in Craven Precinct, Bath County, to Martin Franks for Ten thousand one hundred and seventy-five (10,175) acres. The grant recites that "All of which land was granted to the sd Martin Frank by a warrant dated June 15th, 1711."

Digitized by Google

and likewise the seventh part of all sorts of grain and tobacco that is produced on the said plantation."a

* The slaves also made tar and turpentine in the spring and summer season, clearing land in the fall and winter; the women and children worked the corn raising sufficient for the men and animals.

During the wars between England and France, the Swedish merchants, who controlled the naval stores trade of the world, put the price of tar to such an extortionate figure that England gave bounties to her colonists to produce it.  About 1704, North Carolina commenced its production, and for two hundred years it has been one of the chief products of the State. In the year 1753 North Carolina exported 61,528 barrels of tar; 12,052 do. of pitch; 10,429 do. turpentine, 762,000 staves; 61,580 bus. corn, 100 (?) hhds. tobacco, and about 30,000 deer skins, besides lumber and other commodities. In 1708 the exports from all America was 6,089 barrels of pitch and tar to England. b a Brickell, p. 269.

b Chalmers.

* NOTE.—In Carroll's Historical Collections of South Carolina, Vol. 2, p. 261, we are told that overseers, when hired for wages, were paid fifteen to forty pounds per annum, and laborers from one shilling and three pence to two shillings a day "with Lodging and Diet."

* * *

 The following is taken from the English Statutes at Large, Vol. 4, 1699-1713.

"Chap. X. 1704—

 The following is taken from the English Statutes at Large, Vol. 4, Majesty's plantations in America.

* * * any of the naval stores hereafter mentioned, shall have and enjoy, as a Reward or Praemium for such Importation, after and according to the several rates for such Naval Stores as follows, viz:

II. For good and merchantable Tar per Tun, containing eight Barrels, and each Barrel to gage thirty-one Gallons and an half, Four Pounds.

For good and merchantable Pitch per Tun, each Tun containing twenty Gross hundreds (Net Pitch) to be brought in eight barrels, four Pounds.

For good and merchantable Rozin or Turpentine per Tun, each Tun containing twenty Gross hundred (Net Rozin or Turpentine) to be brought in eight Barrels, three Pounds.

For Hemp, Water rotted, bright and clean, per Tun, each Tun containing twenty Gross, hundreds, six Pounds.

For all Masts, Yards and Bowsprits, per Tun, allowing forty Foot to each Tun, Girt measure, according to the customary way of measuring round bodies, one Pound.

* * *

This Act was later repealed.)

Digitized by Google

Every planter of ordinary thrift soon became independent. In the most primitive period of our history the first houses of the planters were built of logs. The house was of notched logs and was probably such as is seen in many sections of the State to-day. Between the logs were fastened split poles which were chinked with mud. The chimneys were mostly wooden, the base, body and brast of chimney being logged up to the funnel, after which a square pen or stack of sticks was made and daubed inside and out with clay to cement together and to protect from burning. The inside of the fire-place was covered with mud in the same way. Lumber was scarce and expensive, and such as they had was sawed by hand in saw-pits or imported from Boston. a It was probably about 1730, before saw mills made their appearance in North Carolina. b Just before 1750 these mills sawed about 150,000 feet a year.

Col. Byrd, in his "History of the Dividing Line," c says: "Most of the houses in this part of the Country are log houses, covered with Pine or Cypress shingles three feet long and one broad. They are hung upon laths with Peggs, and their doors too turn upon Wooden Hinges, and have Wooden Locks to secure them, so that the Building is finisht without nails or other iron work."

It may be interesting to note what was regarded as a habitable house as shown by the size of houses required to be built in the various towns within eighteen months or two years after purchasing lots. Pollock in 1720 required that the houses built on lots in New Bern (which town he owned) should be "not less than Fifteen Foot square." d As late as 1756, eighteen months' time was given for building on lots taken up, and a habitable house of sixteen a Thomas Pollock's Will.

b C. R., Vol. 3, pp. 427, 432, (1732); C. R., Vol. 4. pp. 52, 61, (1735).
c Vol. 1, p. 59.
d C. R., Vol. 2, p. 386.

Digitized by Google

feet by twenty-four feet required. a In Edenton b houses were required to be "not of less Dimensions than Twenty Feet long, Fifteen Feet in width and Eight Feet in Height between the first floor and the joists, etc." No wooden chimneys were allowed to be built there after the first day of May, 1741. c At Brunswick houses were to be 20 feetx16 feet. d When the town of Johnston, in Onslow, which was afterwards destroyed by a wind storm in September, 1752, e was incorporated f the inhabitants buying lots were required to build within two years a "good, substantial habitable frame-house not of less dimensions than Twenty Four feet in length and Sixteen feet wide, besides sheds and Leantos." When Capt. Richard Sanderson attempted to build a town on Roanoke Island g it was required that the houses should be 20 feetx15 feet. In the establishment of Newtown (which afterwards became Wilmnigton), it was made a town, "Provided, the Inhabitants thereof do, within the space of two years from the date hereof build and erect six Brick Houses in the principal streets, of forty feet long and thirty feet deep." h When the village of Newton was changed into the town of Wilmington i it was required that before one was allowed to vote for a representative for the said town in the General Assembly he must be "a Tenant of a Brick, Stone or framed habitable House, of the Length of Twenty Feet, and Sixteen Feet Broad; or an inhabitant of a Brick House of the Length of Thirty Feet, and Sixteen Feet Broad, between the Bounds of said Town, upwards, and Smith's Creek, and within One Hundred and Twenty Poles to the Cape Fear River." This a Laws 1756, Ch. 12.

b Laws, 1740, Ch. 1, Sec. 2.
c Sec. 13.
d Laws 1745, Ch. 12, Sec. 8.
e Martin, Vol. 2, p. 61.
f Laws 1741, Ch. 12, Sec. 6.
g Laws 1715, Ch. 59.
h C. R., Vol. 4, p. 43.
i Laws 1739, Ch. 4, Secs. 4 and 5, and Laws 1740, Ch. 4, Secs. 7 and 8.

Digitized by Google

was probably intended to include several of the prominent men who lived near to town.

The planters lived upon their estates with residences generally more pretentious than the town houses. A few of these houses were of brick, but they were commonly frame houses. Some of them were of considerable dimensions even early in the eighteenth century. There were few brick houses in North Carolina. Even after the planters became wealthy they did not affect them. In a humid climate brick houses were probably damp and unhealthy. In New Bern there were only two brick dwelling houses as late as 1792. a

There are to-day standing houses of well-to-do planters that were built prior to 1750. Some of them brick, but mostly of wood. These houses are about forty feet long and twenty feet wide, to which are added shed rooms or "leantos." The basements or cellars are about 7 or 8 feet pitch, the walls to the cellar being massive masonry of rock, the rock having come from the West Indies as ballast for vessels. In the cellar is generally a large room about 19x19 feet at one end, and the other end divided into small rooms which are used for storage. The walls of the cellar rise several feet above the ground. In the large cellar room there is a fire-place several feet deep, about eight feet wide and four feet high.

---

a Morse Geog., Mrs. Powell's "New Bern."

NOTE.—All the earlier brick buildings are said to have been built with "brick brought from England." This probably means of "English Brick" except a few press brick for tiles and ornamental purposes. In Harriot's Narrative (1586) we read: "The planters may be well supplied with brick, for the making whereof in divers places of the country there is clay both excellent, good and plenty, and also by lime made of oyster shells and others burnt, etc."

When Bacon burned Jamestown in 1675 there were a number of brick houses in the town. Drummond, the former Governor of North Carolina owning one which in an excess of patriotism he fired with his own hands. An old grant in Virginia in 1637 for lands at Jamestown calls for the "Brick Mill"; Lawson says in 1700 that there were "Large Brick Buildings" in Charleston at that time; he further says "Good Brick and Tiles" were made in North Carolina. Brickell also informs us that "Brick and Tile" were made here in his time. The light tonnage of the vessels averaging probably not more than 100 tons burden coming into these waters after a month's sail from England, would have made the importing of brick quite expensive.

Digitized by Google

There were receptables or ovens built in the sides of the fire-place. Across the chimney, inside, ran a heavy iron rod on which were the cranes for hanging pots. These cranes were made in two pieces and so adjusted that pots could be raised or lowered at will. In the cellar rooms were small windows. Resting on the cellar walls were the sills of the house, generally 10x12 inches or 12x12 inches, hewn out of heart pine running the full length and breadth of the house; on these were the sleepers, six inches by eight inches or eight inches by ten inches, hewn out of heart pine, joined at the ends, mortised, tenoned and truncheoned with lightwood truncheons about one and a half or two inches in diameter. The sills were sometimes tarred with hot tar and wrapped in tarred canvas as a further protection against moisture. On the first floor is a large square room 19x19 feet. For several feet from the floor around the room, coming up to the base of the windows is panelling. The fire-place is four or five feet wide, and above it about six feet tall is the old wooden mantel of best workmanship. Adjoining the big room is a narrow passage with stairs ascending to the second floor and garret; across the passage are two small rooms.

The second floor is a duplicate of the first and the garret is divided into small rooms with small windows at end of house. These houses frequently had brick ends as is so often seen in tidewater Virginia. All the timbers are of unbled pine and the nails used are hand-wrought.

NOTE.—There are three of these houses still standing in Beaufort County: The Cotanche or Marsh House at Bath, the Maule House at Maule's Point and the old house at the Grimes Plantation on Tranters Creek. The old Cotanche House at Bath has closets in its massive chimney in which valuables could be placed to secure from fire. The chimney closets have small windows in the chimney. It was not uncommon to have an excavation bricked up on each side of the chimney opening inside by the hearth in which valuables could be placed. In some old chimneys under fire-places have been discovered a box or barrel with covers neatly fixed in the chimney foundation, so that by raking away the ashes and taking up part of the hearth these little vaults could be reached. These deposit places were safe from discovery and secure from fire.

Digitized by Google

The planter's home residence was called the Manor or Manor House, The House, The Great House, etc. The family servants were settled near at hnad, while the overseer's house and quarters were some distance away. The estates were generally named, sometimes after the family or family estates in England, and often after the place in England from whence the planter came. The large planters prided themselves upon being "gentlemen"—the owner of lands with laborers to work for them. He was truly lord of all he surveyed, governed his own household and was law-giver to his poor neighbors. He arbitrated their disputes and settled their differences—he doctored them in sickness and helped them in time of need. The title of head or master of an estate carried with it position and hereditary dignity and power little less than an inherited title carried with it in the mother country.

Labor was in the greatest demand. In January, 1733, Gov. Burrington, in writing to the Lords of Trade and Plantations, says: "Land is not wanting for men in Carolina, but men for land." * * * "I compute the white men, women and children in North Carolina to be fully thirty thousand, and the negroes about six thousand. The Indians, men, women and children, less than eight hundred. * * * Great is the loss this country has sustained in not being supply'd by vessels from Guinea with negroes; in any part of the province the people are able to pay for a ships load; but as none come directly from Africa, we are under a necessity to buy the refuse, refractory and distempered negroes, brought from other governments; it is hoped some merchants in England will speedily furnish this colony with negroes to increase the produce and its trade to England." a

The planter's wealth was generally estimated by the number of his slaves. All planters of any pretentions owned a C. R., Vol. 3, pp. 430, 431. See also Vol. 4, p. 172.

Digitized by Google

slaves—negroes, Indians, mulatoes and mustees. The gold and silver that came into the hands of planters from sale of produce was saved to purchase slaves with, as the traders required specie payments. Female slaves under 20 years of age were especially desired.

In 1733 the value of products exported to Virginia for which our people received cash was about £50,000 a year. a Quit rents, dues, taxes and all other debts, public and private, were paid to the government or creditors in commodities which were rated in 1715 as follows:

	£.	s.	d.
"Tobacco, per cwt.		10	0
Indian corn per bushel		1	8
Wheat per bushel		3	6
Tallow tryped, per ℔			5
Leather tanned and uncured, per ℔			8
Beaver and other skins per ℔		2	6
Wild cat skins per piece		1	0
Butter per ℔			6
Cheese per ℔			4
Buck and doe skins (raw) per ℔			9
Buck and doe skins (drest) per ℔		1	4
Feathers per ℔		1	4
Pitch (full gauged) per barl	1	0	0
Whale oil " "	1	10	0
Porke " "	2	5	0
Beef " "	1	10	0"

Rates were later somewhat changed. Flax and hemp were also added. b

There was little currency in the province even at a much later period. In writing of North Carolina just before the Revolution a traveler says: "There is but little specie in

b C. R., Vol. 3, p. 622.
c C. R., Vol. 4, pp. 469, 920.

Digitized by Google

circulation; indeed, there is no great occasion for it; for a planter raises his own meats, beef and bacon, his own corn and bread, his drink, cyder and brandy, his fruit, apples, peaches, etc., and a great part of his clothing which is cotton." a Almost all wealth was in land, slaves and stock. There was not much loaning of money; the legal rate of interest was 6 per cent, and the penalty for usury was forfeiture of twice the amount of the principal. b There was a considerable amount of Mexican, Peruvian and Spanish coin in circulation in the province, the value of which was fixed by proclamation of Queen Anne.

---

a Smyth's Tour in America, p. 99.

b Laws 1741, Ch. 11.

NOTE.—"An act for ascertaining the rates of foreign coins in Her Majesty's Plantations in America.

WHEREAS, for remedying the inconveniences which had arisen from the different rates at which the same species of Foreign Silver coins did pass in Her Majesty's several Colonies and Plantations in America, Her Most Excellent Majesty has thought fit by her Royal Proclamation bearing date the eighteenth day of June one thousand seven hundred and four, and in the third year of her Reign, to settle and ascertain the currency of foreign coins in her said Colonies and Plantations in the manner and words following:

We having had under our Consideration the different rates at which the same Species of Foreign Coins do pass in our several Colonies and Plantations in America, and the inconveniences thereof by the indirect practice of drawing the money from one Plantation to another to the great Prejudice of the Trade of our Subjects; and being sensible that the same cannot be otherwise remedied than by reducing all foreign coins to the same current Rate within all our Dominions in America; and the principal officers of our Mint having laid before us a table of the value of the several Foreign Coins which usually pass in Payments in our said Plantations according to their Weight and Assays made of them in our Mint, thereby shewing the just proportion which each coin ought to have to the other which is as followeth: * * *

II. And whereas, notwithstanding the said Proclamation the same indirect practices as are therein mentioned are still carried on within some of the said Colonies or Plantations and the money thereby drawn from one Plantation to another, in Prejudice of the Trade of Her Majesty's subjects; Wherefore for the better enforcing the due Execution of her Majesty's said Proclamation throughout all the said Colonies and Plantations, and for the more effectual remedying the said Inconveniencies, thereby intended to be remedied, Be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the Advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons in this present Parliament assembled and by the authority of the same * * * ." Statutes at Large, Vol. 4, 1699-1715. Cap. 30, p. 324, 1707.

The penalty for the violation of this law was six months' imprisonment and a fine of Ten pounds for each offence.

Digitized by Google

Slaves were generally bought in Virginia or South Carolina at high prices, and after the most select ones had been chosen by the planters of those States. With the opening of the Cape Fear, the planters had an opportunity to buy slaves at first hands. Some of the planters who first settled on the Cape Fear took with them a considerable number of slaves from their plantations in Chowan and Pamlico. Among these may be mentioned:

Edward Moseley	with	62 slaves.
Roger Moore	with	100 slaves.
John Porter	with	62 slaves.
John Lovick	with	34 slaves. a

They moved that many in 1732 and were allowed headrights of fifty acres for each member of their families. Roger Moore at the time of his death in 1751 owned 250 negroes.

Slavery was the greatest eleemosynary and educational institution for a weak and inferior race that the world has ever known. Some of the planters freed their slaves, but this does not seem to have met the approval of the colonists as freed slaves were required to leave the province or to be sold again into slavery. b

In disposing of slaves care was taken not to separate the men and their wives and children; an instance of this kind is shown in the will of Cullen Pollock, 1749. Occasionally negro slaves could read and write even in the earliest period, and negroes were allowed to raise "side crops" of tobacco, to gather herbs, etc., and the money derived from these was theirs individually and to do as they pleased with. c

When it became necessary to execute a slave the owner was repaid his value, which was assessed by the Justices and allowed by the Assembly. d a C. R., Vol. 3, p. 426, etc.

b Laws 1741, Ch. 24, Sec. 56.
c Brickell, p. 275.
d 1741, Ch. 24, Sec. 46.

Digitized by Google

All slaves were tythable at the age of 12 years. a Every master was allowed to permit one slave on every plantation to carry a gun for the protection of stock and for hunting game for the table. b All slaves away from their masters' plantations were required to have "certificate of leave in writing for so doing, from his or her master or overseer (negroes wearing liveries always excepted)." c It seemed to please the fancy of the planters to name their slaves after the great characters in mythology and history, or to give them some whimsical name. Every large plantation had its Cæsar, Hannibal, Scipio, Jupiter, Moses, Aaron, Pompey, Mars, Venus, Dido, Diana, Africa, Mustapha, etc.

Indentured white servants were not as numerous in this country as in Virginia and Maryland. These unfortunates represented many classes and conditions. "Some of the convicts sold as indentured servants were persons of family and education." d Convicts were sent to the colonies and sold into bondage. Others were sent into servitude for political offences. Many of the supporters of the Duke of Monmouth were deported to the American colonies and sentenced to ten years' servitude. Some indentured themselves to pay their passage money, which was about £5 in cash, and were sold upon arrival here by the sailing master. Christian servants above 16 years old imported into this government without indenture, were required to serve five years. All under 16 years of age were to serve till they were 22 years old. e All Christians were to be allowed by their master or mistress at the expiration of their service three barrels of Indian corn, two new suits of apparel valued at £5 at best, or in lieu of a suit of "apparell" "a good well-fixed gun if he be a man servant"; they were also enttiled to fifty acres of land which they seldom took up.

a 1741, Ch. 24.
b Laws 1741, Ch. 24, Sec. 41.
c 1741, Ch. 24, Sec. 53.
d Bancroft, Vol. 2, p. 251.
e Laws 1715, Ch. 46, Sec. 6.

Digitized by Google

Many people, especially women and children, were kidnapped in London and other cities and brought to America to be sold as bond servants. The Colony passed an act a whereby the person kidnapped, if a Christian or a subject of a friendly power, might recover from the Importer or Seller double the amount for which he was sold, and the defendant was required to give bond to transport the person back to the land from whence he came within one year.

Writing to the Lords of Trade and Plantations Gov. Burrington says: b "It is by breeding Horses, Hoggs. and Cattle that people without slaves gain substance here at first, not by their labor." The abundance of grass, reeds and rich vegetation caused the horses, cattle and hogs to multiply in vast numbers; the stock were branded or marked and turned loose in the woods, being penned and fed enough to keep them from going entirely wild. Lawson says (1707) he had seen as many as one thousand cattle belonging to one owner, and Brickell says he had seen one hundred calves in one pen belonging to one person. The calves were confined to insure the return of the cows each evening, a custom that prevails with cattle raisers in Eastern Carolina to this day.

About 1728 there was a disease that destroyed half the cattle in the Province; c again about 1760 another cattle distemper was brought in the Province from South Carolina by which near 7-8 of the stock was lost. d The importance of the cattle industry seems to have declined from that time.

---

a Laws 1741, Ch. 25, Sec. 23.
b C. R., Vol. 3, p. 148.
c C. R., Vol. 3, p. 28.
d C. R., Vol. 6, p. 1,029.

NOTE.—We are told that in South Carolina the writer Peter Purry in 1731 had known "one Planter to mark two hundred calves last spring"; Again, another writer states that in South Carolina "Black Cattle are extremely plentiful, many gentlemen owning from five hundred to fifteen hundred head. Carr. Coll., Vol. 2, pp. 123, 482.

Digitized by Google

Horses were raised in considerable numbers. They were turned out to range, it being necessary to feed them only in the winter time. In almost every locality in the early settled sections of North Carolina there are to-day places where tradition tells us were "horse pens." Many localities have such names as the "Horse neck pocoson," "Horse Pen branch," etc. These horses are described as smaller than the average horses now in use but of great endurance. Many of them are said to have gone wild.

Hogs were raised in vast numbers, the woods abounding in berries, fruits, acorns and mast of all kinds. The Coastal Plain was heavily set in oaks of all kinds and the acorns furnished abundant food for hogs. Hogs were kept until grown, and it became a custom on account of their uniform size to count the pieces, hams, shoulders, sides, etc., instead of weighing. This custom prevailed until the middle of the past century. Planters now living tell me that they have sold dried meats that way which were transported in flat boats down the rivers to be loaded in vessels for the West Indies. Beef and pork barrelled dry, and in pickle, were of the rated commodities, and for many years were two of the chief exports of the colony.

Gov. Burrington reported in 1736 that there were fifty thousand hogs and ten thousand fat oxen driven into Virginia yearly. a The want of salt made this necessary. These came from Pamlico and Albemarle, and were in addition to the amount of barrelled meat shipped.

Horses were branded and Cattle and Hogs were marked in the ears, a custom that still prevails.

For altering or defacing brands or the mismarking of stock there was a penalty of ten pounds proclamation money over and above the value of the animal, and "forty lashes on

a C. R., Vol. 4, p. 172.

(NOTE.—The writer's mark now in use "a crop slit and under bit both ears," has been the family stock mark for more than a century.)

Digitized by Google

his bare back well laid on, and for the second offence, he shall pay the price above-mentioned, stand in the Pillory Two Hours and be branded in the left hand with a red hot iron the letter T." * * * "Such slave or slaves shall, for first offence, suffer both his ears to be cut off, and be publicly whipt, at the Discretion of the Justices and Freeholders before whom he shall be tried; and for the second offence shall suffer death." a

The discovery of the rich Cape Fear bottoms where the rice lands are as fertile as any in the world, attracted attention near the close of the Proprietary period, and quite a colony of the leading men from Albemarle and Bath counties went there; among them the Porters, Ashes, Moores, Lillingtons, Moseleys, etc. Of these the Hon. Geo. Davis says: "They were no needy adventurers, driven by necessity, no unlettered boors, ill at ease in the haunts of civilization, and seeking their proper sphere amidst the barbarism of the savages. They were gentlemen of birth and education, bred in the refinements of polished society, and bringing with them ample fortunes, gentle manners, and cultivated minds—most of them united by ties of blood, and all by those of friendship, they came as one household, sufficient to themselves, and reared their family altars in love and peace."

It was not an uncommon thing for a wealthy planter to own twenty or thirty thousand acres of land. b

Provoked by a charge that some of them owned more than one hundred thousand acres each, John Porter, Edward Hyrne, Jno. Swann, Sam Swann, J. Davis, M. Moore, Thos. Jones, Nathaniel Moore and Jno. Davis signed a memorial, saying they together did not own more than seventy-five thousand acres, and had "not more than twelve hundred persons in their families." c a Laws 1741, Ch. 8.

b C. R., Vol. 4, p. 426.
c C. R., Vol. 4, p. 315.

Digitized by Google

The planters lived on the streams, and every family had its periauger, canoe, sloop or brigantine.

The water-ways were the chief mode of transportation. To the planters' doors came the ships of the old world, and especially the sloops of the New England and West India trader.

Many of the more substantial planters owned vessels that traded with New England, the Barbadoes and occasionally made trips to Europe. The periaugers would carry eight or ten tons or fifty or sixty barrels of pork or tar, and were well adapted to the shallow creeks and landings that they oftenest frequented. The usual vessels in our waters were not of more than fifty or seventy-five tons, mainly the New England sloops. At an early period an effort was made to encourage North Carolina ship owners, and in an act of 1715, a vessels entering the government were required to pay one pound of powder, four pounds swan shot and twelve flints for every three tons' measure, and for want thereof ten shillings for every three tons—this was not to apply to vessels built in this country or owned in whole or in part here, nor to those vessels loaded wtih salt to unload here.

The absence of deep water shipping ports was the greatest handicap under which this province labored. For many years its importations were through the Virginia capes. Most of its commodities were brought from New England where they were imported and re-shipped to us.

Tobacco promised at one time to be our chief money crop, but there was an over production. The first Carolina law of which we have any record was "An Act prohibiting the sowing, setting, planting or in any way tending any tobacco" from Feby. 1st., 1667, to Feby. 1st., 1668. b A similar effort was made by Virginia and Maryland

a 1715, Ch. 35.
b S. P. N., Vol 1, p. 34.

Digitized by Google

at the same time. The next blow to our tobacco interests came about 1679 in "An act against importing tobacco from Carolina, and other ports without the Capes of Virginia." it was enacted: "That such importation from henceforth be, and by virtue of this, remain prohibited and forbidden; and that if any tobacco hereafter, in anywise whatsoever, shall be imported from Carolina or other ports without the Capes, into this colony and dominion in order to be laid here on shore, sold or shipped, the same shall be thereby forfeited and lost." a

Another act similar to the above was passed by Virginia against North Carolina in 1726. Against this the inhabitants of Albemarle protested, setting forth "That the Inlets to that part of North Carolina are not capable of receiving vessels of Burthen fitt for the transportating of Tobacco from thence to Great Brittain." This effectually prohibited shipping, and thereby destroyed our market for tobacco. The planters could raise tobacco sufficient to pay quit rents, etc,, which the government accepted at the rated price, but they could not sell it profitably and were forced to leave off planting in quantity for profit. "Endeavoring to cloathe themselves with their own manufactures" would compete with British manufacturers, so the British Board of Trade repealed these acts July 29, 1731. b

According to Lawson Roanoke Inlet was ten feet over the bar, but the sands were shifting and uncertain after coming within. Hatteras had four or five fathom on bar, but after getting into the sound not more than six feet of water was to be found. At Ocracoke, in Lawson's time, there was thirteen feet at low water and eighteen feet at high water, and after crossing the bar safe anchorage was found in seven or eight fathom water. Wimble (1738) says there was 17 feet on bar; in Teach's hole 4 fathoms of water, and in the sound an eight to nine feet channel was to be found.

a C. R., Vol. 1, p. 628.
b C. R., Vol. 3, p. 211.

Digitized by Google

At Beaufort, on Topsail Inlet, was two fathoms of water, according to Lawson, and five or six fathoms in the harbor. Wimble says there was seventeen feet on the bar. Prof. Bache, Superintendent of Coast Survey in 1851, gives seventeen feet at low water. In report to Congress Prof. Bache states that "a ship drawing twenty feet of water can leave at any state of tide, with almost any wind and discharge her pilot at sea in from thirty to forty-five minutes after weighing anchor."

Roanoke Inlet was early abandoned because it was shifting, shallow and dangerous, and Ocracoke became the customary entrance as about nine feet of water could be secured from Ocracoke to Bath, Newberne and Edenton. From Bath town to Ocracoke was reckoned seventy miles. a

Bath promised at one time to be the commercial metropolis of Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds, and was an important port of entry. When it was determined to have a permanent capital the General Assembly voted to make Bath the seat of government, but "by management" Gov. Johnston secured the selection of Newberne. b

Burrington, who had considerable wisdom, wished to make Ocracoke the port of entry, abolishing collection districts of Roanoke (Edenton), Currituck and Bath town. At Ocracoke we could have a direct trade with Europe, receiving the larger sea-going vessels there and distributing the produce to the various parts of our colony in smaller vessels and have direct importation of negroes. He did not, however, have sufficient influence at Court for that purpose, and for years our neighbors to the north and south of us received the great

a C. R., Vol. 3, p. 170.
b C. R., Vol. 4, p. 833.

Digitized by Google

ships and re-shipped to our waters in smaller vessels, receiving the profits and benefits that should have been ours. *

Gov. Burrington in 1731 writes:

"The pilots I have appointed assure me that at Ocracoke they bring in vessels that draw sixteen or eighteen feet water, at Port Beaufort that draw twenty, and at Cape Fear near two and twenty—this account the Pilots offered to swear too. Currituck Inlet is shut up, and Roanoke is so dangerous that few people care to use it, but go round to Ocracoke." a

Port Beaufort had but a very small quantity of land belonging to its district and was very inconvenient to traders on Neuse River, and the traders in that section were "forced to ride forty miles to enter and clear at Beaufort thro' a low, watery and uninhabited country, which after great rains is not passable in many days." b

At Cape Fear Lawson found "seven fathom on barr with fine harbor" and this was, and is, probably the best natural port south of New York. Tryon said in 1764: "The entrance over this bar is esteemed equal to that of Charleston." c a C. R., Vol. 3, p. 210.

---

b C. R., Vol. 4, p. 169.
c C. R., Vol. 6, p. 1,059.

* NOTE.—Burrington says, C. R., Vol. 3, p. 336, "At the south end of an island called Ocracock there is sufficient depth of water for any merchantman to come in and a secure harbor, this Island is separated from the main land by a Sound about fourteen leagues over that cannot be passed by a Vessell that draws tenn foot water, it has communications with many large rivers that water so great a part of this country as contain four parts in five of all the Inhabitants within the Province. On this Island there is a hill whereon if a small fort was Erected Cannon would from thence Command the Barr, Channell and Harbour, there is no one thing that would cause the trade of this Province to flourish like setting a Custom House on this Place, this would procure a trade from England, in a little time put an end to the Pedling carried on by the Virginians and People of New England."

NOTE.—A letter from Capt. Winslow of the U. S. Corps of Engineers gives the distance from Ocracoke Inlet to Washington, N. C., 75 miles; (about 12 miles above Bath). Ocracoke Inlet to New Berne, N. C., 70 miles; Ocracoke Inlet to Edenton, N. C., 130 miles."

Regarding Roanoke Inlet he gives the following data:

"It was open in 1585; depth not known. It was navigable for (9) nine feet in 1708; for eight (8) feet in 1738 and 1775; it was open in 1795; depth not known, and was closed in 1875. The time of the closure not being definitely known."

Digitized by Google

"The distance from Charleston bar to that of Cape Fear is sixty leagues, and has been frequently run in twenty hours."

In a letter to the Lords of the Board of Trade, Dec. 12, 1734, Gab Johnson says the Cape Fear was "the best navigation of any betwixt Chesapeak Bay and Cape Florida, and that the past year forty-two ships went loaded from this river." He said that the first settlement there was about eight years before.

When direct trade commenced at Wilmington the Cape Fear country soon became one of the most important commercial sections in America.

The leading men of the province were well educated, though little provision was made for the laboring classes. Gentlemen's sons were sent to Williamsburg, Charleston, New England and Old England; some had tutors at home. The daughters were taught by their own mothers or placed with ladies who undertook to educate them.

The ministers and lay readers were generally also teachers, and educated indentured servants were sometimes used for that purpose. Charles Griffin about 1705 was probably the first professional teacher in the Province, and others followed. Brickell a says: "The want of the Protestant clergy is generally supplied by some School-Masters, who read the Liturgy. These are most numerous and are dispersed through the whole Province." A free school for the education of Indian and negro children was established by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel at Bath about 1720. b

The law required c "That all orphans shall be Educated and provided for according to their Rank and degree" out of the "Income or Interest of their Estate and Stock, if the same will be sufficient, otherwise such a Page 35.

b See Rainsford's letter.
c Ch. 49, Laws 1715. Sec. 4.

Digitized by Google

orphan shall be bound apprentice to some Handycraft Trade (the Master or Mistress of such Orphan not being of the Profession of the People called Quakers) till they shall come of age."

Religion was established by law, but the people were allowed to worship God in their own way and no one was required to conform to the faith and forms of The Church unless they wished to. The Established Church was supposed to be supported by taxes, but the inhabitants do not seem to have been liberal or prompt in their settlements:

"With absolute freedom of sonscience, benevolent reason was the simple rule of their conduct." a

All Protestant Dissenters were allowed to have their meetings for the exercise of their religion without molestation, but no Quaker was qualified or permitted to give evidence in any criminal causes or to serve on any jury, or bear any office or place of profit or trust in the government. b

The early settlers were governed by the laws of England and such additional laws as were not repugnant thereto.

In the revision of 1715 the first of the "Six Confirmed Laws" was "An Act concerning Marriages." After reciting the absence of ministers in the Province to join "in wedlock according to the Rites and Customs of our natural Country the Kingdom of England: that none may be hindered from so necessary a work for the preservation of Mankind and settlement of this country." Sec. 2 reads. "It is enacted and be it enacted by the Palatin and Lords Proprietors, of Carolina, by and with the consent and Advice of the present Grand Assembly and the authority thereof, that any two persons desirous to be joined together in the Holy Estate of Matrimony, taking three or four neighbours along with them and repairing to the Governor or any one of the Council, before him declaring that they do join together in the Holy a Bancroft, Vol. 2. p. 154.

b 1715, Ch. 9, Secs. 2, 6. Re-enacted in 1749....

Digitized by Google

Estate of Wedlock and do accept one the other for Man and Wife, and the said Governor or Councellor before whom such Act is performed, giving certificate thereof, and the said certificate being registered in the Secretary's office, or by the Register of the Precinct or in such office as shall hereafter be appointed for that use. It shall be deemed a Lawful Marriage, & the persons violating that marriage shall be punished as they had been married according to the Rites and Customs of England."

Later magistrates were allowed to perform the marriage ceremony. a Registration of marriages, births and deaths were required, b and "every Planter, Owner, Attorney or Overseer of every settled plantation in this Government, or that hereafter shall be settled shall set apart a Burial place, and fence the same for the interring of all such Christian persons whether bond or free that shall die on their plantations." *

In this day of temperance agitation the following law may be worth mentioning, and the idea of requiring a bond of liquor dealers for the faithful observance of the law may be worth reviving: c "An act concerning Ordinary keepers and Tippling houses." The keepers of Taverns or Ordinaries were required to have license to sell liquor and to give bond for the due observance of the law; it further a 1741, Ch. 1, Sec. 9.

b Ch. 47, 1715.
c 1715, Ch. 53.

* NOTE.—It seems to have been a custom at burylngs to feed the people attending. The following bill pasted in "Minute Docket 1695–1712" may not be uninteresting.
lett: (1703.)

	£.	s.	d.
My trouble in ye sickness		10
coffin		10
sheat		8
digging grave, etc		5	6
funeral dinner	1	10
By looking after hogs, etc	1	5

Digitized by Google

provided that "nothing in this act shall be adjudged to hinder any Man from selling Cyder or other liquors, the produce of his own plantation, at any time hereafter by full and Lawful measures (the same not being drunk in the cellar house or plantation.)" The rate of charges for "Drink, Dyet, Lodging, Fodder, Provender, Corn or Pasturage" was fixed by the Justices of the County Court. a There were very few poor in the province as there was great demand for labor, and every one who would exert himself had an abundance of "hog and hominy." The fines collected for Sabbath breaking and swearing, profaneness, etc., were paid by the Justices to the Church Warden for the use of the poor of the parish. b If any person was wounded, maimed or hurt in his country's service "and not of ability to maintain himself or pay for his cure, he or they shall be cured at the Publick charge, and have one good negro man-slave allowed and purchased for him for his maintenance, and in the same case if any one shall be killed, the Publick shall make the same provision for his wife and family."

To vote for a member of the Assembly one was required to be 21 years of age and to have been an inhabitant of the government six months, and a free-holder with fifty acres. c This property qualification was not hard to attain, as every resident was entitled to fifty acres for himself and the same for each member of his family, if he chose to enter it. To be a member of the Assembly it was necessary to have been a resident of the Province for one full year and to be 21 years of age and own 100 acres of land.

There were a number of good roads in the province before 1750—that from Edenton to Williamsburg, a distance of a 1741, Ch. 20, Sec. 4.

b Laws 1715, Ch. 25, Sec. 8.
c 1743, Ch. 1, Sec. 5.

Digitized by Google

100 miles, being very good and a great highway of travel. The road from "Edenton to Virginia, being made broad and convenient for all sorts of carriages, such as Coaches, Chaises, Waggons and Carts, and especially for Horsemen." a There was a road from Edenton to Bath, from Bath to New Berne, and from New Berne to Brunswick—distance, two hundred miles.

The road system was not much inferior to that in many counties in North Carolina to-day. Every male person, white or black, from sixteen years of age to sixty, was required to work the roads. b

An effort to secure the carrying of letters was made early in our history. All letters superscribed for his Majesty's service directed to or subsigned by the Governor or other "Publick Officer" or by some Field Officer in the Militia at such time when the government is actually engaged in war against the "Indyan Enemie" shall be "Immediately conveyed from Plantation to the place and persons to whom they are directed under the Penalty of Five pounds for each default—one halfe to the Government and the other half to him or them which shall sue for the same." c It was further enacted that "where any person in the family the said letter comes to can write such person is hereby required to endorse the day and houre of the Receipt of it that the neglect or Contempt of any person therein may be the better discovered and punishment inflicted accordingly." The bill, costs and charges of carriages was adjudged by the Court of each Precinct and paid by the General Assembly. d Burrington said in 1731 "this law never answered the end, and is now entirely useless." e a Brickell, page 262.

b 1745, Ch. 3; C. R., Vol. 3, p. 435.
c 1715, Ch. 15, Sec. 56.
d Laws 1715, Ch. 56.
e Burrington, 1731; C. R., Vol. 3, p. 188.

Digitized by Google

A general post-office was established in New York in 1710 for the Continent, with several branches, including Charleston in Carolina. Act Parliament 1710, Queen Anne. *

In 1755 Gov. Dobbs in a message to the General Assembly called attention to the necessity of an "Established Post thro' this Province" and the necessity of correspondence with the neighboring Colonies, whereon James Davis, Printer, was employed for the sum of one hundred pounds, six shillings and eight pence Proclamation money for one year, "to convey all Publick Letters, Expresses and Dispatches relating to this Province to any part thereof, and every fifteen days send a messenger to Suffolk, in Virginia, and to Wilmington." a

In a message to the General Assembly in 1764 Gov. Dobbs states that a "Packet Boat" has been established from England to Charleston. He urges the establishment of a post "once a Fortnight to carry letters from Suffolk, in Virginia, thro' this Province at least to our Sounthern Boundary."

a C. R., Vol. 5, p. 516.

* NOTE.—"An Act for establishing a General Post Office for all Her Majesty's Dominions and for settling a weekly Sum out of the Revenues thereof, for the Service of the War, and other Her Majesty's occasions." Statutes at Large, Vol. 4, 1699-1713. (A. D., 1710), page 434.

* * *

"All letters and packets from London to New York in North America, and thence to London: Single, one shilling, Double (letters) two shillings, treble (letters) three shillings, Ounce four Shillings.

All letters and Packets from any Part of the West Indies, to New York aforesaid: Single four pence; Double eight pence, Treble one shilling, Ounce one shilling and four pence.

All letters and Packets from New York to any place within Sixty English Miles thereof, and thence back to New York: Single, four Pence, Double eight pence, treble one shilling. Ounce, one shilling and four Pence.

All letters and Packets from New York aforesaid, to Charlestown, the Chief town in North and South Carolina, and from Charlestown aforesaid to New York: Single, one shilling six Pence; Double, three Shillings; Treble four shillings six Pence; Ounce six shillings.

All letters and Packets from Charlestown aforesaid to any Place not exceeding one hundred English Miles, and thence back again: Single, six pence; Double, one shilling; Treble, one Shilling, six pence. Ounce two shillings."

Mail carriers were allowed immediate and free ferriage over the rivers and for delaying more than half an hour or charging, the ferryman was to forfeit and pay for every offence the sum of £5.

Digitized by Google

The General Assembly appropriated £133 6s. 8d. to be paid to the Postmaster if he establish this post. a

The distribution of mails was made from Williamsburg and Charleston. In a letter from Governor Tryon, Dec. 8, 1764, to Lord Hyde, Postmaster-General, he states that the Assembly voted £133 1-2 to establish a post from Williamsburg to Charleston "charging the customary postage on letters," by the following route:

From Williamsburg to Edenton.....	100 miles
From Edenton to Brunswick.....	200 miles
From Brunswick to Charleston.....	180 miles
	480 miles

(This included the towns of Bath, Newbern and Wilmington.)

The post had just been established from New York to Williamsburg. He also petitioned that his Majesty's packet be ordered to touch at Cape Fear River at Fort Johnston. He stated that dispatches sometimes laid six weeks at Charleston and occasionally months in Virginia before they were received. b Later Tryon recommended the following route to avoid the "broad ferries of Neuse River, Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds" from Suffolk. c

Route from Suffolk, in Virginia, to the Boundary House of North and South Carolina on the sea coast.

	Miles.
From Suffolk to Cotton's Ferry on Chowan River....	40
Appletree Ferry on the Roanoke.....	30
*Salters on Tar or Pamlico River.....	35
Kemps' Ferry on Neuse.....	28
Newbern	10
Trentbridge	13

a C. R., Vol. 6, pp. 1,291, 1,300.
b C. R., Vol. 6, p. 1,058.
c C. R., Vol. 7, p. 149.

Note.—Salters was afterwards Watkins' Ferry and is now Boyd's Ferry on Grimesland Plantation.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Warburtons	13
Sneads on New River ferry	26
Sage's	13
Collins'	14
Wilmington	15
Brunswick	15
The Ferry	2
To Bells'	20
The Boundary House	23
Total miles	297

Gov. Tryon used special messengers for carrying his dispatches.

It seems that the first post route actually established thro' North Carolina was in January, 1769, though it was carried but once a month. a

In 1770 the General Assembly passed "an Act to encourage and support the establishment of a Post-office within this Province." Of this act Martin says: "Davis says that this act was repealed by proclamation. I have no certificate of that; However, it was only to be in force for two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Assembly." *

One of the first acts of the Continental Congress was to establish a post-office with post routes from Falmouth, Me., to Savannah, Ga.

The large plantations were miniature republics, raising their own beef, pork, horses, corn, grain, tobacco, wool, cotton, tallow, myrtle-wax,  beeswax, etc., and catching fish in the nearby streams.

a C. R., Vol. 8, pp. 3, 4.

* NOTE.—I cannot find the manuscript law among the records in the Secretary of State's office. G.

 NOTE.—The myrtle-wax was mixed with tallow and used for making candles and is said to have emitted a delightful and fragrant perfume while burning.

Digitized by Google

Each planter had his own saw pit, carpenter and cooper and blacksmith shop, tannery, etc. He raised wool and cotton enough to clothe his people, carded, spun and wove his own cloth and made his own shoes.

In 1735 Brickell says "The Cloathings used by the Men are English Cloaths, Druggets, Durois, Green Linnen, etc. The women have their silks, Calicoes, Stamp-Linnen, Calimanchoes and all kind of Stuffs, some whereof are manufactured in the Province." a

In a few years after this "negro cloth" was made in considerable quantities and old inventories show us that almost every family had their spinning wheel, linen wheel, flax brake, hackles, looms, etc. Little cotton was exported. Only seven bags of two hundred and twenty-five pounds each being exported from Charleston in 1747, and none from any other province. b

In 1784 fifteen thousand nine hundred and seventy-five pounds (seventy-one bags two hundred and twenty-five pounds each), were shipped to England and seized on the ground that the United States could not produce so much.

---

a Page 38.
b Carr. Coll., Vol. 2, p. 234.

NOTE.—When Whitney invented the cotton gin in 1794 cotton growing was greatly enrouraged. He was paid $90,000 by the cotton-growing States (N. C. paying thirty thousand dollars, South Carolina fifty thousand dollars, and Georgia ten thousand dollars) that their planters could have the privilege of using his invention. The "Saw-Gin" was a circular saw revolving between iron ribs, tearing the lint from the seeds. One of these of ten saws can be now seen in the State Museum. A tax was laid by the State of 2s. 6d. per annum for each saw used.

In 1810 North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia and Virginia manufactured more than all of New England.

North Carolina manufactured	7,376,154 yards of cloth.
Virginia manufactured	3,007,255 yards of cloth.
South Carolina manufactured	3,083,188 yards of cloth.
Georgia manufactured	3,688,534 yards of cloth.

In 1810, at a military review in North Carolina where 1,500 persons were present, all but forty wore homespun.
J. L. Watkins, Dept. Ag. Year Book 1903.

Digitized by Google

Considerable linen cloth was made and the French colonists had introduced silk culture as well as wine-making.

From 1731 to 1755 there were 40756 lbs. of raw and "Wrought Silk" exported from North and South Carolina into Great Britain, and 38621 lbs. of mixed "Silken Stuffs" imported into North Carolina and South Carolina from Great Britain. a *

The gentry for themselves and wives generally imported their clothing and dressed in a similar style to people of their station in England. England discouraged manufacturing in the colonies in every way possible, and up to the Revolution the gentry and better classes imported their clothing, but when we separated from England we began to make everything we needed.

Nails were made in blacksmith shops on plantations; and all ironware, pewter, etc., were imported. By an act of Parliament, a a Carr. Coll., 272.

---

a Holmes' Annals, Vol. 2, p. 42.

* NOTE.—In connection with silk it may be interesting to quote a few lines from Coxe in his Caralana, p. 92. "Besides we have a grass, as they call Silk grass, which makes very pretty stuffs, such as come from the East Indies, which they call Herba Stuffs, whereof a garment was made for Queen Elizabeth, whose ingredient came from Sir Walter Raleigh's colony, by him called Virginia, now North Carolina, a part of this Province, which, to encourage colonies and plantations, she was pleased to wear for divers weeks."

Holmes' Annals, Vol. 1, p. 486.

Master Ralph Lane writing to Mr. Richard Hakluyt from the "new fort in Virginia" Sept. 3, 1585, mentions "several kinds of flax and one kind like silk, the same gathered as a grass as common there as grass here."

Hawks 1, p. 106.

Thomas Harriot in his narrative writes of "silk of grass or grass-silk. There is a kind of grass in the country upon the blades whereof there groweth very good silk in form of a thin glittering skin to be stript off."

Hawks 1, p. 154.

The Rev. Dr. Curtis, the Botanist, says the plants mentioned by Lane and Harriot are evidently the same thing. "We have a plant (chrysopsis graminifolia) in the pine woods, almost "as common as grass" and now known as silk weed, which answers well to the accounts of these writers, and which I have no doubt is the one intended by them."

Digitized by Google

the "Erection of any mill or other machine for slitting or rolling iron or any plating forge to work with a tilt hammer or any furnace for making steel" in any of the colonies was forbidden. *

The poorer planters at first used stone hand-mortars for pounding their grain tho' the better classes had hand-mills. These mills were of stones with about twenty inches or two feet face, and at first brought from England, though it was soon found that the calcareous rock on Neuse River b made admirable ones. This rock when first quarried was soft and easily shaped, but when exposed became hard and durable. These hand mills were worth five or six pounds. c

In 1710 DeGraffenreid said there was only one water mill in the province. As late as 1730 there were only two or three water mills in the province and no wind mills. d The Assembly of 1715 a to encourage mills passed an act permitting the condemnation by the Precinct Court of two acres for a water mill, and one-half acre for wind mill by any one engaging to erect a mill thereon within two years. If the owner of the land would obligate to build such mill himself, then the motion of the applicant for mill was denied.

---

b Brickell, 263.
c See Inventories.
d Brickell.
a Ch. 37.

*NOTE.—In 1731 Gov. Burrington states that there was an abundance of iron ore in North Carolina.

NOTE.—In 1775 at Hillsboro, the Provincial Congress made an effort to encourage manufactures. "Premiums were voted for the manufacture of saltpetre, gunpowder, cotton and woolen cards, pins, needles, linen and woolen cloth, and for the erection of rolling and slitting mills, furnaces for the manufacture of steel and iron, paper mills, salt works, and for refining sulphur." Lossing, Vol. 2, p. 582; see also C. R., Vol. 9, p. 1,185 and Vol. 10, pp. 216-219. Immediately manufactures sprung into existence.

Digitized by Google

In 1722 there were nine precincts in North Carolina, and an act of that year provided for the erection of court-houses at the following places:

For the Precinct of Chowan at Edenton;

For the Precinct of Perquimans at Jonathan Phelps Point at the Mouth of the Narrows;

For the Precinct of Currituck on the land of Mr. William Peyner next to the land of Mr. William Parker; or at Mr. Parker's, "as the justices shall appoint";

For the Precincts of Beaufort and Hyde at Bath town;

For the Precinct of Craven at New Bern;

For the Precinct of Carteret at Beaufort town;

For the Precinct of Bertie, now by this Assembly laid out at some convenient place at Ahotsky where the Justices shall appoint.

For the Precinct of Pasquotank at such place as the Justices shall appoint.

Hyde was afterwards separated from Beaufort a and biult a court-house of its own. In the next few years the following additional counties were erected. On the site of old Clarendon New Hanover (1728) was established. From New Hanover were formed Onslow (1734) and Bladen (1734) and Duplin (1749). From the territory of old Bath County was erected Edgecombe (1733) Johnston (1746) and Granville (1746). Beaufort, Hyde and Craven having been previously made therefrom. From Albemarle the Precincts of Pasquotank, Currituck, Perquimans, Chowan, Bertie and Tyrrell had been taken, and from it Northampton was also erected in 1741. All court-houses built in the various precincts were required by law to be at least 24 feet long and 16 feet wide. b

The "Precincts" were changed to "Counties" in 1738.

a 1729, Ch. 3.
b L. 1722, Ch. 8, Sec. 5.

Digitized by Google

In 1749 realizing that the colony was becoming too important to continue to have a migratory capital an act was passed fixing the seat of government at New Berne and appointing John Starkey, Edward Griffith and Jeremiah Vail Commissioners to erect necessary public buildings. At this time circuit courts were established; a commission appointed to revise and print the laws; the militia better regulated; a list of taxables arranged for; and £6000 appropriated for public schools. Direct trade had recently been opened from the Cape Fear to Europe, every ship brought high class immigrants, and a new era had dawned for the colony. All the roads and trails to North Carolina from South Carolina, Virginia and Pennsylvania were filled with the wagons of the home-seeker. The growth of North Carolina from this time forward for the next half-century was probably the most remarkable in the history of American Colonization.

The following extracts from a table in Holmes' Annals, Vol. 2, page 543, of exports to Great Britain and imports from Great Britain is most interesting:

Carolinas.

Exports to G. B.	£.	s.	d.	Imports from G. B. £.	s.	d.
1701.	16973	6	3	13908	8	3¾
1710.	20793	9	0	19613	18	11¾
1720.	62736	6	8	18290	12	11
1730.	151739	17	6	64785	11	5
1740.	266560	4	5	181821	14	11
1750.	191607	6	3	133037	0	9
1773.	456513	8	4	344859	9	1

Digitized by Google

New England.

Exports to G. B.	£.	s.	d.	Imports from G. B. £.	s.	d.
1701.	32656	7	2	86322	13	11¼
1710.	31112	17	7½	106338	6	4
1720.	49206	12	6	128767	2	11
1730.	54701	5	10	208196	5	5
1740.	72389	16	2	171081	2	5
1750.	48455	9	0	343659	6	8
1773.	124624	19	6	527055	15	10

In 1773 the exports from the Carolinas greatly exceeded the exports of Georgia, New York, New England and Pennsylvania. Virginia and Maryland alone exceeded us, and probably more than half the North Carolina exports were shipped from Virginia waters and classed as Virginia products.

Exports to G. B. 1773.	£.	s.	d.	Imports from G. B. £.	s.	d.
Carolina,	456.513	8	4	344.859	9	1
Georgia,	85.391	1	8	62.932	19	8
New England,	124.624	19	6	527.055	15	10
New York,	76.246	12	0	289.214	19	7
Pennsylvania	36.652	8	9	426.448	17	3
Va. and Md.,	589.803	14	5	328.904	15	8
	1369.232	4	8	1979.416	17	1

Digitized by Google

APPENDIX.

As illustrative of conditions in the Colonial period the following extracts from wills will prove interesting:

WILLS.

LIONEL READING, Bath County, July 12, 1708, probated February, 1725. Item. I give and bequeath to my well beloved Son Nathaniel Reading the said plantation after his mother's decease * * * and one feather Bed with Furniture, with a hand Mill. * * * The Same not to be paid out of his own Cattle wch are of a different mark from mine which by record appears. Item I give & bequeath to my Daughter Sarah * * * the youngest of my horses now running in the Woods * * * *."

THOMAS POLLOCK of Chowan County, 1721. Plantations aggregating about 55,000 acres of land. The names of some of them as follows: "Five hundred and sixty acres in the fork of Raquis called Springfield; * * * Five hundred acres of land lying on the South Side of Moratock River called Canecarora; * * * six hundred and forty acres of land * * * on Bridges Creek at Weekacanaan A tract of land containing Two thousand eight hundred acres Lyíng on Cassayah called Rose-field: * * * Nine hundred Acres of Land on Neuse River fork Called New-Bern. * * * Where Wilson lived at Weekacoon Creek: and where John Mainard lived at Pettishore also two thousand four hundred acres called Crany Island; * * * Seven Hundred and Ten acres Lying on the North side of Trent River Called Ye Halfe-Way House. * * * also six hundred and Forty acres on Nuse River Called Wilkeson's Point."

About eighty slaves were bequeathed the names of some of which are as follows: Scipio, Abraham, Diego, Mingo, Venus, Cæsar, Caramante Will, Sharper, London, Diana, Tomboy, Pompey.

Land on Salmon Creek is given to son Thomas "Reserving free liberty to my son George to make what Pitch and Tar he sees fitting on the same with his hands for the space of three or four years after My Death." Also, "as to ye crop on ye Ground and what Pitch and Tar ye hands in ye woods makes until ye first of Aprill Next shall be Equally divided, etc."

As to importations from and business dealings with New England: "I give and bequeath to my son Cullen one hundred pound to be paid in Boston and also five thousand foot of plank which I have sent for from Boston. * * * I give and bequeath unto my son George sixty pound to be paid in Boston."

Digitized by Google

"Also I give and bequeath unto my Son Thomas one Third Part of all the vessels clearances whether it be in money, bills to New England or elsewhere also I give and Bequeath to my Son Cullen six Pound to be paid him in the first goods from New England at first cost I owing him so much also I give and bequeath to my Son George twenty pound to be paid him in the first goods I have come in from Boston I oweing him so much." "New England plank" is mentioned two or three times in the will.

Codicil provides for building houses for sons of testator: "And whereas * * * I have Expended and Laid out for a house at Black Rock (when mr West the Carpentare is paid what is due to him for his worke ther) for my son Thomas Twoe hundred Pound and also Ten Pound more for New England plank. * * * And whereas also I have been out and expended upon a house for my son Cullen on the South Shore (when mr West the Carpentare is paid for what worke he hath done ther (to wit) the covering of the house doeing the Dormant Windoes and makeing upe the Gavell end of the Sd House and when Cullen hath what Glass is in the House that will answer his purposes and what nailes he shall have occasion for said House * * * In my accounting above in this codicill concerning Cullens House standing in Three Hundred Pound I made a mistake in not mentioning that mr Coke the Bricklayer wages for making Laying the Bricks in the chimneys Sellar Underpining and doeing all the other worke agreed for is part of the Three hundred Pound and is to be paid out of my personall estate. Also he is to have what lands are necessary for him for burning the Bricks or what other worke he hath occasion for to finish the worke he hath agreed for wherefore my will is that the Bricklayer aforesd be paid out of my personall estate befor Shared."

JOHN HECLEFIELD'S INVENTORY.
1721

* * * One Silver Tankard Weighing 1:lb, 1:Z 15:pw 16:gr Eight Good Spoons·Two Dram Cups one little Spoon One do broke One do large melted a Seal 9Z 3pw Total of the weight 1 lb 10Z 18p w16gr One Silver Hilted Sword one pair of Buckles not weighed four Diamond Rings two plain do. * * *

FREDERICK JONES 1722.

Chowan Precinct. * * * "I Give devise and bequeath unto my Eldest daughter Jane My Indian Girle named Nanny My Negro Woman named Dinah, together with her three Children and all the increase that shall be borne of any of them Her Mothers Diamond wedding ring and large pair of Diamond ear rings, Gold Watch with the Chain, Seal & other things fixed thereto; her Mothers Wearing

Digitized by Google

Apparell such as is already made up & such things as was designed for her but not made up, All her Mothers Child bede Linnen with white silk Damask Gown, All the China Ware and Tea furniture with the Dressing table and furniture, Also a Dozen of my finest Damask Napkins and Table Clothe a Dozen of fine Diaper Napkins & Table Clothe, One pair of my finest Holland sheets with Pillow Cases; and one other pair of Holland Sheets with Pillow Cases. Item I give devise and bequeath unto my Daughter Martha Four young negroes, two male and two female, not under ten years of age to be set apart from the rest of my Estate for the use of my said daughter together with the increase thereof; Also the smaller pair of Diamond Ear-rings, One Diamond Ring, her Mothers Gold Shoe Buckles thimble & Bodkin one Dozen of my finest damask Napkins and table clothe, one Dozen of fine Diaper Napkins & Table Clothe One pair of my finest holland Sheets & pillow Cases and one other pair of holland sheets with Pillow cases; Also the Sum of one hundred and fifty pounds Boston Money. Item I give devise and bequeath unto my daughter Rebeckah four young negroes two male & two female, not under ten years of Age to be set apart from the rest of my estate for the use of my said daughter together with the increase thereof, One Diamond Ring, One Dozen fine Damask Napkins and Table Clothe, One Dozen fine Diaper Napkins and Table Clothe, Two pair of fine holland Sheets and pillow cases. Also the Sum of Two hundred pounds Boston Money. * * * Item I give devise and bequeath unto my Eldest Son William Harding Jones, all my land on the South side of Moratoke River being part of a large tract of nine Thousand one hundred acres by me taken up. Also all my lands in Hyde precinct. * * * Item I Give devise and bequeath unto my Son Frederick Jones all my Lands in Craven precinct. * * * Item I Give Devise and bequeath unto my Son Thomas Jones all my Lands at or near Meherrin Creek in Chowan precinct, Also those Lands belonging to me on the North Side Moratoke River. * * * Item I give unto each of my Sons one Diamond Ring; Item I Give unto my three Sons to be equally divided among them all my Library of Books; Eycept those books commonly used by my wife, which I have ordered to be put into her closets which books I give unto my Daughter Jane. * * * Lands lying in King William County in Virginia commonly called Horns Quarter, * * * Item I Give unto my Loveing brother Ten pounds Sterling to buy a Suit of Mourning. * * * A Codicil to be annexed to the Will of Frederick Jones Esqr. I Give and bequeath unto my daughter Jane, My Wifes Side Saddle and furniture thereto belonging with the horse called Blaze. To my daughter Martha a Sett of Silver tea spoons double gilded. To my daughter Rebeckah two pair of filigreen gold Shift buckles and all the gold rings and Ear-rings. * * * To my good friend and Neighbour

Digitized by Google

Edward Moseley of Chowan precinct my pair of pistolls mounted with Silver caps etc. * * * with bridle Locks and stocked with English Walnut."

EMANUEL LOW. 1726 Pasquotank precinct. "* * * 3ly I give and bequeath unto my Grandson George Low Son of my beloved Son Nevil Low Dd and now in the kingdom of Great Britain the Plantation where my Cousin Robinson now Lives & the Plantation called New ABBey with four Hundred Acres of land adjoining to it to * * * also my Seal Scutcheon of arms. * * * Lands commonly called the Town point Lying on the mouth of the North West side of Newbegun Creek & now in the possession of Jno Conner. It is my Will that my daughter Anna Letitia her heirs or assigns shall keep in possession all ye before mentioned Legacies wth Lands &c &c &c &c."

WILLIAM HARDING JONES 1730.

"of ye eastern Parish of Chowan * * * do give * * * Ann Jones my wife * * * One certain piece or parcel of Land containing four thousand Acres on Ronoak river in Bertie Precinct it being that Trackt of Land out of wch I have sold three hundred to Ellis Hodges of the same precinct I also give to her during her natural Life the house and plantation whereon I now live with all & singular the rights, hereditaments appertenances & appendants whatsoever to the said piece or parcel of Land in anywise appertaining with all Cattle, hogs, horses, sheep belonging to the said plantation with one third part of the negroes I now possess, and also all my household goods belonging to the sd house Excepting the family pictures and Court of Arms. * * * likewise all my books in ye sd. house I give to my brothers Freddick and Thomas Jones * * * ."

JOHN BAPTISTA ASHE 1731.

"of Bath County in the province of North Carolina Gent. * * * Item. I give devise and bequeath unto my Son Samuel and unto my daughter Mary my Lands up the north west branch of Cape Fear River called Ashwood which are situate lying and being on the South side of said river between the lands of John Porter of Virginia Mercht, and the Plantation whereon Daniel Donahoe lately deceased dwelt, Together with my other lands on the north Side of the River directly opposite to those aforementioned to be equally * * * Item, I give, devise and bequeath * * * land on Stumpy Sound called Turkey Point * * * other tract called Stump Island. Four hundred acres of land * * * on the Main Branch of Old town creek. Item I will that my slaves be kept to work on my lands that my Estate may be managed to the best advantage so as my sons may have as liberal an education as the profits thereof will afford; and in their Education I pray my Exors to observe this method. Let them be taught to read and write and be introduced into the practical part of Arithmetick not too hastily hurrying them into Latin or Grammar but after they are pretty well versed in these let them be taught Latin & Greek. I propose this may be done in Virginia; After which let them learn French; perhaps some Frenchman at Santee wile undertake this; when they are arrived to years of discretion Let them study the Mathematicks. To my Sons when they arrive at age I recommend the pursuit & Study of Some profession or business (I wish one to ye Law, the other to Merchandize) In which let them follow their own inclinations. Item I will that my daughter be taught to write and read & some feminine accomplishments which may render her agreeable; And that she be not kept ignorant as to what appertains to a good house wife in the management of household affairs. Item I give to each of my Exors a Gold Ring a token of the respect which In my life I bore them Item I will that a Brick Vault may be built at Groveley and my Dear Wifes body taken up out of the Earth & brought and laid therein; and if it should be my fortune to die in Carolina so as my Corpse may be Conveyed thither I desire that one large Coffin may be made and both our body's laid together therein and lodged in the said Vault."

Digitized by Google

THOMAS POLLOCK 1732.

"of Bertie Precinct." Plantations called Black Rock, Great Quarter, Manuels or Crickits, Springfield, and lands lying on Salmon Creek & Chowan River, Trent River, Unaroye Meadows, "nigh of Tuskarora Indian Town," Moratuck River. Fishing Creek. Forty six negroes are bequeathed. "Item I will & Order & give by this will to all Such persons who are Setled on my lands at Trenton Condition of a Certain writng I give to Jacob Miller that those already settled there, have leases on ye same terms I promised them."

JOSHUA PORTER 1733.

Bath County. Plantations on Derhams Creek one known as Sand Hills. Negroes, Mustees and Indians are given to wife, and mourning rings to friends. "It is my further will and desire that my Son and Daughter may be Carefully learnt to read & write & Cypher & yt they be duly Educated * * * ."

RICHARD SANDERSON. 1733.

Perquimans precinct. "Ye island of Ocreecock," land on the Sandy Bank "by the name of Point Lookout"; "Mannor Plantation." One hundred and forty seven acres of land in Perquimans; lots in Roanoak Town devised to son Richard. The brigantine "Sea

Digitized by Google

Flower" and sloop "Swallow" are given to son and son in law. Thirteen negro and one Indian slave bequeathed.

FRANCIS PUGH. 1733

Bertie precinct. Provides for "bringing up my children at School Plantation at Emperor's Fields bought of Christian Hitteburch. "Whereas, * * * I have begun to build a brigantine which is now in the Stocks in Bertie precinct * * * finish and Compleat the said Brigantine with Anchors Masts Cables Sails &c."

"Item it is my will and pleasure that after the said Vessel is finished my executors & my Trustees herein named do * * * purchase a Loading of Tobacco black Wallnut or other merchandise fitt for the British market and that they do send the said Vessel to great Britain from thence to return to No. Carolina, * * * ."

"Item It is my will and pleasure that after my Sloop Carolina returns from New England that my Executors & Trustee do * * * purchase a cargo and send the said Sloop to the West Indies * * * ."

"Item It is my will that my dear wife & Execrs do receive from Captn Grainger the Cargo brought in a Schooner into this province which belongs to Mr. Coleman provided the said Grainger allows to my Execrs twelve pounds pr Barrel for good & well pickled pork vizt for so much as is produced from my own stock * * * ."

THOMAS SWANN 1733

Pasquotank precinct. Two plantations are conveyed to sons Samuel and William with the provision that if either shall sell or convey his part "out of the name of ye Swanns" the other shall enter and take possession. Provision is made for "ye Christian education of my Children." Horse, bridle and saddle is given to each of two sons.

EDWARD SALTER. 1734.

Bath County. Plantation on Pamplico river "called in the patent Mount Calvert; six hundred and forty acres of land on Bear creek. About twenty negro slaves bequeathed. To daughter Sarah is bequeathed forty three cattle and horses, one hundred pounds "of the said Province bills or their value"; Madam Sarah Porter is mentioned as having care and tuition of daughter. To three children is given "my largest periauger with anchors and sails." "Item I bequeath unto my son in law John Harvey Ten pounds in order to purchase him a good Beaver Hat and a pair of gloves. * * * Item I bequeath unto my beloved son Edward Salter my best Saddle and bridle and one pair of Silver Spurs and Richard Bloom's history of the Holy Bible together with all the books that I shall own at my Death (be they Divinity, History or Mathematical) * * * also my large China Punch Bowl. * * * My will is that my Brigantine now on the stocks at John Smiths be got finished and made fit for the Sea as soon as may be * * * be loaden with tar * * * (for Boston). * * * My will further is that my Executors may write two or three ways * * * to Collo. Jacob Windall and Company to Insure the sum of Twelve Hundred pounds (Boston Money) upon the said Brigantine * * * ." Money arising from the sale of the brigantine to be "remitted in youngeable slaves (none to exceed the age of twenty years)." Provision is made for education of children and for Edward "a thorough education to make him a compleat merchant."

Digitized by Google

EDWARD BRYAN. 1745.

To sons John, Edward & William is given land purchased of Martin Frank called "New Germany"; lots (3) in Newbern town with a store house on one of them; plantation on the west side of Swifts Creek called Paradice. Sixteen negro slaves bequeathed. Large number of cattle and horses bequeathed—five riding horses. Provision is made for Seven years schooling for children the schooling to be given them at some time between the ages of seven and seventeen years.

EDWARD MOSELEY. 1745.

New Hanover County. Plantation at Rockey Point containing 3500 acres; Plantation in Chowan County containing 2000 acres; plantation on the North East branch of Cape Fear River containing 3500 acres lying between Holly Shelter Creek and the "bald white Sand hills"; plantation opposite Rockey Point plantation containing 1650 acres; 1280 acres at Rockfish Creek; 600 acres on the East Side of the North West branch of Cape Fear River; lot and houses in Brunswick; plantation below Brunswick called Macknights; lot & house in Wilmington; 600 acres of land opposite Cabbage Inlet; 500 acres in Tyrrell called Coopers; 450 acres in Tyrrell called Whitemarsh; lands on East side Cape Fear River; plantation at the Sound where "there is a large vineyard Planted; 3200 acres in Edgecombe called Alden of the hill; 1650 acres on West side of Neuse River "about twenty four miles above New Bern town; 10,000 acres in Edgecombe County called Clur; aggregating about 35,000 acres. 88 slaves bequeathed. "Item I give and bequeath to my Loving wife Anne my New Chaise Harness and the Pair of Bay horses Smoker and Toby. * * * I also give unto her out of my stocks ten cows & ten calves ten steers of Different ages & Twenty sheep and the horse Spark.

* * * It is my will that the slaves usually kept about the house shall be kept in the same employment for my Wifes easier life and care of my children untill she marries. * * * Item. I give unto my six children all my Stock of horses Mares neat cattle sheep and swine to run & increase for ther benefit and I will that proper slaves be appointed for managing thereof of which increase & profit made thereby of such as are necessary to be sold or killed at proper seasons Accot to be rendered to the County Court for my children advantage without charges deducting first thereout what may be necessary for such kind of provision for housekeeping for my said wife and children. Item It is my will that the profits arising from the labour of my two sons slaves & their part of the profits arising by the stocks be laid out in purchasing young female slaves to be added to their stocks of slaves. * * * Item. When it shall be necessary to give all or any of my sons other Education than is to be had from the Common Masters in this Province for I would have my children well educated it is then my will &c &c &c.

Digitized by Google

Item. I recommend it to my dear and loving wife that one of my sons as shall be Thought best qualified for it be bred to the Law it being highly necessary in so large a Family and to him I give all my Law books being upwards of 200 Volumes. * * * Item. I give to my dear wife Blomes History of the Bible in folio, three volumes in folio of Archbishop Tillotsons works, four Volumes in Octavo of Dr. Stanhopes on the Epistles & Gospels and all the books of Physick. Item I give to my daughter Ann Humfries 3 volumes in folio on the Old & New Testament and I will that my Exors buy for her the work of the author of the Whole Duty of Man I give to the eldest of my sons that shall not study the law Chambers Dictionary two Volumes in folio Locks Works three volumes in folio Millers Dictionary two volumes in folio and LeBlond on Gardening in Quarto: and the rest of my books about 150 volumes. * * * Item I give * * * my large Silver Tea Kettle, Lamp & Server for it to stand on weighing in all about 170 ounces * * * my Large Silver Coffee Pot * * * my Large Silver Tea Pot * * * my Large Silver Tankard * * * a pair of large Square Silver Servers, my cases of knifes, forks, spoons, Salts, Casters & Other my Plate to be * * *

CULLEN POLLOCK. 1749.

Tyrrell County Gen. Plantation at Matchapungo River in Hide County, lott of land in Bath town; 710 acres of land on a branch of Trent River called "the halfe way House"; 1280 acres lying on Coneto Creek in Tyrrell County called the "deaded Woods"; 640 acres in Bertie County on "ye Roonaroy Meadows"; 4700 acres in Bertie County; aggregating about 8000 acres. 78 negroes. "Item It is my will and desire that my three daughters have as good Education as can be had in this Province & that my two sons when they have got what learning they can have in this province that they be sent to Boston for further education * * * ."

Digitized by Google

ROGER MOORE 1750.

New Hanover County, Parish of St. Phillips, 1750. Plantations called Kendall, Maultby's Point, Mount Misery; Orton Lands lying on Island opposite Black River. 2500 acres where Mill stands, 640 acres at Rockey Point, 55.000 acres in the Neck known as Mount Misery, 3025 acres in Saxpahaw Old Fields, 5000 acres near Eno Old Fields, and 20,000 acres mentioned in latter part of will, aggregating about 100,000 acres; 250 slaves mentioned. To each of daughters is bequeathed eighteen hundred pounds. Testator mentions saw mill "I entend to build on Brice's Creek."

"It is my will that each of my daughters Mary and Anne doe at their marriage take each their choyce of any One of the House slaves, except the Negro wench Bess who I leave to her liberty to make choyce of any one of my children for her Master or Mistress."

GABRIEL JOHNSTON 1751.

Plantations called Possum Quarter, Conahoe; 1000 acres on Cypress Creek, 980 acres on South side of Trent, 400 acres on the head of Trent and New Rivers, 7000 acres on Deep River in Bladen Co., "all the small islands lying in Roanoke River and in the neighbourhood of Mount Gallard, land on Salmon Creek in Bertie County." * * * my said Wife shall have the use of all my said Daughters plantations and for her Encouragement to Cultivate & Improve these Plantations especially in Raising Silk. * * * And I earnestly request my Dearest wife to be a kind tender mother to my Dear little girl and to bring her up in the Fear of God and under a deep sense of her being always in his presence, and in Sobriety and moderation Confining her Desires to things plain and neat and Elegant and not aspiring after the Gayety Splendor and Extravagances and especially to take Care to keep within the bounds of her income and by no Means to Run in Debt. * * * It I give and bequeath to Henry Johnston now at school in Newhaven in the Colony of Connecticut. * * * My Books I leave to William Cathcart Esqr. after my Wife and Brother have choose out them any Number not Exceeding forty each. It To my sister Elizabeth Smear of the County of Fife North Britain my large Repeating Gold Watch after it has been put in order at the Expence of my estate."

JOHN BLOUNT 1753.

Chowan County. One plantation. " * * * I give and bequeath * * * Three negroes, viz; Sharper, Finn & Tom, with all my brewing kettles, tubs and Fxts and all my brewing works and my writing Desk * * * My desire is that my Chaise, Boat, Blacksmith's tools, watch and other tools or anything else that is likely to perish be sold * * * Item. I give and bequeath to my brother Charles Blount my best Broad Cloth Suit of Clothes my best Beaver Hatt & Wigg. My will is that none of the timber should be cut or Sold excepting for the use of the plantation and that no Stranger shall be admitted to live on any part of the Back Land to destroy the Timber, and that no Person shall on any consideration whatsoever be admitted to live on any part of my Land Excepting an Overseer. * * * that no other negroes shall be permitted to work on my plantation excepting they are the property of my wife and children.

Digitized by Google

And my will is that all the money that shall arise out of my Estate * * * should be laid out to purchase likely young negroes at the Discretion of my Executors for the use and Benefit of my children." Provision is made for the education of the children in "a Christian like manner."

SAMUEL SWANN 1753.

Perquimans County. 450 acres of land "where I now dwell" and "Allegator land." "I give to my Daughter Mary Claton my pickle case and Bottles. Item I do hereby give to my brother John Vail my Silver Seal and Stock Buckle."

JAMES INNES. 1754.

"In the name of God, Amen. I James Innes of Cape Fear in North Carolina in America Coll of the Regiment of sd. Province Raised for His Majesty's immediate service and Commander in Chief of this Expedition to the Ohio against the French & there Indians whoe have most unjustly Invaided & fortified themselves on His Majesty's lands—Being now readdey to Enter upon Action * * * I recomend the paying of all my Just and Lawfull Debts instantly, or when demanded. I direct a remittance may be made to Edinburgh, Sufficient to pay for a Church Bell for the Parish Church of Cannesby, in Caithness agreeable to my Letter to mr. Jams Broadee Minister there.

I also appoint and direct that there may be a furder remittance made of One hundred Pounds Sterll: for the use of the Poor of said Parish of Cannesby & the said Summ of One hundred Pounds to be put at interest for the use of the poor of Said Parish as formerly directed by me.

I also give and bequeath att the Death of my Loving Wife Jean Innes my Plantation called Point Pleasant & the Opposite Mash Land over the River for which there is a Separate Patent, Two negro young Women, One Negroe Young man and there Increase all the Stock of Cattle and Hogs, halfe the Stock of Horses belonging att the time to that Plantation With all my Books & One hundred Pounds Sterling or the Equivalent thereunto in the currency of the Country For the use of a Free School for the Benefite of the Youth of North Carolina. And to see that this part of my will is dewly executed att the time, I appoint the Colonell of the New Hanover Regiment, the Parson of Willmington Church & the Vestrey for the time being, or the majority of them as they Shall from time to time be Choised or Appointed."

Digitized by Google

SARAH ALLEN, 1761.

Legacies: Wedding ring to Niece ("as a particular mark of my affection and a memento of my Conjugal happiness, not doubting hers is equal and may it be as lasting." Gold watch, gold chain mourning ring, Silver chased tea kettle, cream pot, lamp. "Walnut tree fineered Tea chest containing three pieces of plate chased as the tea kettle"; Silver waiters, dozen tea spoons and strainer in black Shagreen case; Silver Sauce pan, mahogany dressing table, gilt smelling bottle; "books of modern taste."

ELIZABETH SCOLLAY 1766.

Bertie County. " * * * I Give and Devise unto my son Culeln Pollock all my Books, also a mouning ring." Several negroes are bequeathed to different relatives. " * * * I give and devise * * * my still with the appurtenances * * * ."

WILLIAM HERRITAGE. 1769.

Craven County. Plantations called Springfield, Jemmys Neck, Harrow, Atkins Banks, Fort Barnwell; lands in Johnson County, lots Nos. 21, 22, 191 and 84 in the town of Newbern. About seventy five negro slaves bequeathed the names of some of which are as follows: Pompey, Venus, Phillis, Balaam, Cæsar, London, Big Rose, Big Bess, Mercury, Tortola, Cado, Tamer, Judy, Jupiter, Sabina, Peter ("a cooper").

Digitized by Google

NORTH CAROLINA POETS: BONER, STOCKARD, AND McNEILL.

BY HIGHT C. MOORE.

"The Poetical Literature of North Carolina" is the theme of a somewhat extended study by Mr. Moore, embodying a general introduction, a review of the work by the half dozen foremost native poets (Fuller, Hill and Mrs. Clarke being the earlier), a briefer critical mention of others who have wrought worthily, an estimate of North State verse in the mass, a collection of about twenty-five of the best Carolina carols, and the fullest available bibliography including more than sixty volumes. The BOOKLET is permitted herewith to publish the paragraphs relating to the three most distinguished of our later native poets: Boner, not long deceased; Stockard now in the midst of his usefulness and at the height of his fame; and McNeill who (let us hope) is just at the threshold of a brilliant career.

JOHN HENRY BONER.

The work of Mr. Boner, more than that of any other native poet, breathes the air of the old North State. "Whispering Pines" he named his first volume and it is pervaded by the odor of Carolina fields and woodland. The Yadkin river is in one poem "golden," in another "gentle," and it inspires "The Lone Cool Nook." "Saddle Bags of Gold" are safe under the roof of the pious mountaineer. "The Light'ood Fire" is "old Carolina's own." The scene of his one long poem, "The Recluse of Appalachia," is laid among our western peaks. "Hatteras" and "The Cliff" (Pilot Mountain) are themes of worthy verse. From the busy crowded city he comes back to his Salem birthplace and weeps over its desolation. The Graveyard there "where thick dark cedars grow" he sings as "the most restful spot I know." And in "City Bells" the inspiration and climax are found in the poet's native town:

Digitized by Google

One simple spire points to the skies
Above the leafy trees. I hear
The old Moravian bell ring clear,
But see no more—tears fill my eyes.

Strong local attachment and fervent patriotism were so evidently the marks of the poet that even when kindling his first fire in Cricket Lodge, his Staten Island home, he reverts to old scenes:

Rather had I hewn my beam
By old Yadkin's gentle stream—
Rather there on wintry days
Felt the cheery lightwood blaze,
Heard the cawing of the crow
And the wild geese honking go—
Rather there the summer long
Melon, fig, and scuppernong
Seen and tasted—rather there
Felt the ever balmy air;
But not thus the stern fates would.
Be it so—and God is good.

The reverence and resignation of the poet are notable characteristics shining in his verse.

No being knows
What life would be without consuming pains
But He who shapes the beauty of the rose
And sheds its leaves, is Wisdom—and He reigns.

In "Lodge or Mansion" he disclaims "heaven-offending pride" and says:

I earn my bread, nor feel the labor sore;
Have little but no spite for who has more.

In "Unrest" he tells of the perfect rest

Of energy subservient to God's will.

Digitized by Google

That this conception and attainment were not marks of a passive nature but of one chastened and disciplined is manifest; for while in earlier days he could say "I brood not on my pangs" he adds:

> Yet have done so—O have arrayed
> Hot curses 'gainst the ruling stars,
> Then compassed, foiled, and forced, have frayed
> My very life against the bars.

In "Our American God, Hustle" (a title, by the way, which does not strike one as being quite worthy of its elevated lines) the poet after saying "the crime of haste is man's" goes on to voice a personal yearning after the Infinite:

> God of our nobler fathers, I adore Thee!
> Too late I live to dedicate my ways
> To Thee divinely, and I can restore Thee
> Only a starving soul, but that with praise
> That I have set no other god before Thee
> And have despised the Moloch of my days.

In "Immortality" and "The Way of Blessedness" we have probably his best distinctively religious pieces. The theology of his poetry admits the feeling that departed loved ones are near us and conscious of our acts; the craving of human benediction after death has done its work; and almost the belief in animal immortality, as in the sonnet on his dog "Jack" whom he called "the little Scot, dear as a child." He pictures "the pitiful agony" of the inebriate who knows "the anguish of desire bereft of will," and anathematizes "the treacherous imp that lurks in alcohol." And "a simple faith in Jesus Christ" he proclaims as > a faith which hath sufficed

> Men mourning in a land of woe.

Some of the saddest notes in Carolina verse were struck by Mr. Boner, but they are interfused with the spirit of faith and hope. "We Walked Among the Whispering Pines" is one of the most touching memorials of a dead love. The sweet romances of early life are unforgotten, but bygone loves do not reappear:

Digitized by Google

> We parted like the sparkling streams
> That from the forest laughing spring
>
> And never, never meet again,
> And nevermore flow clear and free,
> And leave at last the tranquil plain
> To mingle with the unpeaceful sea.

The verses on "A Dead Poet" close with the melancholy lines:

> His was the saddest fate—to love and lose;
> And then, most pitiful, to strive for fame
> And die with finger-tips against the wreath.

Out of an aching heart came "Broken and Desolate"—a poem marking the decay of the poet's birthplace:

> All sadly altered—home no more.

Who has not had the feeling so beautifully expressed in the opening stanzas of "A Prayerful Trust?"

> The thought will sometimes come to me—
> Where will I die, and in what way,
> In gloom of night or light of day,
> When will the solemn moment be?
>
> Will any one a vigil keep,
> Will I from the ordeal shrink
> Or calmly in the dark sea sink;
> Will any grieve—will any weep?

When, broken in health, the poet was driven to retirement he sought the shrine of Solitude in his pathetic "Song at Evening":

Digitized by Google

> And slowly he comes that went springing,
> And dolefully he that went singing,
> No laurel leaf holding, and bringing
> No hope but to die.

In the removal of the poet's remains from Washington City where he died to the old Graveyard at Salem was fulfilled the wish expressed years before:

> Where'er it be my fate to die,
> Beneath those trees in whose dark shade
> The first loved of my life are laid
> I want to lie.

But Mr. Boner wrote also in lighter vein. See the sunshine of youth in "Hunting Muscadines"; glimpse the lovesick in "Sweet Little Fool"; mark "the romping game of life bucolic" in "A Boy in the Piney Woods"; note the rollicking glee which pervades "The Wanderer Back Home"; and hear the swinging lines in "Crismus Times is Come," which Mr. Stockard declares to be "the whole negro race at a touch."

The wealth of imagination marking Mr. Boner's work may be illustrated by some random phrases. Broadway he calls "Niagara of streets"; the snow-covered earth he styles "a marble world"; home is described as "mothernook"; he addresses the ocean as "Thou visible eternity, O Sea"! He has seen "magnolia's creamy bloom," "the sun-fed roses," "moon-silvered leaves," "the pine trees weep great drops of dew," and "the land enmeshed and ablaze with vines." He has felt "the pain of pleasure," and "the sweet strength of a tear"; has kept "sharp curses in unspoken sheath." By his swift keel "dancing Zephyr strews foam-flowers upon the waters." Above him "the morning star like a torch-light glowed," and around him "the meadow grasses fed the air," and "the field flowers wake from their swoon." And delicious to him was the music shower

Digitized by Google

That fell from orient pipes in luminous rain
Upon our spirits.

In a few of Mr. Boner's poems there is a deficiency of climax. For instance, the closing line of the otherwise beautiful sonnet on "The Return of the Crickets" is But pshaw! I'd never learn to play your fiddle.

And the capital verses on "Solitude" close with the prosy exhortation:

When for true loneliness your soul entreats
Come to New York and walk these crowded streets.

The couplet concluding "Winter Breakfast by Candlelight" is hardly more inspiring:

And who would find his Java appetizing
Let him the aroma get by candlelight.

And yet that Homer was in these lines simply nodding is shown in the fine climax to "America," synonym of liberty—"that name which, rising with a luminous flush, gleamed rocket-like

Rifting the night with white and crimson bars,
And, poising heavenward, blossomed into stars.

To Mr. Boner we are indebted for many charming bits of description. Take the opening lines of "An Evening in Early Spring":

A settled rain is making in from sea;
A slate-blue drifting mist has blurred the white
Of apple blossoms and the dogwood's light,
And mezzotinted every greening tree.

Digitized by Google

Something of a similar scene re-appears in "Easter Lilies":

Winter is gone, and yet in sunless places
Snow-wraiths of Christmas lurked till yesterday—
Pale stragglers from that pageant far away.
Down cloudy ways one wind another chases,
Whistling mad ditties in averted faces.
Blue lakes of sky to beaches pearly gray
Run brightly, dimpling, where flotillas gay
With silken sails leave foam in flying traces.

Vivid is the vision of the "Moonrise in the Pines":

far through the trees I see
The rim of a globe of fire
That rolls through the darkness to me.

It is in the "Time of Drought" that

The tender flowers, like pious hearts,
When tortured by scorn's ireful darts,
Fold their mute leaves, accept the doom,
And die in their own sweet perfume.

And "The Moon-Loved Land" is in the South

Where the clear moon kisses with large cool mouth
The land she loves.

"There's a Lone Cool Nook" which is sung in notes of soothing melody and charm:

At night when the sky is full of stars
When shadowy birds flit down the shore,
And the water-snake glides to the sandy bars,
You may touch the waves with a noiseless oar
Till you float far out in the shining stream,
Where winds from the corn-land freshly blow,
And there you may gently drift and dream
With stars above you and stars below—
Drifting, drifting, may dream and rest
On the peaceful river's cool, sweet breast.

Digitized by Google

Passing elegant passages from such poems as "Sparrows in the Snow," "Christmas Eve in the Country," and "Song of the Old Mill Wheel" we may quote in full the less known but exquisite martial sonnet of nature, entitled "The Old Guard":

Summer is routed from her rosy plains.
  The splendid queen with colors flying fled
  Far to the south, leaving her legions dead
Upon the fields all in the dismal rains.
The minstrels of her camp most plaintive strains
  Piped as they flew; then vandal armies spread
  About the hills their tattered tents of red
And gold and purple, and their gaudy trains
Usurped the valleys, firing as they went,
  Till halted by a cordon of grim pines
    That would not yield or furl their banners green.
Wounded they fought and moaned, though well-nigh spent.
  With blood-drops trickling down their chevron vines
    They fought and stood—the Old Guard of their queen.

With Mr. Boner's masterpiece our review of his verse may culminate and close. The poet himself regarded "Poe's Cottage at Fordham" as his best piece of work—an opinion in which his critics generally concur, Mr. Stockard, for example, referring to its "matchless stanzas." In it are happily combined insight, melody, finish and force. It is a poem worthy of the theme and one that will live. Read it, and you see Mr. Boner at his best:

Here lived the soul enchanted
  By melody of song;
Here dwelt the spirit haunted
  By a demoniac throng;
Here sang the lips elated;
Here grief and death were sated;
Here loved and here unmated
  Was he, so frail, so strong.

Digitized by Google

Here wintry winds and cheerless
  The dying firelight blew
While he whose song was peerless
  Dreamed the drear midnight through,
And from dull embers chilling
Crept shadows darkly filling
The silent place, and thrilling
  His fancy as they grew.

Here, with brow bared to heaven,
  In starry night he stood,
With the lost star of seven
  Feeling sad brotherhood.
Here in the sobbing showers
Of dark autumnal hours
He heard suspected powers
  Shriek through the stormy wood.

From visions of Apollo
  And of Astarte's bliss,
He gazed into the hollow
  And hopeless vale of Dis;
And though earth were surrounded
By heaven, it still was mounded
With graves. His soul had sounded
  The dolorous abyss.

Proud, mad, but not defiant,
  He touched at heaven and hell.
Fate found a rare soul pliant
  And rung her changes well.
Alternately his lyre,
Stranded with strings of fire,
Led earth's most happy choir
  Or flashed with Israfel.

No singer of old story
  Luting accustomed lays,
No harper for new glory,
  No mendicant for praise,
He struck high chords and splendid,
Wherein were fiercely blended
Tones that unfinished ended
  With his unfinished days.

Digitized by Google

Here through this lowly portal,
Made sacred by his name,
Unheralded immortal
The mortal went and came.
And fate that then denied him,
And envy that decried him,
And malice that belied him,
Have cenotaphed his fame.

HENRY JEROME STOCKARD.

For years our most distinguished native resident poet Mr. Stockard has really been the uncrowned laureate of North Carolina. He has been frequently called upon for Christmas, Independence Day, Thanksgiving, Easter and other special verse. The centennial celebration at the State University was adorned by an excellent sonnet which he recited to three thousand people. "Sir Walter Raleigh" was written for and read before the State Literary and Historical Association. Composed for the occasion, "The Man With the Hoe" was presented at the laying of the corner stone of the Agricultural Building of the North Carolina College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts. At the unveiling of the Appomattox monument (April, 1905), marking the spot on which was fired by North Carolina troops the last volley of the war, the poem of the day was given by Mr. Stockard and, in keeping with his other work, it was in every way worthy of the great occasion.

A loyal son of the old North State Mr. Stockard has occasionally attuned his lyre to patriotic song. His descriptive work has quite distinctly a Carolina setting and two of his themes are "On Hatteras Bar" and "In the Light House at Point Lookout." "The Spirit of Vance" commemorates the illustrious commoner whose statue adorns the Capitol Square. In "Sir Walter Raleigh" he sings of

Digitized by Google

This splendid land to sunward laid,
With opulent fields and many a winding stream
And virgin wood; with stores of gems and veins
Of richest ore; with mills and thronging marts,
The domain of the freest of the free.

And in the same poem he continues:

What though no sage may read the riddle dark
Of Croatan, diffused through marsh and waste
And solitude? Their valor did not die,
But is incorporate in our civic life.
They were of those who fought at Bannockburn;
Their vital spirits spake at Mecklenburg;
They rose at Alamance, at Bethel led,
And steered at Cardenas straight through blinding shells.

Sincere and merited are the lines "To a One-Armed Confederate" closing with the tribute:

A more unfading chaplet thou should'st wear
Than e'er the bravest Gaul or Spartan wore.

Similar patriotic sentiment abounds in "The Pines," "Washington," "The Southern Dead," and "Over their Graves," but the acme of Mr. Stockard's poetry in this field is reached in the stirring and immortal lyric "The Last Charge at Appomattox":

Scarred on a hundred fields before,
Naked and starved and travel-sore,
Each man a tiger, hunted,
They stood at bay as brave as Huns,
Last of the Old South's splendid sons,
Flanked by ten thousand shotted guns,
And by ten thousand fronted.

Scorched by the cannon's molten breath,
They'd climbed the trembling walls of death
And set their standards tattered—
Had charged at the bugle's stirring blare
Through bolted gloom and godless glare
From the dead's reddened gulches, where
The searching shrapnel shattered.

Digitized by Google

They formed—that Carolina band—
With Grimes, the Spartan, in command,
And, at the word of Gordon,
Through splintered fire and stifling smoke—
They struck with lightning's scathing stroke
Those doomed and desperate men—and broke
Across that iron cordon.

They turned in sullen, slow retreat—
Ah, there are laurels of defeat!—
Turned for the Chief had spoken;
With one last shot hurled back the foe,
And prayed the trump of doom to blow,
Now that the Southern stars were low,
The Southern bars were broken.

Sometime the calm, impatrial years
Will tell what made them dead to tears
Of loved ones left to languish;—
What nerved them for the lonely guard,
For cleaving blade and mangling shard,—
What gave them strength in tent and ward
To drain the dregs of anguish.

But the far ages will propound
What never Sphinx had lore to sound,—
Why, in such fires of rancor,
The God of Love should find it meet
For Him, with Grant as sledge, to beat
On Lee, the anvil, at such heat,
Our Nation's great sheet-anchor.

The voices of Nature have smitten upon no more sympathetic ear than that of Mr. Stockard.

"Knee deep! Knee deep!" I am a child again.

and every reader is transported with the poet to the bright never-to-be-forgotten days of rosy youth. "The Song of the Whippoorwill"—what hearer of it does not join in the sentiment:

It wakens in my soul such memories tender
Of childhood's far-receding land of dreams!
Down lilied meads I stray in the evening's splendor
By willowed, wimpling streams.

Digitized by Google

And as we pass up and down the poet's pages we find these vivid Nature etchings recurring again and again. We see "night-hawks fall from lambent skies," "the owl flit forth on fluffy wings," "the bastioned clouds adown the westering day," "the sunset's ember," "the scabbard of the dark," the "starry archipelagoes," and "space's sea." He paints for us "the purling stream," the "fabled amaranthine vales," "the ermined pine-trees" of winter, "the pool's wind-chiseled grooves," "the chinquapins that blink jet-black from the burs." Through him we hear "the killdee's plaintive cry," the "clear flutings" of "the herald whippoorwills"; also "the frogs wake many a rolling drum," and "the ocean pounds with sledges fell." One afternoon "across the sky the loitering Wind drives his cloud-flocks to the west"; at twilight, "the firefly strikes its spectral spark"; and at evening

> The full moon wavers on the hills
> And, loosening, swims into the deep!

Among Mr. Stockard's poems there are several voicing the deeper spiritual needs and heart-longings; and we find them as chaste and charming as they are refined and spiritual. "The Prayer of Life" may be cited as one of the finest poems of its kind to be found anywhere:

> Lead me, O God; in life's brave early day,
> While skies are clear and all the world is gay;
> So many hurtful blooms my vision greet!
> So many paths diverge to lure my feet
> Far from Thy peaceful, sinless road astray!
>
> And when the morning can no longer stay,
> And songs are mute, and noontide's fervent ray
> Upon the weary track must fiercely beat,
> Lead me, O God!
>
> Nor leave me when the eventide shall lay
> Upon life's happy fields its vapors gray:—
> Clasp then my hand in thine more close and sweet
> Than thou hast ever held it; and, while fleet
> The night is falling, down the unknown way
> Lead me, O God!

Digitized by Google

Verses elegiac are rare in Mr. Stockard's work thus far. Sweet and tender are the lines entitled "Baby Margaret," as evinced in the following stanza:

> For, though word was never thine
> Little Margaret,
> Still with syllables divine
> Out of great eternity
> You are calling, calling me,
> Baby Margaret.

The great author of "Crossing the Bar" was perhaps memorialized in no finer tribute than that by Mr. Stockard on "The Dead Laureate." Recall the last of its three stanzas:

> Nor cried the Wind, nor made the Sea its moan
> Upon the harbor bar,
> As out he drifted to the great Unknown,
> So far away—so far!

To some and at first reading Mr. Stockard's work appears to have a melancholy tone. A more thorough study, however, will probably reveal the fact that it is serious without being dolorous. Thus in one sonnet which contains the lines:

> When bloom and song and life seem far away,— > Lost in some sweet, sad unreturning May the poet is passing on to the brighter side when > these somber hills and fields inane

> Resume the radiance of an earlier day;
> And mirth revives as when at morning's gray
> The waking bird takes up its silenced strain!

In another sonnet we have a lament upon the dearth of summer's foliage and it strikes a vibrant chord in most natures:

> Although beyond this gloom and dearth, you say
> The spring will come with flower and bird and bee,
> And all these scenes forlorn again be glad,
> My soul keeps sighing this dark autumn day,
> The summer too must follow, and ah me!
> Once more the fall with empty fields and sad!

Digitized by Google

Yet compare with this "An Autumn Song" which is as merry in sentiment as it is melodious in expression. The spirit and sparkle of it may be caught in two stanzas:

> But hail to the fall, and hail!
> To her hills of flame and gold,
> Her starlit nights, her frost that whites
> At morning mead and wold!
>
> No threne for the vanished spring
> And the summer's faded blee,
> But a song of praise for the autumn days,
> And a harvest-home for me!

In "A Winter Song" the lilt of joy abounds though sometimes saddening storms are rife:

> I love the rattling hail
> And the snowflakes tempest-sown,
> The woods in mail that creak in the gale,
> And the night wind's baritone.

The fact is, Mr. Stockard's poetry is cheerful and upward-looking. In "The Unattained" there is comfort for every aspirant. "The Past" is not a lament but an assurance:

> O ye that pine for the vanished years, as pined
> Odysseus for one glimpse of Hellas more;
> That toward them lean, as toward their fading shore
> Poor exiles unto earth's far ends consigned—
> Lean to reclaim some echo which, confined,
> Bird-like shall sing in memory's mournful door,—
> Know this: life's earlier land lies on before—
> Not over widening seasons far behind!
> And we shall find it in the great To-be.
> It lapses not away, as to our eyes
> Doth seem, but swiftly and forever nears!
> As brave Magellan who sailed the uncharted sea,
> Full circling earth, saw his home shores arise,
> So shall we come again on our lost, happy years!

Digitized by Google

No less inspiring than insistent is the message of the sonnet on "The Soul":

> Uplift thine earth-bent eyes, O man, and learn
> The lore writ by the stars that whiten space;
> There onward and forever lies thy race.
> Orion and old Arcturus blaze for thee;
> For thee heaven's deepest sunken sun doth burn—
> Behold thy mansions built from all eternity!

The reach of Mr. Stockard's imagination may be illustrated in "The Closing Century" where he declares that a century "is but a vanished hour tolled on the deep" and that time itself "is but a swing of the vast pendulum of eternity." And "Imagination" with all its power and achievement will never explore

> The date of Him before whose veiled face
> The Universe with its eternity
> Is but a mote a moment poised in space!

The range and richness of the poet's culture appear in such poems as "My Library," "Some Verses Carol," and "After Reading a Treasury of Sonnets." A ripe acquaintance with the ancient scenes and sages is manifest; as in the climax and closing line of the sonnet on "Homer" there lies before the seer

> The unveiled shore of old sea-cinctured Greece.

As to the best individual piece of Mr. Stockard's writings there will be difference of opinion, but certainly in his superb lines on "The Eagle" he takes a flight poetic far into the upper air—we wonder not that Mr. Boner almost tumbled out of his sick-bed in admiration of it:

> Brooded on crags, his down the rocks,
> He holds the skies for his domain;
> Serene, he preens where thunder shocks,
> And rides the hurricane.

Digitized by Google

The scream of shells is in his shriek;
As swords, his wings whiz down the air;
His claws, as bayonets, gride; his beak,
As shrapnel-shards, doth tear.

Where Shasta shapes its mighty cone,
Where Mitchell heaves into the skies,
Silent he glares, austere, alone,
With sun-outstaring eyes.

In volume Mr. Stockard's work is not extensive; he does not write every day nor on everything nor at great length. In fact, he apparently writes only a few poems a year; his themes are never trivial; and the longest of his poems barely covers three pages, the bulk of his work, piece by piece, appearing on one with ample margins. In all his published poems there is not a humorous line nor a scrap of dialect; all is elevated and serious. His thoughts are clothed in a variety of poetic forms, the sonnet in particular being handled with unusual skill. His vocabulary is remarkably rich; the reader is all the while coming upon felicitous phrases and picturesque, unfamiliar words. As a whole his work is marked by freshness and vigor of thought, by finish, strength, and symmetry. A genuine poet he is worthy of the tribute embodied in a recent sonnet to him:

Pure as a maiden's heart thy word, thy thought.
Serene amid the clash of traffic's wars
Thou standest with face upturned toward the gleaming stars.
Poet we name thee.

Digitized by Google

JOHN CHARLES McNEILL.

Mr. McNeill, more than any other of our poets, writes dialect fluently and frequently. He thoroughly understands the negro, presents him in vivid sketches, and quite truly interprets his customs and character. For example, "A Tar Heel" sings:

> Oh I gits my strength fum white side meat,
> I sops all the sorghum a nigger kin eat.

And another rejoices in "Supp'n Strength'nin' ":

> Good buttermilk hung in de spring whar hit's cool
> Is de stuff fer de nigger wut follers a mule.
> He kin feel hit er creepin' along es whole len'th
> Er he'pin es spirrits en givin' 'im stren'th,
> T'well he make de dirt fly fum de turnin' plow whing,
> When he's full er cool buttermilk jis fum de spring.

"A Protest" pictures the sentiment of the colored agriculturalist pessimistically inclined:

> De cawn is drapped en civered
> Fer de crow to grabble out
> De shoat gits in de tater bed
> Befo' dey 'gins to sprout.
>
> De hen hatch out her chickens
> Whiles de hawk bees lookin' on > En fo' de cherries ripens good
> De birds is gut 'em gone.

The pickaninnies, the inevitable dogs, and the long winter-neglected bath are sketched in the four lines on "Spring":

> Leave yo' clothes at home, chillen,
> Call ol' Tige and Rover.
> We'se gwine to de swimmin' hole
> To wash ourse'ves all over!

Digitized by Google

The prettiest, purest, and most polished of Mr. McNeill's love songs is "Oh Ask Me Not." It is lofty throughout and its closing stanza touches the warmest heart-chords struck by a Carolinian. The author considers it his best production thus far. The poem in full is as follows:

Love, should I set my heart upon a crown,
  Squander my years and gain it,
What recompense of pleasure could I own
  For youth's red drops that stain it?

Much have I thought on what our life may mean,
  And what its best endeavour;
Seeing we may not come again to glean,
  But, losing, lose forever.

Seeing how zealots, making choice of pain,
  From home and country parted,
Have thought it life to leave their fellows slain,
  Their women broken-hearted;

How teasing truth a thousand faces claims.
  As in a broken mirror,
And what a father died for in the flames
  His own son scorns as error;

How even they whose hearts were sweet with song
  Must quaff oblivion's portion,
And soon or late their sails be lost along
  The all-surrounding ocean.

Oh, ask me not the haven of our ships,
  Nor what flag floats above you!
I hold you close, I kiss your sweet, sweet lips,
  And love you, love you, love you!

The more serious side of life is sketched here and there. Take the opening lines of "Oblivion":

Green moss will creep
Upon the shady graves where we shall sleep.

Each year will bring
Another brood of birds to nest and sing.

At dawn will go
New ploughmen to the fields we used to know.

Dusk will call home
The hunter from the hills we loved to roam.

Digitized by Google

In the realm of the tragic and the pathetic Mr. McNeill has done some excellent work. "The Drudge" is a fine illustration of his power in this direction, but we should say it does not surpass two of the stanzas "To Melvin Gardner: Suicide":

To have seen the sun come back, to have seen
  Children again at play,
To have heard the thrush where the woods are green
  Welcome the new-born day,
To have felt the soft grass cool to the feet,
To have smelt earth's incense, heavenly sweet,
To have shared the laughter along the street,
  And, then, to have died in May!

A thousand roses will blossom red,
  A thousand hearts be gay,
For the summer lingers just ahead
  And June is on her way;
The bee must bestir him to fill his cells,
The moon and the stars will weave new spells
Of love and the music of marriage bells—
  And, oh, to be dead in May!

In "Away Down Home" the aroma of devotion makes fragrant every line. For example:

When dogwood blossoms mingle
  With the maple's modest red,
And sweet arbutus wakes at last
  From out her fragrant bed,
'Twould not seem strange at all to meet
  A dryad or a gnome
A Pan or Psyche in the woods
  Away down home.

"September" and "October" afford choice glimpses of Nature, but no finer lines have come from Mr. McNeill's pen than the two brief stanzas entitled "Sundown." They show most strikingly how the sublime stirs a sympathetic and reverential spirit; and we believe they will take their place among the future treasures of our English tongue:

Digitized by Google

Hills, wrapped in gray, standing along the west;
Clouds, dimly lighted, gathering slowly;
The star of peace at watch above the crest—
Oh, holy, holy, holy!

We know, O Lord, so little what is best;
Wingless we move so lowly;
But in thy calm all-knowledge let us rest—
Oh, holy, holy, holy!

Lightness of touch, smoothness and melody, occasional classic flavor, themes of human interest, freshness and sweetness of sentiment, are among the leading traits of his work. A young man not far in his twenties, Mr. McNeill has already won a high place among our poets and with further maturity of thought, breadth of experience, and continued poetical practice and polish, he gives promise of being one of the great verse-writers of our time and country.

Digitized by Google

Genealogical Department.

NORTH CAROLINA
Society Daughters of the Revolution.

YOUR NORTH CAROLINA ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED.

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, records of the different counties, family papers and State histories will be readily examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced. Their ancestors must have resided in the State of North Carolina during the Revolutionary and Colonial periods.

Fee for such researches, $5.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE (HOOPER) WILLS,
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS OF ARMS EMBLAZONED AT REASONABLE RATES.

PICTURES OF OLD HOMES AND PORTRAITS SECURED IF OBTAINABLE.

For Coats of Arms, etc., address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

RALEIGH, N. C.
W. S. SHERMAN, PRINTER
1905

Digitized by Google

SOME BOOKLETS FOR SALE.

VOL. I.

"Coloniel New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kenneday.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.
"Pettigrew's Charge at Gettysburg," Capt. Samuel Aycourt Ashe.

VOL. II.

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Maravian Settlements in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs, and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congress." Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Historic Homes" Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays, Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"Historic Homes, The Groves, Cape Fear, Wakefield," Burgwyn, Waddell, Haywood.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

VOL. III.

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Cherokee Indians," Major W. W. Stringfield.
"Volunteer State Tennesse as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?," Mrs. L. A. Mc Corkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. S. C. Noble.

VOL. IV.

"Lord's Proprietors of N. C.," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Battle Ramsaur's Mill 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham,
"Quaker Meadows." Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788." Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence," John Penn and Joseph Hewes, by T. M. Pittman, of Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America." W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.
"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C." Judge James C. McRae.
"The Scotch Irish Settlement,
William Hooper, "the Signer," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

Vol. I. 25, cents; Vols. 2, 3 and 4, 15 cents each.
EDITORS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Digitized by Google

MECHANICS AND INVESTORS UNION

JOHN C. DREWERY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

A HOME INVESTMENT COMPANY FOR MONTHLY SAVINGS.

A HOME LOAN COMPANY,

To Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money.
It promotes Economy, Thrift and Punctuality in Business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 Will Mature a $100.00 Certificate.
One Hundred Payments Will Secure a Home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, SECRETARY, 22 Pullen Building.

...ALLEN'S FORTY LESSONS IN BOOK-KEEPING...

Over 7,000 copies have been used in Schools and Colleges Commended by Teachers and Business Men. PRICE $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, RALEIGH.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery.

Aside from a Large Line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc.. we will take care of Your Orders for

RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

All Orders given our Personal Attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.,
RALEIGH, N. C.

ESTABLISHED IN 1891.

The Commercial and Farmers Bank,

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, - - - - - - -	$100,000.00
Surplus, - - - - - - - -	60,000.00
Deposits, - - - - - - - -	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian. Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent. Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSOM, Asst. Cashier.

Digitized by Google

THE

NEWS AND OBSERVER,

RALEIGH, N. C.

PUBLISHED AT THE CAPITAL CITY.
IT REACHES THE WHOLE STATE.

Largest Circulation in North Carolina.
The State's Representative Newspaper.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Editor.

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION.

1894,	1,800	Subscribers	1900,	5,700	Subscribers
1895,	2,400	"	1901,	6,500	"
1896,	3,100	"	1902,	7,054	"
1897,	4,200	"	1903,	8,201	"
1898,	4,880	"	1904,	9,111	"
1899,	5,200	"	1905,	10,000	"

Digitized by Google

NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY LAWS OF 1903.

MEMBERS:

W. J. PEELE, CHAIRMAN,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNER, SECRETARY,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER,.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT,.....ROPER, N. C.

The Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners.

The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in thier efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary

Digitized by Google

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

Capital Stock, $30,000

¶A personal investigation will convince anyone that Kinn's is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing. Reference: Every bank and leading business concern in Raleigh or Charlotte. College Journal and Special Offers Free.

We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand or Penmanship by mail.

Address, KING'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,
Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

50,000 OLD BOOKS FOR SALE!

Plates, Prints, Stamps, Coin and Old Mahogany Furniture. 1,000 Titles on North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia History and the South. Send for list. Mention your duplicate for exchange. We want all North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia Laws, Journals, Documents and Histories.

BOOK EXCHANGE,

RALEIGH, N. C., —AND— RICHMOND, VA.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

The Wonderful Headache and Neuralgia Remedy

25c. and 50c. a Bottle

AT ALL DRUG STORES

Digitized by Google

Draughon's Practical Business Colleges

RALEIGH, N. C.
COLUMBIA, S. C.
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NASHVILLE, TENN.
FT. WORTH, TEX.

CATALOGUE FREE

Address, J. F. DRAUGHON, Pres.

POSITION $50 per month GUARANTEED or money REFUNDED, or you may pay tuition out of salary after graduating. No vacation. Enter any time. In THOROUGHNESS and REPUTATION D. P. B. C.'s are to other Business Colleges what Harvard University is to Academies. 7,000 students annually. Indorsed by business men from Maine to California. Cheap board.

HOME STUDY—Contract given to REFUND money, if, after taking our Home Study BY MAIL, you are not satisfied. WRITE FOR PRICES.

Digitized by Google

Yarborough House

RALEIGH, N. C.

Caters Only to the Appreciative

Digitized by Google

VOL. V. JANUARY, 1906 No. 3

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY

BY

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS:

	PAGE
CORNELIUS HARNETT: THE PRIDE OF THE CAPE FEAR By R. D. W. Connor	171
EDWARD MOSELEY: CHARACTER SKETCH By D. H. Hill	202
CELEBRATION OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF MAY 20, 1775 By W. A. Graham (ILLUSTRATED)	211

SINGLE NUMBERS 30 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Digitized by Google

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

VOL. V.

Genesis of Wake County.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations.
Richard Dillard, M. D.

North Carolina Signers of the National Declaration of Independence: Part II., William Hooper.
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

North Carolina at King's Mountain.
Social Conditions in Eastern Carolina in Colonial Times.
Hon. J. Bryan Grimes.

North Carolina Poets.
Rev. Hight C. Moore.

The History of the Capitol.
Col. Charles Earl Johnson.

Cornelius Harnett.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Edward Moseley.
Prof. D. H. HILL.

Governor Jesse Franklin.
Mr. S. Porter Graves.

Governor Thomas Pollock.
Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

Battle of Cowan's Ford.
Maj. William A. Graham.

THE BOOKLET will be issued by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning May, 1905. Price, $1.00 per year. Parties who wish to renew their subscription to THE BOOKLET for Vol. V., are requested to notify at once.

Address MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, N. C.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

Digitized by Google

VOL. V. JANUARY, 1906 No. 3

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

"CAROLINA! CAROLINA! HEAVEN'S BLESSINGS ATTEND HER!
WHILE WE LIVE WE WILL CHERISH, PROTECT AND DEFEND HER."

PUBLISHED BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

Digitized by Google

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1903-1905:

REGENT:

MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

VICE-REGENT:

MRS WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENTS:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER,

(Nee Hooper),

MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

SECRETARY:

MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

TREASURER:

MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:

MRS. ED. CHAMBERS SMITH.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:

MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

Digitized by Google

"HILTON," THE HOME OF CORNELIUS HARNETT.

Digitized by Google

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. V. JANUARY, 1906. No. 3.

CORNELIUS HARNETT: THE PRIDE OF THE CAPE FEAR.

BY R. D. W. CONNOR,
Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission

The life and character of Cornelius Harnett have been the subject of eulogy from the pen of every student of his career. Bancroft praises his "disinterested zeal" in the public cause. Richard Frothingham says: "Harnett was the foremost actor in the movement for independence." McRee mentions him as "the representative man of the Cape Fear." Archibald Maclaine Hooper, whose name betrays his parentage, says that Harnett was "the favorite of the Cape Fear and the idol of the town of Wilmington." "He was incomparably the first man of the Cape Fear country," writes another, "and second to none in the state." Mr. George Davis calls him "the pride of the Cape Fear * * * the life-breathing spirit among the people." Governor Swain wrote that "no true North Carolinian will read his public letters without increased respect and affection for the state and without very high admiration of the courage which sustained the writer in the darkest days of the revolution, and the lofty and disinterested patriotism exhibited throughout the whole course of his legislative career."

These expressions of eulogy are justified not only by his public and private services to the state, but also by the confidence and admiration in which he was held by his friends, and the fear and hatred expressed for him by the enemies of his country. The former manifested their confidence and regard in every possible way. They elected him to almost every post of honor they had to bestow; they followed him in the perilous path of civil war and revolution; they accepted his guidance in the overthrow of one form of government and the establishment of another; and never once did they waver in their support. Josiah Quincy, Jr., of Massachusetts, at a time when that colony was dominated by the genius of Samuel Adams, wrote in his diary that Harnett was "the Samuel Adams of North Carolina." Nor were the enemies of American independence unmindful of his worth and influence. Governor Martin marked him down as one of the four men in the colony who "by their unremitting labours to promote sedition and rebellion" placed themselves "foremost among the patrons of revolt and anarchy." Sir Henry Clinton, too, sought to destroy him by excepting Cornelius Harnett, together with Robert Howe, from his proclamation of pardon in May, 1776.

Digitized by Google

Cornelius Harnett was born April 20, 1723. The place of his birth is in doubt. There seems to be no evidence in support of McRee's statement that he was born "in the land of Sydney and Hampden." His father, a Cornelius Harnett also, had been living in Chowan county, North Carolina, at least a year before the birth of his son. His mother, Mary Holt, was a North Carolina woman. It seems clear therefore that he was born in this province, and probably in Chowan county, where his father resided at the time of the birth of his son. In June, 1726, the elder Harnett bought from Colonel Maurice Moore two lots within the town of Brunswick. One of the conditions of the sale was that he should build on them "good habitable houses" within eight months. The conditions were fulfilled and Harnett became a resident of Brunswick. The younger Harnett therefore had the good fortune of growing up with the Cape Fear settlement, becoming early in life identified with the interests of its people.

Digitized by Google

The original settlement of the Cape Fear was made at Brunswick, but shortly after the Harnetts became residents of the town, a new town was begun farther up the river at a more favorable location. From that time the growth of Wilmington was accompanied by the decline of Brunswick. Cornelius Harnett early became identified with the interests of the former. The earliest mention we have of him is a record of the purchase of 300 acres of land in New Hanover county, May 21, 1741. I think this probably marks the date of his removal to Wilmington, but of this there is no certainty. But he was certainly living in Wilmington in 1750. On April 7 of that year he was appointed by Governor Johnston to his first public office—justice of the peace for New Hanover county. A few months later, August 14, he was elected a commissioner for the town, and during the period from 1750 to 1771 he served in that capacity eleven years, though not continuously. The duties of a commissioner in a frontier village, containing at the most only a few hundred inhabitants, appear to be insignificant, if not trifling; yet this was no mean training school for the greater duties that awaited Harnett in the broad fields to which he was shortly to be called. It was in the faithful discharge of these minor duties that he displayed his capacity for the greater ones, and won his way into the hearts of his people.

Harnett's first call to this larger work came in 1754. In the spring of 1753, Lewis Henry DeRosset, member of the colonial assembly from Wilmington, resigned his seat to become a member of the governor's council. Harnett was elected to succeed him, and took his seat February 19, 1754, at a special session held in Wilmington. Twelve other assemblies were elected in North Carolina under the authority of the royal governor, in every one of which Cornelius Harnett was the member from Wilmington. His legislative career covered a period of twenty-seven years, embracing service in the colonial assembly, in the provincial congresses, and in the continental congress.

Digitized by Google

nial assembly, in the provincial congresses, and in the continental congress.

His career in the assembly historically falls into two parts. The first covers the period between the years 1754 and 1765; the second that between the years 1765 and 1775. One embraced the administration of Governor Dobbs and the war with France for the possession of the continent, closing with the coming of William Tryon and the stamp act. The other was ushered in by the stamp act and witnessed the gathering of the storm which broke into revolution in 1775.

The first of these periods may be dismissed with a few words. The work in which Harnett and his associates were engaged, while not without interest and value, was of secondary importance to that which followed. It consisted largely in efforts to curb the governor's demands for money within such limits as the wealth of the colony justified. The province was willing to contribute her full quota to the general cause, and greatly burdened herself in doing so; but there was no limit beyond which the governor was unwilling to go. There were a few sharp encounters between the assembly and the council, the former resenting the attempts of the latter to amend appropriation bills; the latter indignant that the house should treat it with such scant respect. There was a long and unprofitable fight, too, over the court law; the assembly insisting upon keeping the courts independent of the crown; the governor resenting the efforts as encroachments upon the prerogative of the king. The assembly and the governor also found a subject of dispute in the king's instruction to the latter to consider fifteen members of the former a quorum; the assembly refusing, greatly to the indignation of his excellency, to recognize less than a majority of their number. An affair which brought on a three-cornered fight in which the governor, the council, and the assembly all took different grounds, was the appointment of a colonial agent to represent the interests of the province before the various boards in England. The governor objected to any agent at all; the council insisted upon its right to a voice in his appointment; the assembly was determined both to have an agent and to exercise the sole right of electing him. Aside from these disputes and bickerings the work of the assembly was concerned largely with matters relating to internal improvements, matters in which Cornelius Harnett actively interested himself. To write an account of his services during these years would be to write the history of the assembly for that decade. There were few committees of any importance on which he did not serve; few debates in which he did not take a leading part. He was one of the leaders of the leaders.

Digitized by Google

But the chief value of this work lay in its being preparatory to the more strenuous work that the next two decades were to bring. Harnett received during these years valuable training in the art of debate, in the tactics and strategy of parliamentary warfare, in the theories and principles underlying the British constitution.

Of no less importance to Harnett than this training, was the broadening of his circle of associates and friends through his services in the legislature. Here he came in contact with the master-spirits of the province; and here he learned to appreciate and estimate the characters and abilities of those with whom he was to fight the battles of the future. When he entered the assembly he found it dominated by such leaders as Samuel Swann, John Starkey, and John Campbell. Among those who were to be his associates in the coming struggles there were John Ashe, the splendid cavalier of the Cape Fear; Richard Caswell probably the most versatile man in the province; John Harvey, the sturdy and uncompromising leader of the popular party; the soldierly Robert Howe, who was to share with Harnett the honor of being excepted from the general amnesty of May 1776; Samuel Johnston, learned in the law and leader of the anti-republican forces in the province; Edenton's accomplished merchant-statesman,

Digitized by Google

Joseph Hewes, signer of the Declaration of Independence; Alexander Lillington, who was to dispute with Caswell the glory of Moore's Creek Bridge; William Hooper, distinguished in the continental congress for his eloquence. It was in their preliminary fights for self-government during the decade from 1754 to 1765 that these men learned to know and to trust each other.

On Thursday, March 28, 1765, Governor Dobbs died. He was succeeded by William Tryon. Tryon's first asembly met at New Bern, May 3, 1765. The session was a short one. After the adjournment Saturday afternoon, May 18, Governor Tryon asked Speaker Ashe what course the assembly would pursue in regard to the stamp act. Promptly came the bold reply: "We will fight it to the death." Tryon prudently prorogued the session.

But the people did not wait for the assembly to act. The attempt to enforce the stamp act on the banks of the Cape Fear produced a resistance that Tryon was unable to cope with. Lord Bute was burned in effigy; the stamp agent, William Houston, was forced to resign; Andrew Stewart, editor of the Cape Fear Gazette, was compelled to print his paper without affixing the stamp; the people of Wilmington refused to supply the king's ships with provisions because Captain Lobb of his majesty's cruiser Viper seized two vessels which came into port without stamps on their clearance papers; they threw into jail the sailors sent ashore from the Viper to purchase supplies, and kept them there until Captain Lobb came to terms.

When he seized the two vessels, Dobbs and Patience, Captain Lobb referred the matter to William Dry, collector of the port of Brunswick, demanding that he prosecute their captains. Dry consulted the attorney-general, asking if the seizures were legal; if judgment ought to be given against the defendants in spite of the fact that they could not obtain stamps at the ports from which they sailed; and if the case should be tried in the admiralty court in Halifax, N. S., instead of at Brunswick. To all of these questions the attorney-general replied in the affirmative. This was a signal for another explosion. During Saturday afternoon of February, 1766, a letter signed by Cornelius Harnett and a number of other prominent citizens of Wilmington, was handed to Dry warning him that the people would not permit the Dobbs and Patience to be carried out of the Cape Fear river without their papers properly signed. Dry thereupon consulted the governor who advised him to place the papers on board the Viper. This he neglected to do, and three days later his desk was broken open and the papers taken out.

Digitized by Google

In the forenoon of February 19, George Moore and Cornelius Harnett delivered to the governor a letter warning him that a mob was about to march to Brunswick to obtain redress of grievances. The mob had gathered at Wilmington and practically compelled Harnett and one or two others to lead them. These leaders thereupon offered the governor a guard to protect him from insult. Of course he refused it. About 300 armed men then proceeded to Brunswick to enforce their demands.

Among the objects which this crowd had in view, was to force the resignation of Mr. Pennington, the king's comptroller, and an active supporter of the stamp act. Pennington sought refuge in Tryon's house. But this did not deter the mob. With their number now swelled to about 500 men, they surrounded the house and sent a delegation of sixty men, led by Harnett, to bring Pennington out. Harnett alone entered the governor's house. Tryon was determined to protect the comptroller, but much to his disgust Pennington became frightened and offered his resignation. Harnett then returned to his friends acompanied by the ex-comptroller. The mob took him to the town where they compelled, not only Pennington, but also William Dry, and the clerks of the court, and all other public officers to take an oath not to sell any stamps in North Carolina. They then dispersed without doing any damage to property or person. The most remarkable features of these events were the absolute openness of the resistance, and the orderliness of the crowd. The work was done by men on terms of familiar intercourse with the governor, under his very nose, and in the broad open day-light, without disguising themselves as Indians, or otherwise. They carried their point on every issue, but offered neither insult nor injury to anybody.

Digitized by Google

While these things were happening the commissioners of Wilmington manifested their approval of Harnett's course by unanimously electing him to represent the town in the next assembly. But the assembly was not to meet any time soon. The wily politician who held the reigns of government was too wise to convene the assembly while the people were in such a rebellious mood. He wished to prevent the election of delegates to the stamp act congress, which was to meet in New York some time in October. It was not until November, therefore, after the repeal of the obnoxious act and after the meeting of the congress, that Tryon ventured to face the representatives of the people. He opened the session with a conciliatory message. But the members were not in the best of tempers. They were angry at the governor's delay in calling them together, and wished to let him know it. Harnett was a member of the committee to reply to his message. Tryon was severely taken to task for his action, but he could afford to smile at the assembly's wrath, for in his first contest with the people, he had broken even with them.

Among the governors of North Carolina there have been few abler ones than William Tryon. Courtly, versatile, politic, clear-minded, full of resources, he knew the secret of winning the favor of men. Within less than two years after the stamp act riots he had so ingratiated himself with the men of Eastern Carolina that he received their almost undivided support when he marched against the Regulators.

Digitized by Google

Even Cornelius Harnett was not only in hearty sympathy with Tryon's course, but accompanied him on his Alamance campaign and contributed largely from his private means to the support of the provincial troops. When the first assembly met after the battle of Alamance, the house entered this record upon its journal: "This house taking into considera- that the account of Mr. Cornelius Harnett in the late expedition against the insurgents and fully convinced of the great service rendered his country by his zeal and activity therein.

"Resolved, That he be allowed one hundred pounds to defray the extraordinary expenses he was at in that service."

When this resolution was sent to the council for concurrence, that house replied as follows: "This house has observed with pleasure the attention which you have shown to the merit and good service of Mr. Harnett on the late expedition against the insurgents." The request was then made that for similar service, a similar allowance be made to Samuel Cornell, member of the council. To this the assembly replied: "This house cannot agree to the allowance proposed to be made to Hon. Samuel Cornell, Esq., though thoroughly convinced of his merit and activity in the late expedition. The allowance to Mr. Harnett was made, not only because his services entitle him to the notice of this house, but in consideration of his not having been in any office or employment from which he could possibly derive any compensation for the great expense he was at in that expedition."

Soon after his victory at Alamance Governor Tryon left North Carolina. He was succeeded by Josiah Martin who arrived in the province in August, 1771. Martin was a common-place man, servilely obsequious to those in authority; tyrannically over-bearing to those under authority. No worse selection could have been made by the king at this time; the people of North Carolina were in no mood to brook the petty tyranny of a provincial governor. It is not strange therefore that the poor old province was in a continual turmoil from the time that Josiah Martin took the oath of office until an outraged people took the law into their own hands and drove him forever from their shores.

Digitized by Google

Martin's failure, however, was not due altogether to his own fault. As Colonel Saunders says: "Governor Martin was unfortunate in the time at which he assumed office in North Carolina; indeed it may be said, that his administration was a sort of general legatee of the ill consequences of all the bad blood and bad government of his predecessors' administrations. And then, too, the harvest of a century and more of seed time was about ripe." Among the legacies left him by his immediate predecessor there were three that were especially difficult to handle. They were: the debt left by the Regulator troubles; the boundary line dispute with South Carolina; and the court-law difficulties. The first of these was settled without much dispute; the second was disposed of by the assembly's absolutely refusing to obey the king's commands; the third was a source of trouble for years to come and was never settled until there were no more royal governors and kings to interfere.

The dispute over the court-law arose over the attachment clause. British merchants carried on business in North Carolina through agents, never once setting foot here themselves. In course of time many of them came to be large land owners here. In order to secure debts owed by these merchants to North Carolinians, the assembly in the Tryon court-law, inserted a clause impowering the colonial courts to attach this property to secure those debts. The British merchants objected to this, but the act was not repealed by the king because he expected, when a new law was enacted to have this clause omitted without interfering with the sessions of the courts. Accordingly he instructed Martin not to pass any act including the attachment clause. The dispute began in the assembly of 1773. The committee to prepare the superior court bill was composed of Caswell of Dobbs, Starkey of Onslow, Hooper of Campellton, MacKnight of Currituck, Montford of Halifax, Martin of Guilford, Harnett of Wilmington, Howe of Brunswick, and Lane of Wake. Cornelius Harnett was chairman of the committee to prepare the inferior court bill. Some of the other members of this committee were Howe, Ashe, Hooper, Thomas Person and Allen Jones. The committees at first reported two separate bills, but as it appeared likely the inferior court bill would be rejected by the council because it extended the jurisdiction of that court, another committee was appointed to join the two into one bill that they might stand or fall together. This committee was composed of Robert Howe, William Hooper, Alexander Martin, Samuel Johnston and Cornelius Harnett. The final bill as reported by them contained in full the attachment clause. The governor informed the assembly that he would not consent to it. A motion was then made to continue the Tryon court law. But this, too, contained the objectionable clause. The governor would not agree to break through his instruction; the assembly was stubborn and would not recede from its position.

Digitized by Google

Both sides maintained their positions with ability. The governor, bound by his instruction, urged the assembly to leave out the clause and look to the British statute for protection by attachment proceedings. To this the assembly replied that in England proceeding by attachment existed by municipal custom and not by any act of parliament. To leave the remedy out of their law and look to parliamentary statutes for it, was to lose the security altogether. "To secure a privilege so important," said this interesting document, "the mode of obtaining it should be grounded in certainty, the law positive and express and nothing left for the exercise of doubt or discretion." But it was all useless; they were compelled to fall back on their original bill, and to this the governor consented only when the assembly added a clause suspending its operation until the king's pleasure could be learned. The assembly then spread upon the journal a resolution declaring the justice of their demand and instructing the colonial agent in London to use his full powers in getting the king's consent. He was instructed to say to the king that so important did the people regard this point they would rather be without courts altogether than to lose this protection. But the king refused; the fight continued through several sessions; neither side would yield and several sessions of the assembly went to wreck on this reef. It was useless, however, for the governor to dissolve the assembly and appeal to the people; it was but an appeal from the teachers to the taught. To send the former back to their constituents was but to send them to gather fresh endorsements and to receive renewed support in the fight they were waging. In every stage of the contest the people upheld their representatives, and North Carolina was without courts as long as she remained under royal rule. The governor attempted to create courts by the exercise of the king's prerogative, but the people refused to honor their decrees and the assmbly declined to vote funds for their maintenance. The governor was thoroughly beaten because the people made anarchy tolerable.

Digitized by Google

The condition of the province and the growing breach between the governor and the assembly, made it imperative that the leaders should not rest in idleness during the recesses between the sessions. They had much information to gather, much to dispense; many lessons to learn, many to teach; numerous plans to conceive, numerous ones to execute. By this time Harnett had become before all other men the leader of the Cape Fear; to him the people looked for guidance in political affairs. It had now become apparent to all thoughtful men that the time had come when it was necessary to devise some scheme for united action among the various colonies. A common oppression had driven them to a common resistance. We are prepared therefore to find foresighted men laying plans to meet this necessity. In March of 1773 Josiah Quincy, Jr., of Massachusetts, visited the Cape Fear section. He left an interesting account of this visit. The night of March 30, he spent at the home of Cornelius Harnett, whom he calls the Samuel Adams of North Carolina, "except in point of fortune." Robert Howe was also present. They spent the evening in discussing the plan of continental correspondence promulgated by Virginia and Massachusetts. Quincy says that the plan was "highly relished, much wished for, and resolved upon as proper to be pursued."

Digitized by Google

The next session of the assembly began December 4, at New Bern. Soon after the opening of the session Mr. Speaker Harvey laid before the house a number of letters and resolutions received from the assemblies of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Virginia, Connecticut and Delaware. These were resolutions passed by those assemblies in response to the suggestion made by Virginia, that each province appoint a committee of correspondence to keep in communication with similar committees in other provinces concerning matters of general interest. The proposition met with cordial approval in the North Carolina assembly. A committee composed of Samuel Johnston, Robert Howe and Cornelius Harnett, was appointed to draw up a reply. After adopting this committee's report the house resolved that a committee of nine persons be appointed to act as a committee of correspondence for North Carolina. The resolution named the committee as follows: John Harvey, Robert Howe, Cornelius Harnett, William Hooper, Richard Caswell, Edward Vail, John Ashe, Joseph Hewes and Samuel Johnston.

It is difficult for us at this day to appreciate the significance of this act. It was the first step toward that union of the colonies which resulted in July 4, 1776. The only political bond that had held the colonies together heretofore was the fact that they owed allegiance to the same throne. Otherwise they were absolutely separate and distinct political units. Not only did they not desire union, but even looked upon such a proposition with fear and aversion. But the stupid policy of the king had given them a bond of union stronger than any political bond yet devised by the ingenuity of man—that of a common oppression. They were driven into it in spite of themselves; and the committees of correspondence were its germs. Of this system, Mr. Fiske says: "It was nothing less than the beginning of the American union. * * * It only remained for the various intercolonial committees to assemble together, and then there would be a congress speaking in the name of the continent."

Digitized by Google

It is not to be expected that Martin looked with approval on these proceedings in the North Carolina assembly. Seeing whither their policy tended he told them they were consuming time and incurring expense to no purpose and had better go home to consult their constituents. Accordingly he prorogued the session on December 21, 1773.

Shortly after this Martin learned of the proposition to hold a continental congress at Philadelphia in September. He knew that the plan contemplated the election of the delegates by the various provincial assemblies, and he determined to follow Tryon's example to prevent North Carolina's being represented. But Martin lacked a good deal of having the shrewdness of his predecessor; and the men in control of the assembly were not the kind to be caught twice in the same trap. Martin's purpose not to call another assembly until too late to choose delegates, was communicated to John Harvey by the governor's private secretary. "Then the people," exclaimed Harvey in an outburst of wrath, "will convene one themselves." He determined to issue over his own signature, a call for a provincial congress. This scheme was laid before Samuel Johnston and Colonel Edward Buncombe. Both approved it, and Johnston at once consulted William Hooper, John Ashe and Cornelius Harnett. It was just the kind of proposition that suited Harnett's genius. He at once threw himself into the movement. On July 21, a meeting of the inhabitants of the Wilmington district was held at Wilmington to discuss the plan. A circular letter was issued inviting the people of the province to send delegates to a provincial congress at Johnston court-house August 20. The place was afterwards changed to New Bern and the time to August 25.

Digitized by Google

Governor Martin issued a proclamation forbiding the convention. The people laughed at him and the delegates met on the day appointed. We are surprised to find that Cornelius Harnett was not a member of this convention, Wilmington being represented by Francis Clayton. The business of the session consisted in drawing up a series of resolutions denouncing the recent acts of parliament in respect to America and setting forth the principles that should guide the actions of the delegates and those of their constituents. It was resolved that a continental congress ought to be held at Philadelphia, and William Hooper, Joseph Hewes and Richard Caswell were elected delegates from North Carolina. The convention closed by authorizing John Harvey, the moderator, to call another convention whenever he should deem it necessary.

Among the most important actions of the convention was the resolution authorizing each county and certain of the larger towns to organize committees of safety. It will, of course, be remembered that there were no courts in the province, and the convention properly felt that something ought to be done to relieve the situation. Besides this it was necessary to have some executive authority to enforce the resolves of the provincial convention and of the continental congress. But the time was not yet ripe for the formation of a permanent organization. The committees were therefore temporary expedients. The system finally developed so as to cover the whole province, one committee in each of the towns, one in each of the counties, one in each of the military districts, and one for the province at large. The committees were admirably organized, and worked so successfully that their powers were gradually enlarged and increased until they assumed a jurisdiction that would not have been tolerated in the royal government.

Digitized by Google

In all the history of our people there has been nothing else like these committees. It would be difficult to find another example of government which touched the lives of the people so closely as they did. Born of necessity, originating in the political and economic conditions of the time, they make one of the most interesting and instructive chapters in our history. Of them Colonel Saunders says: "Usurping some new authority every day, executive, judicial or legislative, as the case might be, their powers soon became practically unlimited." Governor Martin properly characterized them as "extraordinary tribunals." In every respect they were extraordinary, insurrectionary, revolutionary. Illegally constituted, they demanded and executed such authority as the royal government had never dreamed of, and received such obedience as it had not dared aspire to. Yet not only did they not abuse their power, but voluntarily resigned it when the public welfare no longer needed their services. They were the offsprings of misrule and rose and fell with their parent.

The Wilmington and New Hanover committees were the most perfectly organized, the most active and the most readily obeyed of any in the province. It is impossible to give even the faintest idea of their work within the limits of this sketch. There was the work of enforcing the resolves of the continental congress and of the provincial convention, some of them most exacting and most burdensome in their operations. There was the duty of inquiring into the conduct and actions of individuals, for these committees not only determined "what acts and opinions constituted a man an enemy of his country, but passed upon his guilt or innocence and fixed his punishment." There was the necessity of raising money by subscriptions and fines—for gunpowder, arms, and all the implements of war had to be purchased. The militia had to be enlisted, organized, armed and drilled. Correspondence with other committees had to be kept up. In short, a revolution had to be inaugurated, and it fell to these committees to do it. The success of that revolution bears witness to the ability with which their work was done. Of these committees, Cornelius Harnett was the master-spirit, the genius, the soul. Their work was his work. Throughout their existence he dominated their actions and the great work which they did in the cause of freedom is his monument. When the Wilmington committee was organized he was unanimously elected its first chairman. When the New Hanover committee was organized a few months later he was at once unanimously elected chairman of the joint committee. His work here won for him later still, after the provincial committee was established, not only a place on that committee but the chairmanship of it, a place that made him the chief executive of the new born state.

Digitized by Google

When Governor Martin saw the way the current was setting and learned that he was foiled in his effort to prevent the election of delegates to the continental congress, he determined to make the best of a bad situation and so called an assembly to meet at New Bern April 4, 1775. John Harvey at once issued circulars calling for a convention to meet at the same place April 3. It was intended, and so carried out, that the members of the assembly should also be members of the convention. Cornelius Harnett again came forward as the representative in both bodies from Wilmington. Governor Martin was furious and denounced the action of Harvey in a thunderous proclamation. The members replied by re-electing Harvey moderator of the convention and speaker of the assembly. Never was such an anomalous situation seen before or since, I believe, in the history of the world. One set of men forming two bodies—one legal, sitting by the authority of the royal governor and in obedience to his writ; the other illegal, sitting in defiance of his authority and in direct disobedience of his proclamation. The curious spectacle is presented of the governor calling on the former body to join him in denouncing and dispersing the latter, composed of the same men whose aid he solicited. The two bodies met in the same room and were presided over by the same man. "When the governor's private secretary was announced at the door," writes Colonel Saunders, "in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, Mr. Moderator Harvey would become Mr. Speaker Harvey * * * and gravely receive his excellency's message." The convention lasted five days. On April 7, a resolution was passed renewing Harvey's authority to call another convention whenever he deemed it necessary, and giving the same power to Samuel Johnston in the event of Harvey's death. The assembly's life was not prolonged any longer than the life of the convention. Having passed some resolutions endorsing the course of North Carolina's delegates in the continental congress, it was dissolved by the angry governor, April 8, 1775. This was the last time a royal governor was to dissolved a North Carolina assembly.

Digitized by Google

April of 1775 was a stirring month in North Carolina. It witnessed the convocation and adjournment of the most revolutionary body ever held in the state. It saw the convening and the dissolution of the last assembly ever held here under the authority of the British crown. It saw the governor of the province openly defied in his palace at the capital, closely watched by armed men, and virtually beseiged in his own house. It saw the guns he had set up for his own protection seized and carried off by the men he had been sent to rule. It closed upon the flight of the terrified governor from the capital to the protection of the guns of Fort Johnston at the mouth of the Cape Fear river.

Digitized by Google

The atmosphere was charged with the revolutionary spirit. Men breathed it in with the very air they sucked into their lungs and then showed it forth to the world by their actions. Events crowded one upon another in rapid succession. The committees of safety were everywhere active in the discharge of their various duties, legislating, judging, executing, combining in themselves all the functions of government. The news of the battle of Lexington spread like wild fire through the province, arousing the forward, stirring the backward, and putting an end everywhere to all hope of a peaceful conclusion of the difficulties. The news was sped on its way by the committees and in no other instance did they give better evidence of their usefulness. Governor Martin complained that the rebel leaders knew about the battle at least two months before he did, and that he did not learn of it in time to counteract the influence which the "infamous and false reports of that transactions" had on the people. The news reached Cornelius Harnett on the Cape Fear in the afternoon of May 8, and he at once hurried it on to the Brunswick committee with the admonition, "For God's sake send the man on without the least delay and write to Mr. Marion to forward it by night and day." The proceedings of the second continental congress, which met amid all this excitement, were followed with the closest attention. John Harvey, after a life devoted to the interest and liberty of his country, died at his home in Perquimans county, leaving a gap in the ranks of the patriots impossible to be filled. Scarcely had this sad news reached the Cape Fear before Cornelius Harnett was joined by Robert Howe and John Ashe in a letter to Samuel Johnston urging him to call a provincial convention without delay. The suggestion met with favor, was endorsed by the committees of several counties, and approved by Johnston. He issued his call July 10. Six days later Governor Martin wrote to Lord Dartmouth: "Hearing of a proclamation of the king, proscribing

Digitized by Google

John Hancock and Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts Bay, and seeing clearly that further proscriptions will be necessary before government can be settled again upon sure foundations in America, I hold it my indispensable duty to mention to your lordship Cornelius Harnett, John Ashe, Robert Howe, and Abner Nash, as persons who have marked themselves out as proper persons for such distinction in this colony by their unremitting labours to promote sedition and rebellion here from the beginnings of the discontents in America to this time, that they stand foremost among the patrons of revolt and anarchy." Within less than a week after this letter was written 500 men, wearied of Governor Martin's abusive proclamations, placed themselves under the leadership of John Ashe and Cornelius Harnett, marched to Fort Johnston, and burned the hated structure to the ground. "Mr. John Ashe and Mr. Cornelius Harnett," wrote the frightened governor, "were the ring-leaders of this savage and audacious mob." Thirty days later, at the time and place appointed, a third provincial congress met in open session in defiance of the rewards offered by the impotent ruler for the arrest of the leaders.

The congress met at Hillsborough, August 20. One hundred and eighty-four delegates were present. Cornelius Harnett was there from Wilmington, associated, however, with another distinguished and able Cape Fear leader, Archibald Maclaine. Harnett's share in the work of the convention was of the greatest importance, but lack of space forbids an account of it here. The one thing that can be noticed was the reorganization of the committee system. At the head of the new system and acting as executive head of the new government, was placed a provincial committee, called the provincial council. Its membership was composed of thirteen persons, one from the province at large and two from each of the six military districts into which the province had been organized. Serving under this council were to be committees in the several districts.

Digitized by Google

Extensive powers were given to the provincial council; it was, as I have said, the executive head of the government, subject to no authority except that of the general congress. The success of this new scheme depended entirely upon the character and ability of the men who were to put it into operation. They were chosen as follows: Samuel Johnston, for the province at large; Cornelius Harnett and Samuel Ashe, for the Wilmington district; Thomas Jones and Whitmill Hill, for the Edenton district; Abner Nash and James Cook, for the New Bern district; Thomas Person and John Kinchen, for the Hillsborough district; Willie Jones and Thomas Eaton for the Halifax district; Samuel Spencer and Waightstill Avery, for the Salisbury district. We can estimate the importance of this organization from the fact that Governor Martin denounced it in unmeasured terms.

The first meeting was held October 18, at Johnston courthouse. Of this meeting Bancroft writes: "Among its members were Samuel Johnston, Samuel Ashe, a man whose integrity even his enemies never questioned, whose name a mountain county and the fairest town in the western part of the commonwealth keep in memory; Abner Nash, an eminent lawyer, described by Martin as 'the oracle of the committee of Newbern and a principal supporter of sedition'; but on none of these three did the choice of president fall; that office of peril and power was bestowed unanimously on Cornelius Harnett, of New Hanover, whose disinterested zeal had made him honored as the Samuel Adams of North Carolina." By virtue of this office Harnett became the chief executive of the new government. The establishment of this central committee with adequate powers and authority immediately bore good fruit. Governor Martin wrote that the authority, the edicts and the ordinances of the congresses and conventions and committees had become supreme and omnipotent and that "lawful government" was completely annihilated. There can be no better comment upon the effectiveness of the administration of Harnett and his colleagues. Everywhere the spirits and activity of the patriots took on new life, and everywhere, according to Martin himself, the spirits of the loyalists drooped and declined daily. So effective was the work and so necessary did the council prove itself to be to the welfare of the province, the next convention passed a resolution requiring it to sit continuously instead of only once every three months. The council, now called the council of safety, continued at the head of the government until the adoption of the state constitution; and Cornelius Harnett remained at the head of the council until elected a delegate to the continental congress.

Digitized by Google

It was under the direction of this council that the North Carolina troops marched to Moore's Creek Bridge and on the 27 of February, won the initial victory of the revolution. General Moore's report of his victory was made to President Harnett. This battle entirely changed the aspect of affairs in North Carolina. Heretofore the people had not considered seriously the question of independence; but now no other proposition met with such nearly universal acceptance. Day by day the conviction steadily grew upon them that there was no hope of coming to terms with the royal government, except upon humiliating conditions, and rather than submit to these the people preferred to risk all in a cast for independence. The convention, which met at Halifax April 4, 1776, was expected to take some definite steps to give official expression to the prevailing desire. The day after the assembling of the convention Samuel Johnston wrote to James Iredell: "All our people here are up for independence." Accordingly on April 8, a committee was appointed, composed of Cornelius Harnett, Allen Jones, Thomas Burke, Abner Nash, John Kinchen, Thomas Person and Thomas Jones, "to take into consideration the usurpations and violences attempted by the king and parliament of Great Britain against America, and the further measures to be taken for frustrating the same, and for the better defence of this province." Cornelius Harnett was elected chairman, and it was he who prepared and read the report which the committee submitted April 12. On that day he arose in the convention and in a clear ringing voice read the following bold and epoch-making report:

Digitized by Google

"It appears to your committee, that pursuant to the plan concerted by the British ministry for subjugating America, the king and parliament of Great Britain have usurped a power over the persons and properties of the people, unlimited and uncontrolled and disregarding their humble petitions for peace, liberty and safety, have made divers legislative acts, denouncing war, famine and every species of calamity, against the continent in general. The British fleets and armies have been, and still are, daily employed in destroying the people, and committing the most horrid devastations on the country. That governors in different colonies have declared protection to slaves, who should imbrue their hands in the blood of their masters. That ships belonging to America are declared prizes of war, and many of them have been violently seized and confiscated. In consequence of all which multitudes of the people have been destroyed, or from easy circumstances reduced to the most lamentable distress.

"And whereas, the moderation hitherto manifested by the united colonies and their sincere desire to be reconciled to the mother country on constitutional principles, have procured no mitigation of the aforesaid wrongs and usurpations, and no hopes remain of obtaining redress by those means alone which have hitherto been tried, your committee are of opinion that the house should enter into the following resolve, to-wit:

"Resolved, That the delegates for this colony in the continental congress be impowered to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independency, and forming foreign alliances, reserving to this colony the sole and exclusive right of forming a constitution and laws for this colony, and of appointing delegates from time to time (under the direction of the general representation thereof), to meet the delegates of the other colonies for such purposes as shall be hereafter pointed out."

Digitized by Google

The convention unanimously adopted the report. Comment is unnecessary. The actors, the place, the occasion, the time, the action itself, tell their own story far beyond the power of the pen to add to it or detract from it. Discussing the growth of the sentiment for independence in America, Mr. Bancroft says:

"The American congress needed an impulse from the resolute spirit of some colonial convention, and the example of a government springing wholly from the people." Following an account of how South Carolina let slip the honor of giving this impulse, Mr. Bancroft continues: "The word which South Carolina hesitated to pronounce was given by North Carolina. That colony, proud of its victory over domestic enemies, and roused to defiance by the presence of Clinton, the British general, in one of their river, * * * unanimously" voted for independence. "North Carolina was the first colony to vote explicit sanction to independence."

Immediately after the adoption of this report the convention took up the consideration of a constitution for the state.

Digitized by Google

Harnett was a member of the committee to prepare the document. But this was a matter too important for slight consideration, and the committee recommended that it be postponed until the next session of the convention. At the same time the powers and authority of the council of safety were extended and the council was ordered to sit continuously instead of quarterly.

A few days before the adjournment of the convention the enemy again paid their compliments to Harnett's zeal and influence. This time they came from Sir Henry Clinton. Sir Henry had reached the Cape Fear too late to co-operate with the Highlanders in their disastrous attempts to subdue the colony, so there was nothing left for him to do but to issue a proclamation, and sail away again. Accordingly, just before sailing, he proclaimed from the deck of his majesty's man-of-war, Pallisser, that a horrid rebellion existed in North Carolina, but that in the name of his sacred majesty, he now offered a free pardon to all who would acknowledge the error of their way, lay down their arms, and return to their duty to the king, "excepting only from the benefits of such pardon Cornelius Harnett and Robert Howes."

To this proclamation the council of safety replied by unanimously re-electing Cornelius Harnett president. This occurred at their Wilmington session in June. In July they adjourned to meet at Halifax. On the 22 of the month the council received news of the action of the continental congress on July 4.

Five days later they resolved that August 1, be the day for proclaiming the declaration at Halifax. Thursday, August 1, 1776, becomes therefore, a marked day in the annals of the state. The sun rose clear on this first day of the new month, symbolic of the new state just rising out of a night of oppression and wrong. With the rising of the sun came the vanguard of the large crowd that was to assemble that day from the surrounding country to hear the official announcement of North Carolina's new-born independence. By noon the village was alive with the eager throng. The ceremony was simple but none the less impressive. The provincial troops and militia companies, proudly bedecked in such uniforms as they could boast, were present in full battle array. With drums beating and flags unfurled to catch the first breath of freedom, this martial escort conducted the president of the council to the front of the court-house. As the August sun reached its mid-course in the heavens, Cornelius Harnett, bare-headed, bearing in his hand the document which bore the words so full of meaning for all future generations, cheered by the enthusiastic throng, solemnly ascended the platform and faced the people. Even as he unrolled the scroll the enthusiam of the crowd gave vent in one prolonged cheer, and then a solemn hush fell on the audience. Every ear was strained to catch the words that fell from the lips of the popular speaker. As he closed with those solemn words pledging the lives, the fortunes and the sacred honor of the people to the declaration, the tumultuous shouts of joy, the waving of flags, and the booming of cannon, proclaimed that North Carolina was prepared to uphold her part. As Harnett came down from the platform the soldiers dashed at him, seized him, and bore him aloft on their shoulders through the crowded street, cheering him as their champion and swearing allegiance to the new nation. It must have been a proud moment in his life and one that compensated somewhat for the sacrifices he was yet to make for his people.*

Digitized by Google

Soon after this the fifth and last provincial convention assembled at Halifax. Harnett sat for Brunswick county. This convention adopted the first constitution of the state of North Carolina. Harnett was a member of the committee which drafted it and exercised a large influence in its preparation. His influence and efforts caused the insertion of that imperishable clause which forbids the establishment of a state church in North Carolina, and secures forever to every person in the state the right to worship God "according to the dictates of his own conscience." If Thomas Jefferson rightly considered the authorship of a similar clause in the Virginia constitution, one of the three really great events of his life, surely the authorship of this clause in the North Carolina constitution was none the less one of the great events of Cornelius Harnett's useful career. But he did not blazon it to the world by having it recorded on his tomb.

Digitized by Google

This convention elected the first officers of the new state. Richard Caswell was elected governor. Harnett was chosen first councillor of state. By the election of Caswell as governor the chairmanship of the convention became vacant, and Harnett was elected to fill the vacancy. The journal of the last one of those remarkable conventions that separated North Carolina from the British empire is signed by "Cornelius Harnett, President."

Harnett was re-elected to the council by the first legislature which met under the constitution. He did not serve long, however, as he was soon afterward selected a delegate to the continental congress and resigned his seat in the council. He took this action reluctantly. It meant loss of comfort and ease, sacrifice of both money and health, but he did not feel justified in declining, for purely personal reasons, the service the state desired of him. He, therefore, entered upon his duties in June, 1777, and served three years in congress. A detailed account of his services there is impossible in this sketch. They were faithful and able. The field was narrow, however; the situation disagreeable; his health poor; and the expense of living great. He wrote to his friend Burke that living in Philadelphia cost him £6,000 more than his salary, but he adds: "Do not mention this complaint to any person. I am content to sit down with this loss and much more if my country requires it." He missed the comforts of home, wearied of the quarrels and bickerings of congress, suffered with the gout, until he was thoroughly worn out.

Digitized by Google

Harnett's letters are among the most valuable in the correspondence of the revolution, throwing such a flood of light on that interesting period as few other letters do. It has already been seen the estimate that Governor Swain put upon them. Any one who reads them carefully in the light of the events they describe will readily concur in that estimate.

In February, 1780, Harnett made his last journey from Philadelphia to Wilmington, "the most fatiguing and most disagreeable journey any old fellow ever took." He had not long to rest under the shade of his vine and fig tree as he had hoped to do. Only one year of life remained to him, a year of gloom, hardship and suffering. The summer of 1780 was the gloomiest time of the war for the Americans. Charleston fell; Colonel Bufort's Virginia regiment was annihilated at Waxhaws; Gates exchanged his northern laurels for southern willows at Camden; Ninety-Six was captured, and Cornwallis marched into North Carolina. Here came relief. On the top of King's Mountain came the first break in the clouds; and soon after this Tarleton's renowned corps was cut to pieces at Cowpens.

Scarcely had this good news revived the drooping spirits of the patriots when a great disaster befell the Cape Fear country. On January 29, 1781, Major James H. Craige, one of the most energetic officers of the British army, sailed into the Cape Fear river with a fleet of eighteen vessels and four hundred and fifty men. Wilmington was occupied without opposition. Major Craige had come with express orders to capture Cornelius Harnett, and one of his first expeditions from Wilmington was sent out for this purpose. Harnett was warned in time and attempted to escape; but he had gone only about thirty miles when he was seized by a paroxysm of the gout and was compelled to take to his bed at the home of his friend, Colonel Spicer, in Onslow county. The enemy overtook him here, and regardless of his age and condition, in a manner unusually brutal, carried him to Wilmington.

Digitized by Google

Here he was confined for three days in a block-house. His condition had now become so precarious that Craige was induced to release him on parole.

He had not long to enjoy his freedom, and none realized it better than he. Yet he politely declined the services of the physicians, though grateful for their attention. On April 28, he wrote with his own hand his will, bequeathing "to my beloved wife, Mary, all my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of what nature or kind soever, to her, her heirs and assigns, forever." He then breathed his last.

Harnett's grave is in the northeast corner of St. James church-yard in the city of Wilmington. He contributed liberally to the erection of the first St. James church, was for a long time a member of the vestry, and always retained a pew in the church. In spite of this, and of a great deal of other evidence to the contrary, a tradition has been handed down, repeated by Hooper, and after him by others, that Harnett was an infidel. The train of evidence is too long to be followed here and I must content myself with merely observing that in my opinion the statement is an erroneous one. Much has been made of the epitaph on his tomb-stone, selected by himself.

"CORNELIUS HARNETT,
Died April 20, 1781.
Age 58.
" 'Slave to no sect, he took no private road,
But looked through Nature up to Nature's God.' "

It should be noted here that the date on the stone must be incorrect, as his will is in his own hand-writing and is dated April 28.

Mr. Harnett lived just outside of Wilmington. His house, surrounded by a grove of magnificent live-oaks, stood on an eminence on the east bank of the Cape Fear, commanding a fine view of the river. Here Harnett lived at ease, for he was a man of wealth, entertaining upon such a scale as to win a reputation for his hospitality, even in the hospitable Cape Fear country.

Digitized by Google

"His stature," says Hooper, "was about five feet nine inches. In his person he was rather slender than stout. His hair was of a light-brown, and his eyes hazel. The contour of his face was not striking; nor were his features, which were small, remarkable for symmetry; but his countenance was pleasing, and his figure, though not commanding, was neither inelegant nor ungraceful.

"In his private transactions he was guided by a spirit of probity, honor and liberality; and in his political career he was animated by an ardent and enlightened and disinterested zeal for liberty, in whose cause he exposed his life and endangered his fortune. He had no tinge of the visionary or of the fanatic in the complexion of his politics. 'He read the volume of human nature and understood it.' He studied closely that complicated machine, man, and he managed it to the greatest advantage for the cause of liberty, and for the good of his country. That he sometimes adopted artifice, when it seemed necessary for the attainment of his purpose, may be admitted with little imputation on his morals and without disparagement to his understanding. His general course of action in public life was marked by boldness and decision.

"He practiced all the duties of a kind and charitable and elegant hospitality; and yet with all this liberality he was an exact and minute economist.

"Easy in his manner, affable, courteous, with a fine taste for letters and a genius for music, he was always an interesting, sometimes a fascinating companion.

"He had read extensively, for one engaged so much in the bustle of the world, and he had read with a critical eye and inquisitive mind. * * In conversation he was never voluble. The tongue, an unruly member in most men, was in him nicely regulated by a sound and discriminating judgment. He paid,nevertheless, his full quota into the common stock, for what was wanting in continuity or fullness of expression, was supplied by a glance of his eye, the movement of his hand and the impressiveness of his pause. Occasionally, too, he imparted animation to his discourse by a characteristic smile of such peculiar sweetness and benignity, as enlivened every mind and cheered every bosom, within the sphere of its radiance.

Digitized by Google

"Although affable in address, he was reserved in opinion. He could be wary and circumspect, or decided and daring as exigency dictated or emergency required. At one moment abandoned to the gratifications of sense, in the next he could recover his self-possession and resume his dignity. Addicted to pleasure, he was always ready to devote himself to business, and always prompt in execution. An inflexible republican, he was beloved and honored by the adherents of monarchy amid the fury of a civil war. * * * Such was Cornelius Harnett. Once the favorite of the Cape Fear and the idol of the town of Wilmington; his applauses filled the ears as his character filled the eyes of the public."

Digitized by Google

EDWARD MOSELEY: CHARACTER SKETCH.

By D. H. HILL.

"Of all the men who watched and guided the tottering footsteps of our infant State, there was not one who in intellectual ability, in solid and polite learning, in scholarly cultivation and refinement, in courage and endurance, in high Christian morality, in generous consideration for the welfare of others, in all true merit in fine, which makes a man among men, who could equal Edward Moseley.

HON. GEORGE DAVIS.

Fortunately for men of action the judgment of their contemporaries is often modified or reversed by the clearer judgment of posterity. Of Wycliffe, the first translator of the Bible into our "modir tonge" and one of the stoutest opponents of ecclesiastical tyranny, a contemporary, Lewis, says, in his "Life of Wycliffe:"

"On the feast of the passion of Saint Thomas, of Canterbury, John Wycliffe, the organ of the devil, the enemy of the church, the idol of heretics, the image of hypocrites, the restorer of schism, the storehouse of lies, the sink of flattery, being struck by the horrible judgment of God, was seized with the palsy throughout his whole body, and that mouth, which was to have spoken huge things against God and his saints, and Holy church, was miserably drawn aside, and afforded a frightful spectacle to beholders; his tongue was speechless and his head shook, showing plainly that the curse which God had thundered forth against Cain was also inflicted on him."

Of this same Wycliffe Dr. Patterson Smyth says, in the tempered judgment of 1899:

"In him England lost one of her best and greatest sons, a patriot sternly resenting all dishonor to his country, a reformer who ventured his life for the purity of the church and the freedom of the Bible—an earnest, faithful 'parsoun of a toune' standing out conspicuously among the clergy of the time.

Digitized by Google

> 'For christes lore and his apostles twelve
> He taughte—and first he folwede it himselve.'"

In like manner if we should credit the official contemporaries of Edward Moseley, he was "of all men most base." Gov. Hyde and his followers in the Legislature of 1711 joined in a petition to "The Palatin and Lord Proprietors" to "remove those three restless Incendiaries Col. Carey, Mr. Porter and Mr. Moseley from having any share in the government." Gov. Pollock, smooth and suave, complains that "he was the chief contriver and carry-er on of Col. Carey's rebellion." Gov. Burrington, passing rich in the vocabulary of expletive, brands him as "the great land-jobber of this country," and further declares to the Legislature that Moseley is "a person of sufficient ability" to be "Publick Treasurer," but wishes that his "integrity was equal to his ability." Gov. Johnston writes the Board of Trade that "the only remains of faction in this colony is kept up by Mr. Moseley and the Moors."

The remarkable continuity of this courteous attention from crown officers, extending as it does over a good many years, reveals the dynamics inherent in the man. Even if we had no record of Moseley's life other than this continuous gubernational vituperation, we should still be inclined to say, "Official lions found no hind in him; here was a man."

Hence it is no surprise to find modern writers, who have tried to roll the mists away, saying, as Weeks does: "He (Moseley) was the broadest-minded man who lived in North Carolina during the first half of the 18th century. He was a patriot rather than a partisan and as such espoused the cause of religious fredom against the bigotry and narrowness of his age and country;"

Or to find Shinn saying: "It can not be doubted that he was hot tempered and was perhaps often too hasty and liable to cultivate strong antipathies; yet he was a patriot in his day and did more than any other early character to make the unlettered Carolinians feel that by royal charter 'it is granted that the inhabitants of this province shall have, possess and enjoy all libertys, franchises and privileges as are held, possessed and enjoyed in the Kingdom of England.' In every contest he was on the side of the people."

Digitized by Google

That Moseley was always "on the side of the people" and that in spite of royal governors he retained their confidence is abundantly shown by such facts as these. One year after Gov. Hyde's assembly petitioned for Moseley's 'removal from having any part in the government,' the people elected him a member of the Assembly. In 1715, in the face of Pollock's charge and just two years after it was made, that he was the backbone of the Cary trouble, the representatives of the people elected him their Speaker. Gov. Burrington's epithet of "land grabber," and doubt as to his having integrity enough to be Treasurer did not deter the Assembly of 1731 from electing Moseley Speaker nor from saying with some heat: "The Members of the House declare that they are very well satisfied as well with his integrity as his ability, his accounts always appearing just and true."

Of the early life of the man thus so differently judged, we have few records; his later life is almost literally a history of the province, so large is his part in its doings. He held almost every office then open to a citizen. Indeed for robust persistence in office-holding Moseley is without a peer in Carolina history. The first year that he appears in our records he was a member of the Cary Council: he dies still a Council member, although his service was not continuous. The office of magistrate, then a very honorable and responsible one, he held nearly all his life. From perhaps 1708 until near his death he was Treasurer of the Colony, and also part of the time precinct treasurer. For many years he was Surveyor-General. He was a Commissioner for running the boundary line between North Carolina and Virginia and also between North Carolina and South Carolina. He was judge of the Court of Admiralty, five or six times Speaker of the House, President of the Council and thus Acting-Governor, Commissioner on Wages, and for Revisal of laws, chief baron of the Exchequer, and finally Chief Justice of the Colony. This perpetuity and variety of office-holding seem too to have come, not because he was a chronic seeker of office, but solely because he was the fittest man to fill the office.

Digitized by Google

What were the characteristics of the man who was thus honored by his people?

In the first place it was not necessary for him "to usurp a patriot's all-atoning name," for he seems to have sincerely loved his adopted colony, and to have served it with the steadfast purpose of making it a home fit for free men. Although himself a member of the established church of England, a contributor equal in generosity to the Governor towards its support, and a propagandist of its faith to the extent of sending to England for Prayer Books for distribution, yet there seems no doubt that he set his face like flint against an alliance of church and State in America. Although frequently on terms of such intimacy with crown officers that it would have been to his interest to wink at their usurpations of authority, he steadily resisted all such encroachments on the rights of the people. He was Speaker of the House that in 1715 dared to pass the memorable resolution "that the impressing of the inhabitants, or their property, under pretense of its being for public service, without authority from the General Assembly is unwarrantable, a great infringement of the liberty of the subject, and very much weakens the government by causing many to leave it."

Col. Saunders says of this resolution: "The man who, at that early day, in the wild woods of America, could formulate that resolution, and the people whose assembly could fling it in the face of the government, were worthy of each other."

Digitized by Google

While holding a royal commission as member of the Council, Moseley refused to pay his quit rents to the royal Receiver at a rate different from what he thought the laws of the colony prescribed, and encouraged others to take the same position.

In the second place he had the boldness of thought and of action that people admire in their leaders. When but a comparative stranger in the province, he did not hesitate to join with Cary in actions which though in themselves illegal redounded to public good. When he believed that Gov. Eden's relations to the pirate Thache or Teach were suspiciously criminal, he with the aid of his brother-in-law, Maurice Moore, made bold to forcibly enter the office of the Governor's secretary and seize official papers apparently for the purpose of disclosing criminality on the part of the officers of the province. On his arrest for this attempt "to bring the good government, diligent and just administration of him the said Charles Eden as Governor to detract, asperse and contempt and to move and stir up debates, strifes and differences, sedition and discord and dissention in this province," as the warrant charged, he could not forbear saying that the governor, chief justice and others with him could procure armed men to come and arrest him but could not raise them to destroy the pirate. He incurred the hostility of Gov. Burrington and was committed to the common jail for interposing in behalf of a poor man without legal counsel, whom the Governor was prosecuting with acrimonious speed. It is not hard to imagine that it was his influence as Speaker that led the Assembly of 1733 to protest against Gov. Burrington's "long disuse of assemblies," and to declare that "the Affairs of the Province in our humble Opinion required the Meeting of an Assembly before this time, not only for an Application to his Majesty toward the Good and happy settlement of this province, but also for the suppressing the many Oppressions, which so loudly have been complained of through the whole province, which could in no other way so properly be represented as in an Assembly."

Digitized by Google

In the third place Moseley had the common sense and self-poise on which people rely in troublous times. There was no sham, no affectation, no sounding hollow in his make-up. This is nowhere shown more conspicuously than in the reply that he, Christopher Gale, John Lovick and William Little sent to the Virginia Commissioners who had written them as North Carolina's Commissioners to settle the disputed boundary line between the two States. With lordly pomp the Virginia Commissioners had written: "We think it very proper to acquaint you in what manner we intend to come provided, that so you, being appointed in the same station, may, if you please, do the same honor to your country. We shall bring with us about twenty men, furnished with provisions for thirty days: we shall have with us a tent and marquees for the convenience of ourselves and our servants. We bring as much wine and rum as will enable us and our men to drink every night to do the good success of the following day; and because we understand that there are gentiles on the frontiers, who never had an opportunity to be baptized, we shall have a chaplain with us to make them Christians."

Men of less common sense than the Carolina Commissioners would have been at a loss to know what reply to make to this startling announcement. But the sturdy sense of Moseley and his associates did not desert them.

"We are at a loss, gentlemen," wrote these downright men, "whether to thank you for the particulars you give us of your tent stores, and the manner you design to meet us. Had you been silent about it, we had not wanted an excuse for not meeting you in the same manner; but now you force us to expose the nakedness of our country, and to tell you we cannot possibly meet you in the manner our great respect for you would make us glad to do; whom we are not emulous of outdoing, unless in care and diligence in the affair we come to meet you about."

Digitized by Google

"That keen thrust under the guard," comments Mr. Davis, "delivered too with all the glowing courtesy of knighthood, is exquisite. My lord Chesterfield could not have improved it. If the Virginians were as familiar with sweet Will as they undoubtedly were with the value of tent stores, they must have had an uncomfortable remembrance of Sir Andrew Aguecheek—'An I thought he had been so cunning in fence, I'd have seen him damned ere I'd have challenged him."

But there is another side to the man's character that is pleasant to recall. Active man of affairs as he was, accumulating a fortune as he did, he was withal, in the best sense of the words, a man of letters. His private library, including books on law, on theology, and on general literature, was perhaps the most extensive in the province. A part of his library was left by him as a foundation for a public library in the town of Edenton.

A devoted lover of North Carolina and a diligent student of its history pays this hearty tribute to Col. Moseley's worth:

"The great debt of gratitude that North Carolina will ever owe him is due to his undying love of free government, and his indomitable maintenance of the rights of his people. Doubtless no man ever more fully realized than he 'that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,' nor was there ever upon any watch tower a more faithful sentinel than he. And to him, above all others, should North Carolina erect her first statute, for to him, above all others, is she indebted for stimulating that love of liberty regulated by law, and that hatred of arbitrary government that has ever characterized her people."

Digitized by Google

CELEBRATION

OF THE

ANNIVERSARY OF MAY 20, 1775

WITH AN ADDRESS BY

GEN. JOSEPH GRAHAM

Giving Reminiscences of the Day and Other Mecklenburg Revolutionary Events

AT

CHARLOTTE, N. C., MAY 20, 1735

W. A. GRAHAM
Lincoln County, North Carolina

Digitized by Google

CELEBRATION OF THE ANNIVERSARY OF MAY 20, 1775.

BY W. A. GRAHAM.

The first celebration of the anniversary of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, Charlotte, May 20, 1835.

The attendance was estimated to be at least five thousand, ceremonies were held in the "church grove" now First Presbyterian church. The Governor of the State (Swain) was present and reviewed the troops.

James W. Osborne (afterwards judge) father of Judge Frank I. Osborne, after a brief and eloquent preface read the Mecklenburg Declaration.

Franklin Smith was "orator of the day." He gave a succint account of the aggressions of England which led up to the Declaration; sketched the character of the convention and commemorated the virtues of its members.

At the dinner U. S. Senator Willie P. Mangum, Governor Swain and others spoke at length upon the political questions, probably upon General Jackson vs. the United States Bank.

In response to the toast "Our guest, General Joseph Graham, the living witness of the scene we have met to commemorate and the bold and intrepid defender of its principles," General Graham spoke as follows:

Fellow Citizens:—On this day three-score years ago, I was in this place, and heard the discussion of those venerable fathers, and finally their unanimous vote on the adoption of those resolutions, and in a short time after when proclamation was made, the people assembled and they were read at the Court-House door, where they were highly approved by all. Perhaps upwards of half the men in Mecklenburg and now Cabarrus counties were present. This and some previous meetings had a tendency to give tone to public sentiment, that was manifest throughout the Revolutionary War, and for many years after. I had the honor to be personally acquainted with each of the fathers who signed those resolutions; they were men of sound common sense, actuated by pure patriotism, appeared to be governed by no motive but their country's welfare, perhaps a majority of them too old to do military duty, but always ready with their counsel to their families and neighbors, to assist the common cause. It yet may be remembered that before the fall of Charleston, a magazine of gun powder was moved from Camden to this place for greater safety and was guarded sometime by the students of the Academy at this place—that an alarm of the vailed, and several of the old fathers, signers of those Resolu- enemy's advancing here, some weeks before they came, pre- tions, with others, came to Charlotte on a certain day with bags in which they filled the gunpowder, and carried it off in different directions—they appeared like so many boys who had been to mill. It was concealed in separate places—afterwards it afforded us a seasonable supply—not much of it got damaged and the enemy got none. *

Digitized by Google

At that time we had no parties among us, we were but one party and that for our country. Then and for a dozen years afterwards, a man who was popular, and had the public confidence, was called on to face the greatest dangers, and to make large sacrifices of his time and property in the common cause. What nominal pay he received was in a depreciated currency—it was evident that money was not the motive by which he was governed, but to drive the enemy from our country and to establish the Independence which they had declared,—the fact is there were no loaves and fishes to divide, as in modern times, to scuffle about, for it now appears the

* General Davidson to General Sumner, October 10, 1780, at Rocky River, reports receipt of 29 "caigs" of this powder from within four miles of Charlotte, of which he knew nothing until a day or two before.—Col. Records, Vol. XIV, p. 688.

Digitized by Google

plentier they are the greater the risque that the public tranquility may be disturbed, and finally may produce more evil than at present anticipated.

It would be tedious to recount all the effect produced by the discussion and Resolutions passed in this place sixty years past, how faithfully those men, their neighbors and their offspring, acted up to the professions they then made—how they regularly furnished their quota of men while the war was at a distance, but after the fall of Charleston and Buford's defeat, they were called out en masse, when Mecklenburg became a frontier against a powerful enemy,—need I mention that several of her brave sons fell in the battle at Ramsour's Mill,—that in the well-fought battle of Hanging Rock, she lost the lamented Capt. David Reid, and six privates and had eleven wounded—had her proportion of men and suffering in the disastrous defeat of General Gates on the 16th of August, 1780, or the affair at Wahab's, under Col. Davie in September in the same year, when a party superior in numbers was surprised and beat in the vicinity of the main British army or when the British army of 5,000 Regulars marched into this village in all the pomp of War, on the 26th of Sept., 1780, was opposed by Col. Davie in a kind of Parthian fight with 350, chiefly of this County, and our well-tried friends of Rowan,—or that during the 12 days they stayed, their sentries were shot down, their piquets harassed, and a foraging party of 400 driven back from McIntyre's farm about 7 miles North of this place, with some loss, by only a few men of your native sons—that waggons with stores from Camden were captured and destroyed, two or three miles to the South of this place. These circumstances induced Col. Tarleton in conversation with a lady in the neighborhood, to compliment this place with the name of "The Hornets' Nest."

When General Green took command of the Southern Army, on the 3rd of December, 1780, this County having been the seat of war so long, supplies of provisions and forage being nearly exhausted, he detached General Morgan over Broad River, and moved with his Army down near Cheraw. As an evidence of the estimate in which you were held, he relied upon the inhabitants between the Catawba and Yadkin Rivers as a central Army, otherwise his dispositions would have been inconsistent with the general rules of war in such cases. Need I mention that after Tarleton's defeat at the Cowpens, when the enemy advanced in full force on the banks of the Catawba, on the memorable 1st of February, 1781, in that cloudy and drisly morning when they passed at Cowan's Ford, were opposed by about 350 men, a majority of your native sons, endeavoring to defend their domicils under command of the brave and lamented General Davidson, who there fell, and two of your citizens who may be well remembered by several of those present, Robert Beatty and James Scott—that the atmosphere was so dense the sound of the artillery and platoons were distinctly heard by all the mothers, wives and sisters of those engaged, who lived here and to the North of this place. That our friends of Rowan and some other counties who had retreated from Beattie's Ford, were defeated at Torrence's Tavern on the same day by Col. Tarleton—that afterwards the British passed on to Salisbury—about 700 men were collected in their rear composed of the citizens between the Yadkin and Catawba, and having none but field officers, they could not agree among themselves who should take the command, and finally they selected Gen. Andrew Pickens, (of S. C.,) who with six or eight South Carolina refugees, had been at the defeat at Torrence's Tavern, where he was without command. After his appointment and the Brigade organized, it moved on after the enemy; when arrived near Hillsboro, he sent a detachment of men of this county, who at Hart's Mill within 1 1-2 miles of Hillsboro, the enemy's headquarters, killed and captured a piquet of 25 Regulars and some Tories'—that at Pile's defeat,—at the battle of Whitesell's Mill, and other places of minor importance they acted a conspicuous part, that at the battle of Alamance, at Clap's Mill on the 2d of March, 1781, when about 500 on each side were engaged, you sustained more loss in proportion to numbers than any corps engaged,—John Ford (a carpenter) who built some of the houses now standing in this village, and David Johnston, were killed—Robert Morris, Esq (of Mill Grove), Samuel Martin, Clerk of your Court, and John Barnett were wounded, Joseph Mitchell (of Stoney Creek) and John Stinson, who I believe is yet living, were taken prisoners. But why need I refer to all the occurrences of this eventful campaign. The historians, Doctor Ramsey and Judge Johnston, (both of South Carolina), atrributed those actions to the militia of South Carolina because the officer, who had the command was from that State; great injustice is likewise done by said historians to the affair of Hanging Rock and other movements. While General Sumpter commanded, the milita of this county frequently were his greatest force, and after he was appointed to raise a Brigade of State Troops, it may be remembered that the Regiments of Hampton, Polk and Hill were chiefly raised between the Yadkin and the Catawba, and the many brilliant actions they performed are placed to the credit of South Carolina because the Generals from that State happened to have the command. As well might the salvation of the South be placed to the credit of the State of Rhode Island, because General Green was commander.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

At the time those Resolutions were adopted, there were 13 militia companies in Mecklenburg and Cabarrus Counties, the practice was at company muster, each company elected two of their number as committee men, usually those for whom they had the most confidence in for intelligence. As well as I can remember, it was first practiced in the autumn of the year 1774, and had several meetings in the Winter and Spring previous to the meeting of May, 1775. The Committee were continued for 15 years after. What time they ceased is unknown to me. In the year 1789 and 1790, when

Digitized by Google

I had the honor to represent this County, they usually met after the election and formed instructions to their Representatives in the General Assembly. You have several public laws on your Statute Book, that originated in those committees, that have never been repealed or amended in 45 years.

On taking a retrospective view for 60 years back, the difficulties, embarrassments and dangers, that were before us, and comparing it with the present flourishing and happy condition the country is now in—what great cause of gratitude to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. How many blessings we are and have been favored with, that in the common course of human events can not be attributed to any other cause.

Having merely glanced at the reminiscences of the Revolutionary War, all but the expedition to Wilmington in the fall of the year 1781, under the command of General Rutherford where a detachment of cavalry of 100, mostly from this County, and Rowan, at the Raft Swamp, charged and defeated upwards of 400 Tories, and at the Brick House opposite Wilmington, defeated a superior number to our own, a few days before the British evacuated Wilmington. This campaign was the last in which your militia was engaged in the Revolutionary War, and I think fully redeemed the pledge made by those fathers in their behalf on the 20th of May, 1775. The occurences of note which took place since that time, perhaps most of you who are advanced in life, remember.

The account of the celebration is given in full in General Joseph Graham and his Revolutionary Papers—it is from the Miners and Farmers Journal, Charlotte, N. C., May 22nd, 1835. The address is from the Western Carolinian, Salisbury, N. C., June 20th, 1835. I regret that I did not obtain it in time to put in the book.

W. A. GRAHAM.

Machpelah, N. C., Nov. 1st, 1905.

Digitized by Google

Genealogical Department.

NORTH CAROLINA
Society Daughters of the Revolution.

YOUR NORTH CAROLINA ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED.

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, records of the different counties, family papers and State histories will be readily examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced. Their ancestors must have resided in the State of North Carolina during the Revolutionary and Colonial periods.

Fee for such researches, $5.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIERE (HOOPER) WILLS,
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS OF ARMS EMBLAZONED AT REASONABLE RATES.

Painted, $8; Burnt on Wood, $8; India Ink Drawing, $8.

For Coats of Arms, etc., address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

RALEIGH, N. C.
W. S. SHERMAN, PRINTER
1905

Digitized by Google

Some Booklets for Sale

VOL. I

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kenneday.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

VOL. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlements in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsburg."
"Historic Homes," Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays, Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"Historic Homes, The Groves, Cape Fear, Wakefield," Burgwyn, Waddell, Haywood.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War," Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

VOL. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs. L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL. D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

VOL. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence," John Penn and Joseph Hewes, by T. M. Pittman, of Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.
"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.
"The Scotch-Irish Settlement,
"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

VOL. 1, 25c.; VOLS. 2, 3 AND 4, 15c. EACH.

EDITORS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, RALEIGH, N. C.

Digitized by Google

MECHANICS AND INVESTORS UNION

JOHN C. DREWERY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

A HOME INVESTMENT COMPANY FOR MONTHLY SAVINGS.
A HOME LOAN COMPANY,
To Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money.
It promotes Economy, Thrift and Punctuality in Business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 Will Mature a $100.00 Certificate.
One Hundred Payments Will Secure a Home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, SECRETARY, 22 Pullen Building.

...ALLEN'S FORTY LESSONS IN BOOK-KEEPING...

Over 7,000 copies have been used in Schools and Colleges. Commended by Teachers and Business Men. PRICE $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, RALEIGH.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery.

Aside from a Large Line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc.. we will take care of Your Orders for

RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS

All Orders given our Personal Attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.,
RALEIGH, N. C.

ESTABLISHED IN 1891.

The Commercial and Farmers Bank,

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, - - - - - - - -	$100,000.00
Surplus, - - - - - - - -	60,000.00
Deposits, - - - - - - - -	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian. Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent. Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSOV, Asst. Cashier.

Digitized by Google

THE

NEWS AND OBSERVER,

RALEIGH, N. C.

PUBLISHED AT THE CAPITAL CITY.
IT REACHES THE WHOLE STATE.

Largest Circulation in North Carolina.
The State's Representative Newspaper.

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Editor.

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION.

1894,	1,800	Subscribers	1900,	5,700	Subscribers
1895,	2,400	"	1901,	6,500	"
1896,	3,100	"	1902,	7,054	"
1897,	4,200	"	1903,	8,201	"
1898,	4,880	"	1904,	9,111	"
1899,	5,200	"	1905,	10,000	"

Digitized by Google

NORTH CAROLINA HISTORICAL COMMISSION

ESTABLISHED BY LAWS OF 1903.

MEMBERS:

W. J. PEELE, CHAIRMAN,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNER, SECRETARY,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES,.....RALEIGH, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER,.....CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT,.....ROPER, N. C.

The Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners.

The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in thier efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary

Digitized by Google

WEATHERS & PERRY.

INTERIOR DECORATORS,

WALL PAPER, WINDOW SHADES, CURTAIN POLES, PICTURE FRAMES, PICTURES, ARTISTS' MATERIALS AND ART NOVELTIES, BRIC-A-BRAC, WASH SILKS, BRAIDS, WOOLS AND ZEPHYRS, 117 Fayetteville Street, RALEIGH, N. C.

50,000 OLD BOOKS FOR SALE!

Plates, Prints, Stamps, Coin and Old Mahogany Furniture. 1,000 Titles on North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia History and the South. Send for list. Mention your duplicate for exchange. We want all North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia Laws, Journals, Documents and Histories.

BOOK EXCHANGE,

RALEIGH, N. C., —AND— RICHMOND, VA.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

The Wonderful Headache and Neuralgia Remedy

25c. and 50c. a Bottle

AT ALL DRUG STORES

Digitized by Google

Draughon's Practical Business Colleges

RALEIGH, N. C.
COLUMBIA, S. C.
KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NASHVILLE, TENN.
FT. WORTH, TEX.

CATALOGUE FREE

Address, J. F. DRAUGHON, Pres.

POSITION $50 per month GUARANTEED or money REFUNDED, or you may pay tuition out of salary after graduating. No vacation. Enter any time. In THOROUGHNESS and REPUTATION D. P. B. C.'s are to other Business Colleges what Harvard University is to Academies. 7,000 students annually. Indorsed by business men from Maine to California. Cheap board.

HOME STUDY—Contract given to REFUND money, if, after taking our Home Study BY MAIL, you are not satisfied. WRITE FOR PRICES.

Digitized by Google

THE

YARBOROUGH HOUSE,

RALEIGH, N. C.

New and Modern—Appeals to the Appreciative.

HOWELL COBB.

BOYLAN-PEARCE COMPANY,

RALEIGH, N. C.,

Call your especial attention to their superb line of Sensible and Serviceable

Christmas Gifts

DRESS GOODS,	BLANKETS,	GLOVES,
TRIMMINGS,	CLOAKS,	COLLARS,
CARPETS,	SHAWLS,	RIBBONS,
SQUARES,	FINE FURS,	RUCHES,
CURTAINS,	NECKWEAR,	CORSETS,
MILLINERY,	UNDERWEAR,	PILLOW TOPS,
	HANDKERCHIEFS,

And numerous other acceptable gifts.

MAIL ORDERS receive prompt and careful attention. When possible all Mail Orders filled the same day received. Return charges prepaid on all cash mail orders amounting to $5.00 or more.

BOYLAN-PEARCE CO.

Digitized by Google

Capital Stock, $30,000

¶A personal investigation will convince anyone that King's is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing. Reference: Every bank and leading business concern in Raleigh or Charlotte. College Journal and Special Offers Free.

We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand or Penmanship by mail.

Address, KING'S BUSINESS COLLEGE,

Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

Digitized by Google

Vol. V. APRIL, 1906 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

Page

Governor Thomas Pollok
By Mrs. John W. Hinsdale 219

The Battle of Cowan's Ford
By Maj. William A. Graham 232

First Settlers in North Carolina, Not Religious Refugees
By Rt. Rev. Joseph B. Cheshire, D. D. . . . 247

(ILLUSTRATED)

SINGLE NUMBERS 30 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Digitized by Google

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

VOLUME VI.

History involved in the names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina, ... Kemp. P. Battle, LL. D.

A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), ... Mr. James Sprunt.

The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina, Richard Dillard, M. D.

Gov. Thomas Burke, . . . Mr. J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton.

Some North Carolina Histories and their Authors, Professor Edward P. Moses.

The Borough Towns of North Carolina, . . Mr. Francis Nash.

The John White Pictures, ... Mr. W. J. Peele.

Gov. Jesse Franklin, ... Professor J. T. Alderman.

Industrial Life in Early North Carolina, . . Mr. T. M. Pittman.

Colonial and Revolutionary Costumes in North Carolina, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

North Carolina's Attitude to the Revolution.

The Fundamental Constitutions and the Effects on the Colony.

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1906. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 30 cents for single copy.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VI, are requested to notify at once.

Address,
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, North Carolina.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

Vol. V. APRIL, 1906. No. 4.

The NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

Digitized by Google

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:

MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:

MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER,
(Nee Hooper.)

RECORDING SECRETARY:

MRS. J. W. THACKSTON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:

MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:

MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:

MRS. ED. CHAMBERS SMITH.

GENEALOGIST:

MRS. HELEN DE BERNIÈRE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896–1902:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:

MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902–1906:

MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

Digitized by Google

THE POLLOK CREST

Digitized by Google

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. V APRIL, 1906 No. 4

GOVERNOR THOMAS POLLOK.

BY MRS. JOHN W. HINSDALE.

The crest of a Stricken Boar, with the motto: "Strong and Stout," were conferred by James IV. of Scotland upon Pollok of Balgra, who saved the life of his sovereign, when he was attacked while hunting, by a furious wild boar. These arms have been honorably borne by his descendants since that time.

Thomas Pollok was born on the 6th day of March, 1864. He was the son of Thomas Pollok of Balgra, near Glasco, in County Renfrew, Scotland. His grandfather was Thomas, his great-grandfather was David Pollok, of Balgra, who married Margaret, a daughter of the Rev. Zachery Boyd, an eminent Scotch divine, who was born before 1590 and died in 1653, one year before the birth of his great-grandson.

Zachery Boyd was a professor in the University of Saumur, in France, until the persecutions of the Protestants in that country in 1621 forced him to return to Scotland. He was the author of many religious works, and in his will he bequeathed the sum of 20,000 pounds Scots to the University of Glasco, on the condition that his rhymical version of the Old Testament should be published by the faculty. The bequest was accepted and one volume of the work was printed. This book is now preserved in a glass case in the university, his stone bust surmounts the court gateway, while his portrait is in the Divinity Hall of this seat of learning.

The following is an example of the rude versification employed by Dr. Boyd:

Digitized by Google

Pharaoh was a great rascal,
Because he would not let
The children of Israel
With their flocks and herds,
Wives and little ones,
Go three days' journey
Into the wilderness,
To keep the Paschal.

The writer is obliged to use modern spelling, as this couplet has been handed down by word of mouth, and was never seen in print.

Of the childhood of Thomas Pollok we know nothing, and but little of his early life. His elder brother James died when past middle age. His sister Margaret married her kinsman George Pollok, minister of Erskin, and his sister Helen married the Rev. David Robe, minister at Ballantree, who, after the accession of King William, moved with his family to Ireland.

Thomas Pollok landed in North Carolina on June 27, 1683. He came in the capacity of Deputy to Lord Carteret, one of the seven Lords Proprietors, to whom was granted by Charles II. on May 23, 1663, "all territory extending from the north of Luke Island, which lieth in the southern Virginian seas, southward as far as the river to St. Matthias, which bordereth upon the coast of Florida." (Col. Rec., vol. 1, p. 21.)

At this time the colony contained about five thousand inhabitants and was composed of a few settlements fringing the shores of Albemarle and Pamlico Sounds, and extending for a short distance on each side of the streams, which empty into these bodies of water.

At this time the fisheries were undeveloped, and with the exception of one grist mill, the inhabitants were without mechanical appliances. Many of the settlers pounded their grain in stone mortars, others were the happy possessors of hand-mills, which were so highly prized as to be bequeathed along with other personal property. Many of the houses were built of hewn logs and roofed with slabs, and as hardware was almost unattainable they were put together with wooden pins and the doors were hung on hinges of the same material; the chimneys were built of rough stone, which was brought as ballast in the ships from Barbadoes.

Digitized by Google

We know neither the size of Mr.. Pollok's house, nor the material of which it was made, but from his letters we find that he was surrounded with many of the comforts of life and by some of its elegancies; a silver ladle which belonged to him, and a great arm chair, made of walnut wood, in which he used to sit, are now the property of Mrs. John Devereux, of Raleigh.

About this time Boston plank was first imported, and the first brick were burned. In his will, Mr. Pollok left directions in regard to a house with brick chimneys and cellar, which was then in process of building for his son Cullen.

Great droves of hogs and cattle, which constituted the chief source of the wealth of the planters, roamed through the forests on the higher ground or "second lands," where they found abundant food in the wild fruits and mast, and in the natural herbage, which were produced in such quantities that no further supplies were needed. The winters were then, as now, so mild that no shelter was needed. The only care necessary was that they should be marked by cutting the ears. This was done at stated intervals, each planter having his own device; that adopted by Mr. Pollok was a "swallow fork and keel" (a notch and a crescent), and this mark was used by his descendants until after the Civil War. To change or to deface these marks was an offense severely punished by law. The soil was wonderfully productive, great crops of corn being raised in the river bottoms, or "low grounds."

As transportation with wheeled vehicles was impossible, each plantation had its water front, with wharves and landings, and each planter was the owner of many canoes, besides one or more vessels; some of these were small and only used locally, while others were of sufficient size to make the voyage to Boston and to the West Indies, and even sometimes to cross the ocean.

Digitized by Google

As there were no towns of sufficient size to serve as depots for the products of the colony, the mercantile transactions were principally in the hands of New England traders, who would visit the plantations, bringing their cargoes almost to the doors of the planters. As coin was scarce, they had recourse to a system of barter, exchanging their imported wares for skins, salt beef and pork, tallow, staves and tar, the Assembly having fixed a money value upon each of these rated commodities. These New Englanders also sold both negro and Indian slaves, Mr. Pollok's heirs owning many descendants of Narraganset Indians bought from these traders.

Many of the colonists were men of refinement and culture, as is shown by the chirography and diction of their letters, wills, etc. Some of them had left their homes for political reasons, and others were younger sons whom a spirit of adventure had prompted to seek their fortunes in a new land. As the plantations embraced great bodies of land, communication between their owners was often difficult, yet a pleasant social intercourse was kept up. Many were the gatherings beneath the hospitable roofs, and around the cheerful firesides, where the gentlemen enjoyed their "bumbo," or rum punch, and the ladies sipped their milder cups of tea and chocolate. Into this charmed circle Mr. Pollok was welcomed, and soon became prominent, both socially and in the government of the colony.

Being a strong churchman, he was one of the organizers of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton (then called Queen Anne's Creek). The first vestry met at the house of Mr. Thomas Gilliam, December 12, 1701, when Mr. Pollok was made a vestryman, and steps were at once taken to build the first church ever erected in North Carolina. It was a wooden building, "twenty-five feet long, posts in the ground and held to the cellar beams." (Col. Rec., vol. 1, p. 543.) It stood upon an acre of land given by Mr. Edward Smithwick, near the present site of Hays, once the historic home of the Johnston family. The first service was held in this church in January, 1703, yet the building was not completed until 1705. The delay was caused by the difficulty in procuring competent workmen, and also by the want of hinges, nails, screws, etc., needed for the interior finishing, which articles had to be brought from England. Mr. Pollok was also made church warden, but declined the position, preferring to pay the tax imposed for so doing, rather than perform the duties of the office.

Digitized by Google

"At a vestry meet of 29th day of September, 1705," Mr. Henry Gerrard was chosen minister to Chowan district, the church wardens agreeing to pay him 30 pounds sterling per annum besides voluntary contributions. The following amounts were given:

	L.	S.	D.
Col. Thomas Pollok	5	0	0
Wm. Duckingfield, Esq	4	0	0
John Arden, Esq	3	0	0
Mr. Edward Mosley	5	0	0
Capt. Thomas Luten	1	0	0
Mr. Nicholas Crisp	1	5	0
Mr. Edward Smithwick	1	0	0
Mr. John Blount	1	0	0
Mr. William Banbery	0	8	0
Mr. Matt. Chevin	1	0	0
John Wheatley	0	10	0
Richard Rose	0	10	0
John Linnington	0	15	0
Capt. David Henderson	0	20	0
Henry Bonner	0	10	0

As Mr. Gerrard proved unworthy to fill this sacred office, he was removed, to be succeeded by the Rev. Mr. Gordon. Mr. Pollok wrote to the Lords Proprietors thanking them for the appointment of this good man to be minister to the colony.

Digitized by Google

Before 1690, when Mr. Pollok returned to Scotland for a brief period, he had acquired great bodies of land lying along the Roanoke, Chowan and Trent Rivers. He resided sometimes on his plantation Balgra, near Queen Anne's Creek, and sometimes on another plantation called Salmon Creek. This year he was married to Mistress Martha West, widow of Robert West, Esq., and "daughter of Thomas Cullen, Esq., at Dover." She was the mother of his four children and died in 1701. Late in life he married Mistress Esther Wilkinson, whom he survived; there were no children by this marriage. He was a tender and a judicious father, sending his children to England that they might be educated as became their birth and station, thus fitting them for the high positions which they were to fill in after life. His eldest son, Thomas, succeeded his father as deputy to two of the Lords Proprietors. He was also surveyor-general to the colony and afterwards its Chief Justice. His second son, Cullen, entered the English army and served in the Low Countries under the Duke of Cumberland, holding the rank of Major at the battle of Fontenoy. Late in life he returned to Carolina and married, but left no sons.

George, the third son, married Sarah Swann. They left no children.

His daughter Martha married the Rev. Thomas Bray, who was sent to the colony as a missionary by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Compton, Bishop of London. Dr. Bray was a man of much learning and was the first to found a public library in North Carolina. He is also entitled to the honor of having originated the first systematic movement of the Church of England in the work of missions. (Hawks Hist. of N. C., vol. 2, page 339.)

Mrs. Bray died in 1719 without children.

After Culpepper's rebellion, Seth Stothel was appointed

Digitized by Google

Governor of North Carolina. On the voyage from England his ship was taken by pirates and he was held a prisoner for some months. Pehaps it was from his Algerian captors that he acquired a thorough contempt for justice and virtue, for during the six years in which he misruled North Carolina his character showed not a single redeeming trait; no one was safe from his rapacity and cruelty. He unjustly imprisoned Mr. Pollok without permitting him to see the cause of his "mittimus." For this and for still more heinous crimes he was severely reprimanded by the Lords Proprietors, yet was allowed to remain in office. Finally the patience of the people was exhausted and they seized upon him in order to send him to England, but he prayed that he might be tried by the next Assembly. This was accordingly done, and his judges decreed that he should immediately resign his government and depart the country in twelve months. (Williamson's Hist. of N. C., vol. 1, page 141.)

He was succeeded by Sir Philip Ludwell, who held office for four years. At the end of this time, 1694, Thomas Harvey was appointed Governor, and he at once made Mr. Pollok one of his council. For the next thirty years Mr. Pollok held office in the colony, both civil and military, being for a long period Major-General of its forces. It is true these were but a handful of men, ununiformed, undisciplined, and often unpaid, yet under the valiant leadership of their commander they saved the colony from destruction.

The period from 1708 to 1711, known as the "Cary Rebellion," was a time of chaos in North Carolina. The trouble arose from the negligence on Cary's part to render an account to the Lords Proprietors of the quit-rents accruing while he held the office of collector, as well as that of governor; he was superseded by William Glover, to whose authority he at first submitted, but soon after listened to bad advice and attempted to resume the government with an armed force. The citizens in general not caring to commit themselves to either party, "for two years and upwards there was no law, no justice, assembly or judicature, so that people did and said as they list." (Prefatory notes to C. R., vol. 1, page 28.) Mr. Pollok strongly opposed the Cary faction, but as he was unable to resist its power, he sought refuge in Virginia for the six months in which it held sway, returning to North Carolina upon the arrival of Governor Hyde in August, 1711.

Digitized by Google

Both sides now resorted to arms, and Cary attacked Queen Anne's Creek in hopes of carrying off the Governor in his brigantine, then lying in the Sound, but was repulsed without loss of life, and Governor Spottswood sending troops from Virginia, the rebels soon dispersed.

Mr. Pollok administered the oath of office to Governor Hyde "Friday ye ninth day of May, Ano. Di. 1712," being the same day confirmed in his office as deputy to John, Lord Carteret, son to Sir George Carteret, one of the original Lords Proprietors (C. R., vol. 1, p. 811).

On the ninth of September of the same year, Governor Hyde died of yellow fever, and on the twelfth Maj.-Gen. Pollok was unanimously chosen Governor pro tem. The position of Governor had already been tendered to him several times. An extract from a letter to the Lords Proprietors, dated September 20, 1712, says: "The real desire to serve her majesty, your lordships, and the poor people here, with the importunity of the council, has forced me to accept of the administration at this time when the country seems to labor under insuperable difficulties when in more peaceable times I have refused it. And I assure your lordships that I will faithfully and truly serve you to the uttermost of my power and knowledge until you are pleased to appoint some other. In the meantime, I think it is my duty, as briefly as I can, to lay before you the true state of the country." (Pollok's letter book, Hawks' Hist. of N. C., vol. 2, p. 407.)

At this time the condition of the colony was most precarious; not only was it torn by internal dissensions, distressed by a succession of bad crops, and crippled by an insufficient currency, but it was constantly threatened by a repetition of the Indian invasion, which had begun the previous year on the 11th of September with the massacre of all the white settlers south of Albemarle Sound. This day was long observed, by order of the Assembly, as a day of fasting and prayer.

Digitized by Google

Through the courage, firmness and moderation of Governor Pollok, the distressed colony was safely steered through these perils; with a cool head and a steady hand he put down the machinations of the Quakers, who refused to bear arms for the general defense, yet sedulously stirred up strife among their neighbors, thus adding to the already troubled state of affairs. Governor Pollok wrote to Lord Carteret on September 20th, 1712: "Governor Hyde has labored under great difficulties by the divisions and differences amongst the inhabitance, and by the Indian War, all of which, I believe, I may truly declare hath been directly occasioned by . . . and some few evil-disposed persons, with the whole body of Quakers, who joined them, and were their instruments to stir up Col. Cary to act as he did; and albeit these Quakers were very active in persuading and assisting the people to rise for Col. Cary, against Governor Hyde, yet now in this Indian war wherein Neuse and Pamlico are in great danger to be greatly deserted, yet they will neither assist themselves nor suffer others and will not so much as send their arms to those who are willing to go, and, as I am credibly informed, hide them for fear of their being pressed. So that now we labor under these difficulties following . . . chiefly by these Quakers, and some few evil-disposed persons, who have been a plague to this government these four or five years past and who may be easily known by Governor Hyde's reiterated complaints against them to your lordships." (Pollok Mss. Hawks' Hist. of N. C., vol. 2, p. 411.)

Every resource was now called into action, and the Quakers were temporarily frightened into a state of quiescence, while the manhood of the colony gathered around their intrepid leader. Assisted by an armed force from South Carolina under Colonel Barnwell, the Carolinians defeated the Indians in battle and captured their forts, thus rendering them comparatively harmless.

Digitized by Google

On November 25, 1712, a treaty of peace was signed between Governor Pollok, on the one side, and Tom Blount, Chief of the Tuscaroras, and five of his braves, on the other, by which the whites bound themselves to allow certain privileges to this tribe, to protect them from the inroads of the Cores and Mattamuskeets, their enemies; and also that their chief should henceforth be called "King Blount." While the red men promised to abstain from all acts of hostility, to give warning of any threatened invasion, to remain on their own lands and never to cross Contechney Creek, without blowing a horn, to attract the attention of the near settlers, and so obtain their permission to cross this boundary. This agreement was honorably respected by both parties, and thus was the colony saved from years of bloodshed and disaster. The original of this treaty with the signature of Governor Pollok and the tokens and marks of the Indians is now owned by Mrs. John Devereux, and can be seen in the Hall of History, Raleigh, N. C.

Soon after this an Indian belonging to the Five Nations was captured along with a hunting party from another tribe, who were strongly suspected of being on the war-path. Under the law which then existed the captive became the slave of the captor. As the evil intentions of this band could not be proved, and as the colony was at this time at peace with the Five Nations, Governor Pollok purchased the Indian at his private expense and sent him by sea, with a letter to Governor Schuyler of New York, asking that he be restored to his people.

During the winter of 1712-'13, when the forces under Colonel Barnwell wintered in North Carolina, so great was the scarcity of food in parts of the settlement, and so poor were the means of transportation, that it was impossible to collect at any one point a sufficient amount of provisions with which to feed the troops, and they were therefore divided into small parties, which were quartered in different localities wherever supplies were most abundant. To such straits was the colony reduced, before it readjusted itself under the leadership of this executive man.

Digitized by Google

In 1710, Christopher Baron DeGraffenreid, assisted by Colonel Mitchell, a Swiss gentleman, brought into the colony a number of Swiss and Palatins, six hundred souls all told, whom he settled near New Bern, promising to give to each family 250 acres of land, to furnish their farming implements, and for two years to supply them with necessary food and clothing. These immigrants were a simple and an industrious people, who, had they prospered, would have made for themselves comfortable and happy homes on the rich lands of Carolina, where the forests were full of game, the swamps and water-courses teemed with wild fowl and fish, and where a grain of corn dropped into the earth returned an hundred fold. No doubt De Graffenreid and his associate were honest in their intentions towards these unfortunate people, but disaster had marked them for her own. Internal dissensions, sickness, poverty and attacks from blood-thirsty Indians proved their ruin, and although large sums of money were advanced by Governor Pollok from his private purse and other material aid given by him, the settlement was broken up, and its members scattered amongst neighboring plantations. Many of the names of these people can still be found in Craven and the adjacent counties. Among the Pollok papers are many notes of hand and renewals, bearing the signature of Christopher De Graffenreid. An account of these transactions will be found in the Pollok letter book (C. R., vol. 2, p. 166).

Digitized by Google

Charles Eden was appointed Governor, on May 4, 1714, on which day Governor Pollok retired from office, and for the ensuing eight years lived on his plantations, devoting himself to his private interests, to those of the Lords Carteret and Beaufort, to whom he held the part of deputy for forty years, and in assisting the administration in every way in his power.

Upon the death of Governor Eden in 1722, the Assembly for the second time called upon Mr. Pollok to fill the executive chair. He was the first governor to hold two terms of office.

At this time he was sixty-eight years of age, not an old man, but no doubt enfeebled by the harassing cares and anxieties of his arduous life, yet he did not shrink from this renewed responsibility and entered at once upon the duties of his position. Six months later he was attacked by fever, which is said to have been aggravated by fresh annoyance from the Quakers, who had never ceased to cause him trouble. He died in office on August 30, 1722, having given the best years of his life to his adopted country. He was buried by the side of Martha, his wife, on his plantation Balgra, near the Roanoke River. Here they rested until about 1891, when the river had changed its course to such an extent as to undermine its banks and thus endanger the graves; the remains were therefore removed to St. Paul's churchyard, Edenton, as that was thought to be the fittest resting place for one of its founders.

Mr. Pollok's will shows that he bequeathed to his three sons, Thomas, Cullen and George, fifty-five thousand acres of land, including that on which the city of New Bern now stands, besides a large amount of personal property.

The eldest son, Thomas, married Elizabeth Sanderson, daughter of Col. Richard Sanderson, of Pasquotank, at whose house the first Colonial Assembly was held.

Cullen married, but left no sons.

George married Sarah Swan, and died childless.

Digitized by Google

Thomas Pollok and Elizabeth Sanderson left three sons—Thomas, Cullen and George. The last-named died an infant. Cullen married Anne Boothe, of Bath, England; there were many children by this marriage, all of whom died in infancy.

Thomas married Eunice Edwards, daughter of the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, of Connecticut. They had four children —Elizabeth, Thomas, Frances, and George.

Elizabeth married and died childless.

Thomas died in Italy in 1803. He was never married.

George will be hereafter mentioned.

Frances married John Devereux, Esq. They had three children, the Hon. Thomas Pollok Devereux, who was the father of the late Maj. John Devereux, Frances who married the Rt. Rev. Leonidas Polk, and George Devereux, Esq., who married Miss Johnson of Connecticutt.

George Pollok, son of Eunice Edwards and Thomas Pollok, and great-grandson of Governor Pollok, was killed by a fall from his horse in June, 1836. He was the last descendant to bear the name of Pollok.

This genealogy is taken from the family Bible, and also from an affidavit of Mrs. Eunice Pollok, made in 1820, in a suit involving the title to a tract of land which was decided in her favor.

The writer, who is in the seventh generation from Governor Pollok, has retained the original spelling of the name as found in the family Bible and in the private papers and letter-book of Governor Pollok.

Thanks are due to Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood for valuable references.

Digitized by Google

THE BATTLE OF COWAN'S FORD—THE PASSAGE OF THE CATAWBA RIVER BY LORD CORNWALLIS, FEBRUARY 1, 1781.

BY MAJOR WILLIAM A. GRAHAM.

When General Greene succeeded General Gates in the command of the Southern Army at Charlotte, December, 1780, he, with the main portion of the army, took position near Cheraw, S. C., to antagonize any movement of the enemy from Charleston or from Winnsboro into North Carolina. General Morgan, with whom was Colonel Washington and some of the North Carolina militia under Maj. Joseph McDowell, of Burke County, was placed between Cornwallis and the "loyalist" settlements of Tryon County and contiguous Tory territory in South Carolina. It was expected that McDowell, if necessity required, could be reinforced by other "over-the-mountain men." These men seem to have been almost unanimously true to the American cause, and promptly responded to all calls for service. When they left home there were none left behind to annoy their families or pillage their property.. Morgan was about equidistant from Cornwallis at Winnsboro and the British post at Ninety-Six (so called from its distance from Charleston), and could move to annoy either as occasion required. For a central army connecting with these two wings, General Greene relied upon the militia of Rowan and Mecklenburg, reinforced by that portion of Tryon County men who were true to the cause of liberty. These men, although not as numerous as could have been desired, were as patriotic as any in the colonies, and answered every call to service, notwithstanding that in doing so they left their property and families exposed to the depredations of their Tory neighbors.

The militia of these counties were divided into "details" or assignments; one of which was called into service as occasion demanded, for generally terms of three months and not to serve again until each of the other assignments had served a term. But when the enemy appeared in the adjacent territory the militia was called out "en masse" and they generally responded without claiming exemptions due for other service either as militia or in the "Line."

Digitized by Google

History of the Revolution does not show any people equal to the inhabitants of these counties in service in the struggle for independence—they were in fact soldiers cantonned upon their own families, ready to immediately respond to a call to service and to provide their own findings; in clothes, arms and ammunition. When notice was received, while the horse "ate a bite" the man cleaned his gun, "ran" some bullets and greased his patching; while the wife or mother cooked some rations, which no doubt included a few pies—a ration very popular with the citizens of that time and still much enjoyed by their descendants of the third and fourth generations. They would not remain in camp unless a fight was immediately on hand, but returned home, with or without leave, as soon as the enemy disappeared from the front or a battle had been fought. The reinforcements going to Ramsaur's Mill met participants in the fight returning home within an hour after the close of the action, two miles from the scene. Colonel Davie could never keep over a third of his numbers available unless he could assure them that there would be a fight in a day or two.

General Greene immediately ordered General Davidson to call a detail of the militia into service for three months. General Davidson commanded the militia of the district (Salisbury), and assumed direct command of the detachments in service. General Davie had heretofore recruited and commanded the cavalry deemed necessary to act with the militia; he had accepted the position of Commissary-General; the term of service of his last command had expired in November.

Digitized by Google

General Davidson, in January, when it became evident that Cornwallis was about to begin his campaign, proposed to Adjutant Joseph Graham to raise the necessary cavalry command; promising him such rank as commanding officer as the number of men recruited would justify. In a short time he had enlisted from among the young men, most of whom had served one or more terms of service, fifty-six; only five of whom were married. These men were to furnish their own horses, arms and accoutrements, and upon serving six weeks were to be credited with a three-months' tour. The swords and scabbards were made principally by the smiths and shoemakers of the vicinity in which the men lived. They no doubt when formed in line presented an appearance similar to that of some of their descendants in the commencement of hostilities in 1861. Most of them had rifles, and they were prepared for action either mounted or on foot. The first move of Cornwallis was to destroy Morgan's force, or to push it before him out of South Carolina so as to prevent him, if further reinforced by the "over-the-mountain men," from capturing the post of Ninety-Six and subduing the Tories in that section. For this purpose he dispatched Colonel Tarleton.

In the battle of Cowpens, January 17th, Morgan defeated Tarleton, killing ten officers and ninety men and capturing twenty-three officers and five hundred men—the casualties being about two-thirds of Tarleton's force. In his "Campaigns," Tarleton attributes his defeat to Lord Cornwallis not moving his army up Broad River, as he had requested and expected him to do, so as to be in supporting distance. The place was called Cowpens, being a point where "the range" cattle were annually gathered that the calves might be marked with the ear-mark of the owner of the mother. Cornwallis, being nearer the fords of the Catawba than Morgan, now endeavored to anticipate him in reaching that river—but being uncertain as to the route Morgan would pursue, delayed by swollen streams, and thinking he would pursue one of the most direct routes, moved so as to change his course as information he might receive would require. He reached Ramsaur's Mill (Lincolnton) on the afternoon of the 24th and, having about abandoned the idea of overtaking Morgan, remained there, collecting a supply of breadstuffs and grain, three days. Before leaving this point he reduced his wagon train to the lowest amount that could accommodate his army, and destroyed all surplus baggage and wagons. The loss of the six hundred men at Cowpens, which was equal to at least a sixth of his available force,—aided in the reduction of transportation necessary for his command.

Digitized by Google

Tarleton gives this account of the transaction: "Earl Cornwallis reduced the size and quantity of his own baggage and his laudable example was followed by general and other officers under his command." The surplus baggage and wagons were burned. After the battle of Cowpens, Morgan, perhaps to avoid delays which might be incurred on account of swollen streams, passed around the mountains that divide the headwaters of the South Fork from those of the main Catawba, and through the present site of Morganton and arrived at the present location of Maiden, only ten miles from Cornwallis, on the 25th. After this he was not over twenty miles distant from him until he crossed the Catawba. Upon learning of Cornwallis' position he committed the prisoners to Colonel Washington and the militia, who turned to the left, and crossed the Catawba at Island Ford.

Morgan, with his immediate command, taking the Sherrill's Ford road, which placed him between Washington and Cornwallis, crossed the Catawba at Sherrill's Ford on the afternoon of the 30th of January. After crossing the river Washington turned down the stream and united with Morgan's forces. The militia with the prisoners passed on, by way of Statesville and probably to Salem by Shallow Ford, and thence to Virginia. I have never seen a statement as to the route pursued. Morgan and Washington's troops followed the Sherrill's Ford road to Salisbury. Cornwallis reached the Catawba at Beattie's Ford on the afternoon of the 28th, and says he found the river too swollen to cross and retired about four miles to the plantation of Jacob Forney, a wealthy farmer and prominent Whig, (the place is now owned by Mrs. Sallie Hall—near it stands the rock, about six feet long, three wide and two high, which Cornwallis used as a table, and which has since been known as "Cornwallis' table"), where he had been directed by a Tory (Deck) of the vicinity as a place that provisions could be had. When Cornwallis left the country, Forney sought for Deck and informed him that he would kill him, but upon Deck's entreaty and promise to leave the State, he permitted him to emigrate. As to the swollen condition of the river, General Graham says: "It was not more flush than usual at this season and that it was fordable from a week before until two days after this; that General Davidson's cavalry frequently crossed it during these days." Some historians have Cornwallis pursuing Morgan and arriving at Sherrill's Ford a very short time (a few hours) after Morgan had crossed, and finding the river had suddenly risen and enabled him to escape. The Yadkin on account of the rain on the 1st rose on the 2d and 3d of February so that, although Morgan's forces and some other troops had crossed that day, General O'Hara found some militia unable to cross, with whom there was an engagement that afternoon. It is confusion of these two points that causes error as to the condition of the Catawba.

Digitized by Google

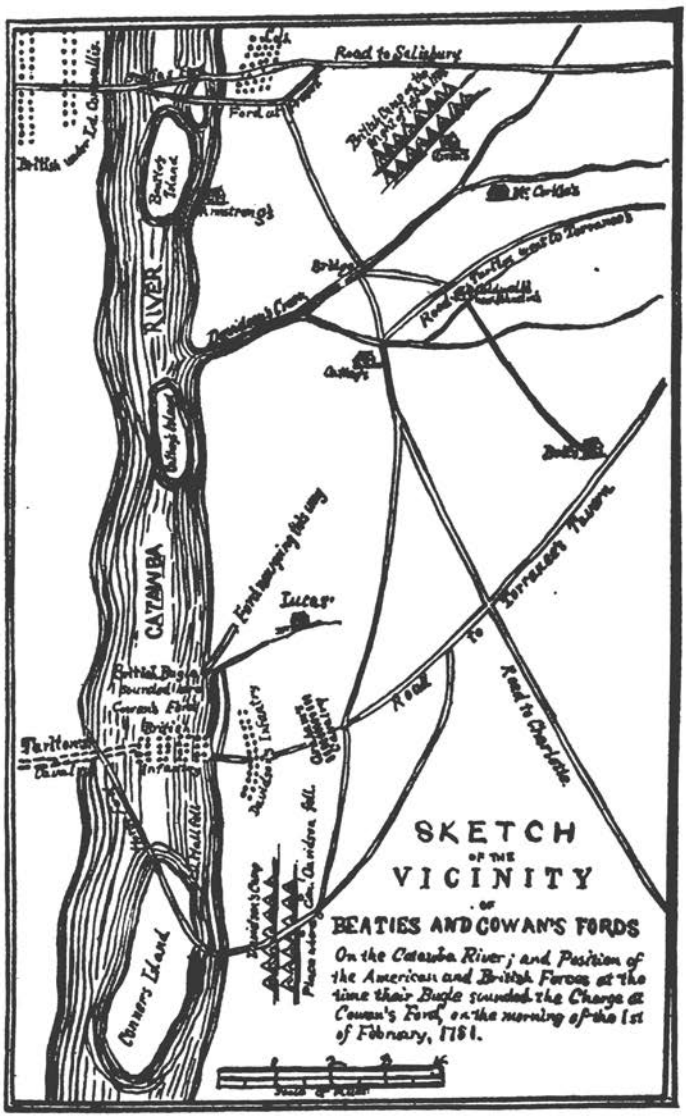
Beattie's Ford, while the best Ford on the river, has always had a deep current near each bank, which a very slight rise causes to be too deep for wagons to cross without getting their contents wet. The road at this time went above the island and was probably deeper than now at the east bank (see map). Cornwallis' train had a large quantity of flour which had just been procured at Ramsaur's Mill; it was probably in order to preserve this that he delayed his crossing, or perhaps finding the public fords guarded, delayed to find passage by a private one. Cornwallis informed Tarleton before the campaign opened that he would cross "at some public ford above Tuckasegee." Toole's was the only one between Tuckasegee and Beattie's, and when Cornwallis learned that Morgan had escaped, he naturally turned to Beattie's for the passage of his artillery and provision train. It was the most suitable for this purpose. General Davidson, upon the approach of Cornwallis, made disposition of his forces to oppose his crossing. He placed at Tuckasegee two hundred militia under Col. John Williams, of Surrey County; at Toole's seventy men under Captain Potts, of Mecklenburg; at Cowan's, twenty-five under Lieut. Thomas Davidson, of Mecklenburg. Trees were felled and fortifications erected at Toole's and Tuckasegee. At Beattie's he assembled the Mecklenburg infantry under Col. William Polk; the Orange militia under Colonel Farmer; and the Rowan militia, also Graham's company of cavalry. Orange County seems to have been the only troops from a distance who had promptly responded; the others under Butler and Eaton not joining General Greene until a day or two before the battle of Guilford Court-house. Graham's cavalry crossed at Beattie's Ford on January 30th, and ascertained that the enemy were at Forney's. Their cavalry was at Colonel Black's, within two miles of the ford.

Digitized by Google



Digitized by Google

General Greene, learning of the movements of Cornwallis, ordered the forces at Cheraw to immediately proceed to Beattie's Ford. He went in advance, directing General Davidson to notify General Morgan and Colonel Washington that he wished to meet them at Beattie's Ford on the afternoon of January 31st, perhaps naming the hour. They arrived at the appointed place at two o'clock, and in ten minutes General Greene and his aide, Major Pierce, rode up. These, with General Davidson, retired out of camp, took a seat on a log, and after twenty minutes' conference, Morgan and Washington departed by a route that led to their command under General Howard. General Greene went direct to Salisbury. Why General Greene did not order these troops to Beattie's Ford I have never seen suggested by any one. The five hundred men under Howard and Washington were a more efficient force than all Davidson's command. He writes at Beattie's Ford a most earnest appeal to Col. Francis Locke to assemble the Rowan militia en masse; chides the militia for slow response to General Davidson's call, and tells him that the "Continental army is marching with all possible dispatch from the Pee Dee (Cheraw) to this place." Then why not bring Morgan and Washington, one or both, as reinforcements? Colonel Locke did not get his men organized in time to meet Cornwallis at Beattie's Ford, but we find him in his front when he leaves Salisbury on February 4th. There was no more meritorious officer than Francis Locke in the war. The cause of the slow response was probably the aversion of the men to camp life and the uncertainty as to when there would be an engagement. Wheeler states that Morgan was dissatisfied with the route General Greene insisted he should take on his retreat, and when the forces were all united at Guilford Court-house Morgan retired from service before the battle and went to his farm in Virginia. He either wished to join the prisoners via Salem or to come to Beattie's Ford, as he followed the only remaining route via Salisbury; to connect with which Howard was moving when he came to meet Greene. While the American officers were in consultation, a detachment of some four or five hundred British appeared on the hills on the west side of the river, and the officers seemed to be viewing the American position through spy-glasses. This was thought to be Cornwallis and his staff. Shortly after General Greene left, General Davidson ordered the Mecklenburg militia, under Colonel Polk, and Graham's cavalry to move to Cowan's Ford, leaving Colonel Farmer in command of the forces at Beattie's Ford. General Greene told General Davidson that he thought that "the enemy intended to cross the river; that the cavalry would probably be passed by some private ford that night, and in the morning when the infantry attempted a passage, would attack the forces at the point in the rear." He ordered that patrols of those best acquainted with the country should be maintained all night between Beattie's and Tuckasegee fords, and any discovery of the enemy be reported immediately to headquarters. The troops arrived at Cowan's Ford after dark and too late to examine positions.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

"The river here is supposed to be about four hundred yards wide, of different depths and rocky bottom. That called the wagon ford went directly across and was at that time generally used for the passage of vehicles. At the eastern shore the road turns down the river and winds up the point of the ridge in order to graduate the ascent. Above the coming out place a flat piece of ground not much higher than the water; overgrown with haw and persimmon bushes and bambo briars; five or six yards wide extends up the river about thirty-one poles to the mouth of a small branch and a deep ravine. Outside of this the bank rises thirty or forty feet at an angle of thirty degrees of elevation; then the ascent is more gradual."

The "horse ford" (which is now more generally used, in fact almost universally for both horses and vehicles) "comes in on the west at the same place as the 'wagon'; goes obliquely to the right down the river about two thirds of the way across, to the upper point of a large island, thence through the island and across the other third of the river to the end of a rocky hill. This way is longer but much shallower and smoother, and reaches the bank about a fourth of a mile below the wagon route." General Davidson thought that if the enemy attempted to cross here it would be by way of the horse ford, and placed Colonel Polk with the Mecklenburg militia and Graham's cavalry upon the hill which overlooks it. Lieutenant Davidson, with his picket, remained at his station about forty steps above the wagon ford. Cornwallis, by patrols finding that all the principal fords were occupied by Americans, used Tory guides and spies to ascertain the condition of the private fords; and determined to cross his first force at Cowan's (McCowan's, he and Tarleton call it) while making a demonstration with his other force at Beattie's. It will be recollected that up to dark of the night before only Lieutenant Davidson and twenty-five men were here and they were at the wagon ford. This was probably the last information he received before reaching the river. He says: "I approached the river by short marches so as to give the enemy equal apprehension for several fords, and after having procured the best information in my power, I resolved to attempt the passage at a private ford then slightly guarded near McCowan's Ford."

Digitized by Google

This would indicate that his intention was to have crossed by the wagon ford where there was no opposing force at his last report; not having learned of the moving of General Davidson with the Mecklenburg troops from Beattie's to Cowan's Ford, as they did not reach position until after dark. Upon reaching the river he says: "It was evident from the number of fires on the other side that there would be greater opposition than I had expected." He probably, as the fires upon the hill at the horse ford were so much more numerous than at the wagon, concluded at once to travel the latter route, and did not do so, as Steadman says, because the "guide fled in the middle of the stream," and he determined to go directly across. This would have landed him about half way between the out-go of the fords and where there was no road up the bank of the river. The fords separated as soon as the river was entered and the guide took him by the wagon ford from bank to bank (see map).

Digitized by Google

Having ordered Colonel Webster to move with his command and the wagon train, so as to be at Beattie's Ford, six miles above Cowan's, by daylight, and "to make every possible demonstration" of intention to force a passage, as soon as he heard firing at Cowan's, Cornwallis, at 1 o'clock a. m., February 1st, took up line of march for Cowan's with following force, viz., brigade of guards, regiment of Bose, 23d Regiment, two hundred cavalry under Tarleton, and two three-pounders. Part of the way a new road was cut, and on account of darkness one cannon was overturned and part of the troops losing the line of march were delayed. The head of the column reached the river as "day began to break." Cornwallis determined to move on immediately without waiting for arrival of the delayed troops. He committed the immediate command to General O'Hara. This has caused the error of General Graham and others that Cornwallis personally did not cross here, but at Beattie's. Orders were not to fire until they gained the opposite bank. Fred Hager, a Tory who lived in the neighborhood, was guide. General O'Hara formed his command in column of fours, muskets with fixed bayonets carried upon the left shoulder and cartridge boxes upon the same shoulder; each footman had a staff about eight feet long, which he used when necessary to support himself against the rapidity of the current, the water being waist deep and sometimes deeper. The infantry was in front, the Brigade Guards leading and Tarleton's cavalry bringing up the rear. On account of the fog Lieutenant Davidson's picket did not perceive the enemy until they were one hundred yards in the water. The picket immediately opened fire. General Davidson formed at the horse ford and ordered Graham to move rapidly to reinforce Lieutenant Davidson; by the time they reached the point, tied their horses and went into action the enemy were within fifty yards of the bank. The effect of their fire was visible and the front ranks looked thin. They halted; Colonel Hall, the first man to appear mounted, was about one hundred yards from the bank and came pressing forward, giving orders. The column again moved forward. Thomas Barnett, one of Graham's men, by a well-aimed shot, unhorsed Colonel Hall and at the same time a shot from some one else threw his horse; several soldiers went to his aid and brought him to land. Notwithstanding the fire was steadily continued the enemy pressed on. As each section reached the shore the men dropped their poles and brought their muskets and cartridge boxes to proper position; faced to the left and moved up the narrow strip of low ground, so that the others as they landed could form on their right. They immediately began to load and fire up the bank. The Americans gave back, and upon loading would advance to the summit of the hill, thirty steps from the enemy and fire. General Davidson, arriving upon the scene and finding Graham's Cavalry in the position he wished the infantry to occupy, also impressed with General Greene's opinion that the enemy's cavalry would attack him in the rear, ordered Graham to retire, mount his men and form on the ridge two hundred yards in his rear, in order to meet any attack in that quarter.

Digitized by Google

As the cavalry moved off the infantry took their places, and the fire became brisk upon both sides. The enemy moved steadily forward, their fire increasing until their left reached the mouth of the branch; thirty poles from the ford. The ravine was too steep to be passed. The rear of their infantry and front of their cavalry was about the middle of the river; when the bugle sounded on their left, their fire slackened and nearly ceased; they were loading their pieces. In about a minute it sounded again, when their whole line from the ford to the branch advanced up the bank with their arms at a trail. The hill was so steep in many places that they had to pull up by the bushes. General Davidson, finding them advancing with loaded arms, ordered a retreat down the river for one hundred yards—the fire being so severe he continued his retreat fifty yards further, and ordered his men to renew the battle taking position behind the trees—the enemy was advancing slowly and firing scatteringly when General Davidson was pierced by a ball and fell dead from his horse..

Digitized by Google

The militia immediately broke and fled through the thickets to avoid the enemy's cavalry: Graham's cavalry retired in good order and preserved their formation. General Davidson was shot by a small rifle ball, and supposed to be by the Tory guide Fred Hager, as he owned a gun of that description, and the British had none of this kind. Cornwallis' horse was shot and fell dead as he emerged from the river. On February 2nd Cornwallis, in general orders returns his thanks to the "Brigade of Guards for their cool and determined bravery in the passage of the Catawba while rushing through that long and difficult ford under a galling fire." The American loss beside General Davidson was Robert Beatty, of Graham's Cavalry, James Scott, of Lieutenant Davidson's picket, and one of the militia. The British admit a loss of Colonel Hall and three privates killed and thirty-six privates wounded. General Graham says an official statement in the Charleston Gazette two months afterwards, states the killed to have been Colonel Hall and another officer and twenty-nine privates, total, thirty-one; and thirty-five wounded. The number of dead in this account may be too large, and it is hardly probable that any officer beside Colonel Hall was killed, as he was buried by himself, unless he was among several dead who were found on fish traps just below the ford and on rocks and brush along the banks, and whom Cornwallis may not have counted. The dead of both armies were buried on the hill, near the field of battle, except General Davidson whose body was not discovered by the enemy. Upon effecting his crossing Cornwallis directed Tarleton to go immediately to Webster's assistance by attacking Farmer in the rear—but learning that the Americans had retired from Beattie's Ford he dispatched him to gain information of their movements.

Digitized by Google

A tree marking the place where General Davidson fell is still shown. He was buried that night by torchlight at Hopewell Church. For many years the grave of Colonel Hall was marked by the rocks at the head and feet, but the river has covered it with sand in its overflows and the knowledge of the exact location has been lost.

The changing of position of Graham's Cavalry before the infantry had occupied their position and become actively engaged seems to be the mistake of the action and the advantage thus gained by the enemy could not be overcome. It would also seem that if the approach of the enemy could have been discerned in time to have placed the militia at the wagon ford, they would have been seriously crippled if not defeated, but Cornwallis did not change the route he intended to cross and of which Davidson had been apprised, until he discerned by the fires that the horse ford was well protected.

Webster was on time at Beattie's Ford, and as soon as he heard firing at Cowan's opened with his artillery and sent a company into the river who fired several rounds. The Americans suffered no loss as they were masked by the point of the hill—the ford then coming out on the eastern bank some distance above present place. (See map.) The firing of the cannon and platoons of musketry at Beattie's Ford reverberated down the river and across the country—it could be heard for a distance of twenty-five miles by the families and friends of the Americans in the engagement. Colonel Farmer being notified by an aide of General Davidson that the enemy had crossed, retired toward Salisbury. The pickets at other points on the river were notified and retired to Jno. McKitt Alexander's that afternoon, eight miles from Charlotte, and by noon on the 2d of February all who still remained for service were collected at Harris' Mill on Rocky River.

Digitized by Google

Cornwallis thus without serious loss had overcome one of the most formidable obstacles in his route. That night he united his forces at Given's farm, two miles from Beattie's Ford, and again assumed command. He had been in pursuit of Morgan since the battle of Cowpens—but never struck his trail until February 3rd, about sixteen miles from Salisbury, where the road from Sherrill's intersects that from Beattie's Ford.

I deem it unnecessary to refer in this connection to the "Henry pamphlet" concerning this battle. Reference is made to it in Gen. Jos. Graham and his Revolutionary Papers, the quotations in this paper from the British commanders corroborate General Graham's statements even more fully.

Authorities:

Gen. Joseph Graham and his Revolutionary Papers.

Tarleton's Campaign, 1780 and 1781, in the Southern Provinces of North America.

Hunter's Sketches of Western North Carolina.

Wheeler's History of North Carolina.

Colonial Records.

Digitized by Google

FIRST SETTLERS IN NORTH CAROLINA NOT RELIGIOUS REFUGEES.

A STUDY IN ORIGINS.

BY RT. REV. JOSEPH BLOUNT CHESHIRE, D.D.
(Bishop of North Carolina.)

All the local histories of North Carolina, and such of the general histories of the United States as have treated particularly of our affairs, agree in the statement that the first settlers on the north side of Albemarle Sound were Quakers and other religious refugees, fleeing from the intolerance of Churchmen in Virginia and of the Puritans in New England. Williamson, Martin, Wheeler, Hawks, Moore, are at one with Bancroft thus far, that the first settlers sought in North Carolina a haven of rest from religious persecution. It is not hard to understand how such a theory originated, and obtained popular acceptance, in times long subsequent to the settlement. It is not easy, however, to understand how such an account should have been accepted, and solemnly repeated from mouth to mouth, by men who have professed to give us history from the original documents and authorities.

It fell to the lot of the present writer, in a brief pamphlet published early in 1886, to challenge this accepted theory, and to point out how contemporary witnesses and records show it to be utterly false. Convinced by this slight performance, the late Col. Wm. L. Saunders, in his prefatory note to the first volume of the North Carolina Colonial Records, rejected the tradition of our former historians, and gave the first true and rational account of the inducements which led the first immigrants to Albemarle.[1] A few years later Mr. Stephen B.

[1] I had it from Col. Saunders himself that my pamphlet of 1886 had convinced him. "You have not only proved, you have demonstrated your case," were his words.

Digitized by Google

Weeks published a more extended study on the same subject, which however was little more than an elaboration of the argument of the pamphlet of 1886, illustrated by more copious citations of the authorities referred to. The importance of the subject and the very limited circulation of the publications referred to, seem to justify this attempt to set forth the truth as to this question: whether our first settlers were religious refugees.

In the absence of explicit accounts of the religious opinions of the settlers along the Albemarle Sound in the latter half of the seventeenth century, our historians have indulged their imagination in helping them to conclusions. Because Drummond was a Scotchman, Bancroft, without the least shadow of evidence, assumes that he was a Presbyterian; and George Durant must needs be a Puritan, because in 1649 (when, as we now know, George Durant was a lad of seventeen), Governor Berkley had banished from Virginia one Mr. Durand, "the elder of a Puritan very orthodox congregation." Leaving such discreditable guess-work, let us examine the scanty records of those days, and follow whither they lead.

In the spring of 1672, ten years after Durant's settlement and nine years after the first charter and the appointment of Drummond as Governor, William Edmundson, a Quaker preacher and a companion of George Fox, left Fox in Maryland and came by way of Virginia into the settlements on the north side of the Albemarle. Two of his brethren accompanied him, and after a painful and dangerous journey through the woods and swamps, they arrived on a Sunday morning at the house of Henry Phillips on Perquimans River. This man and his wife had been converted to Quakerism in New England, and had removed to Carolina in 1665; "and not having seen a Friend" [i. e. a Quaker] "in seven years before, they wept for joy to see us," writes Edmundson in his journal. Though wearied and wet to the skin from traveling all night in the rain, Edmundson desired that notice should be sent through the neighborhood for a meeting at midday, and in the meantime he lay down to rest. "About the time appointed," he writes, "many people came, but they had little or no religion, for they came and sat down in the meeting smoking their pipes. In a short time the Lord's testimony arose in the authority of His power, and their hearts being reached by it, several of them were tendered and received the testimony. After meeting they desired me to stay with them, and let them have more meetings.

Digitized by Google

"One Tems, a justice of the peace, and his wife, were at the meeting, who received the truth with gladness, and desired to have the next meeting at their house, about three miles off on the other side of the water; so we had a meeting there the next day, and a blessed time it was, for several were tendered with a sense of the power of God, and received the truth, and abode in it." The next morning Edmundson left them and journeyed back to Virginia.

It is plain from the foregoing narrative that Henry Phillips and his family were the only Quakers in that part of the settlement. It is not an unfair inference that they were the only Quakers then in Albemarle. Having taken so long and painful a journey into Carolina to visit this family, who do not seem to have been personally known to him before, it is not probable that Edmundson would have departed without visiting any others who might have been in the Albemarle country; it being a comparatively easy journey by water to almost any part of the settlements.

In November of this same year 1772,[2] George Fox made his first visit to Carolina. He gives in his journal very few names of places, and those which he gives do not correspond [2] Dr. Hawks says that this visit of Fox was in September. Fox says "the ninth month." At that time the year began with "Lady Day"—March 25th—so that November was the ninth month, hence its name.

Digitized by Google

with any other writing of that day, or with any known map of the regions he traversed. But the physical features of the country enable us to follow his steps fairly well. He came from Nansemond in Virginia, and having traveled several days through woods and swamps, he spent a night at "Summertown." This place is well known, and from this point his journal proceeds:

"Next day, the twenty-first of the ninth month, having travelled hard through the woods, and over many bogs and swamps, we reached Bonner's Creek[3]; there we lay that night by the fire side, the woman lending us a mat to lie on.

"This was the first house we came to in Carolina; here we left our horses, over-wearied with travel. From hence we went down the creek in a canoe to Macocomocock river, and came to Hugh Smith's, where people of other professions came to see us (no Friends inhabiting that part of the country), and many of them received us gladly. Amongst others came Nathaniel Batts, who had been governor of Roan-oak. He went by the name of Captain Batts, and had been a rude, desperate man. He asked me about a woman in Cumberland, who, he said, he was told, had been healed by our prayers and laying on of hands, after she had been long sick and given over by the physicians: he desired to know the certainty of it. I told him we did not glory in such things, but many such things had been done by the power of Christ.

"Not far from hence we had a meeting among the people, and they were taken with the truth; blessed be the Lord! Then passing down the river Maratic in a canoe, we went down the bay Connie-oak, to a captain's, who was loving unto us, and lent us his boat, for we were much wetted in the canoe, the water flashing in on us. With this boat we went [3] This is plainly meant for "Bennett's Creek," by a mistake either of Fox or his printer. It is a mistake very readily made by those not familiar with the peculiarities of manuscript of that date.

Digitized by Google

to the governor's, but the water in some places was so shallow that the boat being loaded, could not swim; so that we put off our shoes and stockings, and waded through the water a pretty way. The governor and his wife received us lovingly; but a doctor there would needs dispute with us. And truly his opposing us was of good service, giving occasion for the opening of many things to the people concerning the Light and Spirit of God, which he denied to be in every one; and affirmed it was not in the Indians. Whereupon I called an Indian to us, and asked him, 'Whether or no, when he did lie, or do wrong to any one, there was not something in him that did reprove him for it.' He said 'There was such a thing in him that did so reprove him; and he was ashamed when he had done wrong, or spoken wrong.' So we shamed the doctor before the governor and people, insomuch that the poor man ran out so far, that at length he would not own the Scriptures. We tarried at the governor's that night; and next morning he very courteously walked with us himself about two miles through the woods, to a place whither he had sent our boat about to meet us. Taking leave of him we entered our boat and went about thirty miles to Joseph Scot's, one of the representatives of the country. There we had a sound, precious meeting; the people were tender, and much desired after meetings. Wherefore at a house about four miles further, we had another meeting; to which the governor's secretary came, who was the chief secretary of the province, and had been formerly convinced.

"I went from this place among the Indians, and spoke to them by an interpreter, showing them, 'That God made all things in six days, and made but one woman for one man; and that God did drown the old world because of their wickedness. Afterwards I spoke to them concerning Christ, showing them that he died for all men, for their sins, as well as for others,' and had enlightened them as well as others, and that if they did that which was evil he would burn them, but if they did well they should not be burned.' There was among them their young king and others of their chief men, who seemed to receive kindly what I said to them.

Digitized by Google

"Having visited the north part of Carolina, and made a little entrance for truth among the people there, we began to return again towards Virginia, having several meetings on our way, wherein we had good service for the Lord, the people being generally tender and open; blessed be the Lord! We lay one night at the secretary's, to which we had much ado to get; for the water being shallow, we could not bring our boat to shore. But the secretary's wife, seeing our strait, came herself in a canoe, her husband being from home, and brought us to land. By next morning our boat was sunk and full of water, but we got her up and mended her, and went in her that day about twenty-four miles, the water being rough and the winds high; but the great power of God was seen, in carrying us safe in that rotten boat. In our return we had a very precious meeting at Hugh Smith's; praised be the Lord forever! There was at this meeting an Indian Captain, who was very loving, and acknowledged it to be the truth that was spoken. There was also one of the Indian priests, whom they call a Pauwaw, who sat soberly among the people. The ninth of the tenth month we got back to Bonner's-Creek, having spent about eighteen days in North Carolina."

Fox seems to have been accompanied by a number of his brethren, whose names he does not give. William Edmundson was not one of them, as Dr. Hawks asserts, for Edmundson's Journal shows that before this time he had left Fox and had sailed for Ireland.

Notwithstanding the singularity of some of Fox's names, one point settles the route by which he entered Carolina. He spent a night at Somerton, and the next day's journey brought him to "Bonner's Creek," where he says, "was the first house we came to in Carolina."

Digitized by Google

Now whether the conjecture that "Bonner's" is Fox's or his printer's mistake for "Bennett's" be correct or not, one thing is plain—that this creek was within one day's ride, on jaded horses, of Somerton, and that it was just within the Carolina border. The creek, therefore, whatever its name, was an affluent of the Chowan river, which Fox calls by the strange name of "Macocomocock." A glance at a map of this region makes this quite evident. Dr. Hawk's contention that this "Macocomocock" river was the Roanoke is not only baseless, it is impossible. Fox's route, as detailed by him, cannot be made to bring him at this point to any river, but the Chowan. And at Hugh Smith's on this river he says that "people of other professions came to see us (no friends inhabiting that part of the country)." "Then passing down the river Maratic in a canoe we went down the bay Connie-oak." Thence he goes to "the governor's," and then the next day thirty miles in his boat brings him apparently into contact with those who had heard Edmundson's preaching, and been "formerly convinced." Plainly then Fox came in by way of Chowan river, and the bay called by him "Connie-oak," must have been Edenton bay. The waters between the mouth of the river and this bay he calls "Maratic"—probably from Moratoc—the Indian name of the river Roanoke. From "Connie-oak" to the residence of the governor, and then thirty miles eastward, as he traversed the waterways of the colony, probably brought him to the eastern limits of the settlements. Thus he practically covered the whole colony in his visit of eighteen days. He tells us expressly that no Friends inhabited the country along the Chowan, from the Virginia line down toward Edenton, and his narrative distinctly reveals the fact that there were none in the other sections which he visited, except one or two scattered individuals. At the same time it is apparent that his influence was felt by the people, and that he had some effect in introducing his peculiar form of religion into the colony. He may have done more in the way of organizing congregations than his narrative discloses; but certainly his journal and Edmundson's prove beyond question that the country had not been settled by their co-religionists. They nowhere speak of meeting any number of their brethren, or of any evidence that their peculiar form of worship was known to the people. Fox's words when, having reached the eastern limits of his journey, he turns back towards Virginia, are a sufficient proof that no considerable number of his followers had preceded him into these regions: "Having visited the north parts of Carolina and made a little entrance for the truth among the people there, we began to return again towards Virginia."

Digitized by Google

Edmundson and Fox were the first Quaker preachers who visited Albemarle and they give us the first accounts we have of the religious condition of the country. From them it seems dear that there had been up to that time no public religious worship regularly established or used, and that the people had no special sectarian prejudices but were ready to accept any simple form of Christian teaching and worship which might be presented to them. Edmundson's services, if they may be so called, were the first exercises of public worship ever held in the colony, so far as we know. If there had been any number of Quakers scattered among the people, is it possible to believe that, with their strong religious feelings and their simple methods of worship, requiring no minister, and expressing itself in no sacrament or formal ordinance, they would not have gathered themselves into "meetings," and made their unconventional mode of worship familiar to the people, as they began to do immediately after these visits of Fox and Edmundson? The direct testimony of these first preachers is really not necessary, though it is on record, to show that the first settlers were not Quakers.

Digitized by Google

It is also to be noted that in the first act of the Assembly of Albemarle which has come down to us, ratified by the Proprietors in January, 1670, and certainly adopted by the Assembly before there had been the least interference on the part of the Proprietors in the matter of religion, no provision is made for recognizing the form of marriage practised among the "Friends," which would have been quite as valid upon the principles of the Common Law as the marriage by a magistrate; and if the Quaker influence had at that time prevailed in the Colony there seems to be no good reason why they might not have made provision for validating their peculiar form of marriage. As early as 1667 Fox had delivered himself on this subject for the guidance of his followers: "I was moved to open the state of our marriages, declaring 'How the people of God took one another in the assembly of the elders; and that it was God who joined man and woman together before the fall. And though men had taken upon them to join in the fall, yet in the restoration it is God's joining that is right and honorable marriage; but never any priest did marry any, that we read of in the Scriptures, from Genesis to Revelations.'" This was a point on which the Quakers laid great stress, and which they consistently carried out in practice, even when it must have been at the risk of great scandal and inconvenience. Here in Albemarle where there were no ministers, and therefore none of those religious rites to which they objected; and where the Assembly framed the law for their peculiar local necessities, they would surely have provided for legalizing their own customs had they formed any influential element in the population. So far from this act concerning marriages showing any trace of Quaker influence, there is a distinct note of feeling in the way in which it mentions "the rites and customs of our native country, the Kingdom of England;" the rites and customs here alluded to being those that were consistently repudiated and reviled by the Quakers.

Digitized by Google

It should further be remembered that at this very time the Proprietors were careful, both in their Fundamental Constitutions and in their instructions to Governor Stevens, to respect the principles and feelings of the Quakers both in regard to this very matter of marriage and in regard to the taking of oaths. So we have the curious spectacle of the Lords Proprietors showing more solicitude to avoid wounding the sensibilities of the Quakers than is exhibited by the Assembly of Albemarle. This can only mean that the former were aware of the trouble already arising in England and in some of her colonies from the peculiar customs of this new sect, while in the remote settlements of Carolina Quakers were too few to have attracted any public attention.

Edmundson made a second visit to Albemarle in 1675 or 1676, probably the latter year. He says little about it in his journal, and he remained only a few days, but the seed before planted seem to have been bearing fruit. After mentioning "several precious meetings" he thus concludes: "People were tender and loving, and there was no room for the priests, for Friends were finely settled, and I left things well among them."

But may not these first settlers have been Presbyterians or Congregationalists fleeing from the rigor of the religious establishment in Virginia, or Baptists, driven out of the same colony, or escaping from the still more rigid Calvinistic establishments in New England? This question has in effect been answered already. If these settlers had been men fleeing from religious persecution, or even from religious intolerance, they would have been of distinct religious convictions and of fixed religious habits. The careless and indifferent do not go out into the wilderness to escape religious persecution.

Digitized by Google

Laws of religious conformity require only such outward acts of compliance with established institutions as create no special grievance, and work no intolerable hardship, to him who is equally unconcerned about all religion. It is not claimed that the mere burden of the tax for the support of the religious establishment in Virginia, or in New England, made men exchange the comforts of civilization for the hardships of the wilderness. It is only the man of real religious feeling and of firm religious convictions, to whom an insincere compliance even in the most trifling act is intolerable, who refuses to conform. It was not the tithe in England to which the Quakers objected, as a matter of pecuniary loss; it was to the principle which they imagined to be involved in the payment of it. And so it will be found that religious refugees and persistent non-conformists have ever been men of distinct and positive convictions and of rigid religious habits. The Covenanters upon the mountains of Scotland, and the Non-jurors in the back alleys of Edinburgh and of Aberdeen,—such men were unwilling to conform to the established religion because they had the most intense religious feelings and convictions, which forbade them to conform. And strong religious feelings and convictions, shared by considerable numbers of people in the same community, always find expression, in face of every danger and difficulty, in common religious worship. In Albemarle when the first Quaker preachers visited the country there seems to have been among the people no custom of public religious worship. Dr. Hawks and Mr. Bancroft may see, under the rude guise of Edmundson's gaping congregations, natural reverence and unconventional piety; and the smoke of their pipes may seem to those amiable historians a sort of extemporized incense; but the honest Quaker saw in their conduct the expression of simple ignorance and indifference.

Digitized by Google

That there were no zealous Presbyterians or Baptists among the colonists at this period is further indicated by the absence of any opposition to these Quaker preachers. Fox's journal shows that these were not less earnest than Churchmen in resisting the Quaker doctrine. The only note of opposition which we hear is from the doctor at the house of Governor Stevens, and he seems to have been a free-thinker, since he denied the authority of the Scriptures.

The truth seems to be that like most pioneers in new settlements, the first white inhabitants of Carolina were restless and enterprising spirits, pushing out from the older settlements of Virginia, to find new homes, and to secure rich lands, in the unoccupied regions beyond the bounds of civilization, with no thoughts of religion, so far as this movement is concerned, and, from the circumstances of their new situation, apt to forget such religious habits as they had before formed. In a letter to Sir John Colleton, one of the Proprietors, of date June 2nd, 1665, Thos. Woodward, the "Surveyor General of Albemarle," writes:

"But for the present to think that any men will remove from Virginia upon harder condition than they can live there, will prove (I fear) a vain imagination, it being land only that they come for." He therefore urges the Proprietors to make their terms easier. Neither he nor any other contemporary authority gives the least intimation of a religious element entering into the problem of immigration. The references in the Charters, the Fundamental Constitutions, and the several "Proposals," etc., of the Proprietors, to the religious liberty allowed in the Colony, are the only allusions to be found to the subject.

This movement onward from civilization to the wilderness has been, and is, one of the marked characteristics of our race in America. After the first stage of exploration and discovery in Albemarle, a few Quakers may have been brought thither by the prospect of religious freedom, but no such movement can be observed. On the contrary, at this very time when Fox found we may say almost none of his brethren in Albemarle, there were a considerable number of Quakers in Virginia, with several organized and flourishing "Meetings" among them.

Digitized by Google

Along with the vanishing myth of the "Religious Refugee" settler, disappears also all necessity for the ingenious and wholly unfounded guesses of Bancroft and Hawks as to the religious opinions of Governor Drummond and of George Durant. These conjectures arose wholly from the supposed necessity of adapting their characters to suit their supposed positions as the Governor and the pioneer of a colony of religious refugees. It must indeed have been felt to be a dire necessity which enabled any man to believe that Governor Berkley would have appointed a Presbyterian as his deputy. Drummond, like most Scotch politicians of that time, probably professed to be a churchman—and the same may be said of George Durant. There never was the least ground for supposing that Durant was a Quaker. During Culpepper's Rebellion he acted as Attorney-General when Miller was indicted and prosecuted for speaking disrespectfully of the King, the Cavaliers and the doctrines of the Church! This is hardly a sufficient guarantee of Durant's piety, but it certainly puts him out of the role of a Quaker.*

In support of the foregoing conclusions as to the religious character of the original settlers of Albemarle, drawn wholly from contemporary evidence, some later witnesses may not improperly be examined. Henderson Walker was, during the closing years of the seventeenth century and the opening years of the eighteenth, one of the most prominent and thoroughly admirable characters in the Colony. He filled a number of the most important offices, having been for years a member of the Council, and at the time of his death acting as Governor. He had also been Attorney-General. As early as 1679 he was Clerk of the Council, and had enjoyed every opportunity of becoming fully acquainted with the affairs of the Colony from the very first. As a member of the Council sitting as a Court of Equity in 1697 he had assisted in the trial of a cause involving the title of George Durant, and the right of his heirs, to the land bought by Durant from the Indian "King of Yeopim" in 1662. Among the witnesses examined were several who spoke from personal knowledge of the circumstances of Durant's settlement. One had signed as a witness Durant's deed from the Indian. The deposition of this particular witness appears to have been taken before Walker himself. We can hardly imagine any witness better qualified than Walker to speak of the character and condition of the people of Albemarle from 1662 down to his own day. In a letter to Bishop Compton, of London, dated October 21st, 1703, he says that for twenty-one years (he seems to mean for twenty-one years before 1700) he can testify of his own knowledge that they had been without priest or altar, and from all that he could learn it had been much worse before that. This may refer to the rise of the Quaker worship, for he adds: "George Fox, some years ago, came into these parts, and by strange infatuations did infuse the Quakers' principles into some small number of the people; which did and hath continued to grow ever since very numerous, by reason of their yearly sending in men to encourage and exhort them to their wicked principles." Here we have a plain, direct statement, by a man in a position to know the truth, and with no motive whatever for perverting it, that Quakerism in Albemarle had been the result of Fox's missionary labors. And this statement is in exact accord with

* Geo. Durant's immediate descendants are found associated and identified with the Church in the Province of North Carolina, and the certificate of his marriage by a clergyman in Virginia has lately been found.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Fox's own account, and the testimony of every contemporary authority.

The Rev. William Gordon, a missionary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and minister in Chowan in 1708, in a report to the Society dated May 13, 1709, says: "There are few or no Dissenters in the government but Quakers." In the same report he says: "And now, sir, I shall examine a little the Quakers' pretences, who plead that they were the first settlers in that country; but this (according to the best accounts I could get) seems false in fact that religion being scarce heard of there till some years after the settlement; it is true some of the most ancient inhabitants, after George Fox went over, did turn Quakers."

Here we have another testimony from a man in a position to have learned the truth, and it corresponds accurately with that of other witnesses. In this connection it is interesting to observe that in an address signed by a number of Quakers in 1679, intended as a vindication of themselves and other Quakers, inhabitants of Albemarle, against charges of being implicated in the disorders and seditions of the preceding years, the subscribers state that most of them had been inhabitants of Carolina since 1663 or 1664. Now we have seen that Fox and Edmundson found no Quakers to speak of in 1672. The above document therefore affords incidental proof of the correctness of Mr. Gordon's statement that "some of the most ancient inhabitants, after George Fox went over, did turn Quakers."

Quakerism was the only organized form of religion in the Colony, with no rival worship among the people, for the rest of the seventeenth century, having been thus introduced and nurtured. It drew to itself a number of the intelligent and well-disposed inhabitants, especially of Perquimans and Pasquotank, though it seems not to have made any progress in the other precincts or counties. Those zealous and self-sacrificing men deserve to be held in honorable memory, who at the expense of so much time, labor and bodily suffering, cultivated the spiritual harvest in that distant and unattractive field. Quakerism did not begin the work of settlement, and of re-claiming the wilderness for civilization, but it has the greater honor of having first brought some organized form of Christianity to the infant colony, and of having cared for those wandering sheep whom others neglected.

Digitized by Google

Ergo omnibus debita; quibus honor, honorem.

NOTE.

That our historians, both general and local, have examined the evidence on this subject carelessly, and that they have read into the simple narratives of Edmundson and Fox their own preconceptions, is manifest.

Martin says that when Edmundson made his visit in the spring of 1672 to the family of Henry Phillips (whom he calls Phelps), "they were greatly rejoiced at their interview, not having seen any leader of this society for years." Whereas Edmundson says nothing about any "leader of this society." He says plainly that they had not seen "a Friend," i. e., a Quaker, in seven years. This was in 1672. The Phillips family had come to Carolina from New England in 1665, as we learn from Bowden's history of the Quakers. Edmundson therefore, in effect, says that they had not seen a Quaker since they had come into Carolina!

Martin further says of this same visit of Edmundson that before leaving Albemarle "meetings were held in other parts of the precinct of Berkley and in that of Carteret, and a quarterly meeting of discipline was established in Berkley," whereas Edmundson's journal records a visit of less than two full days, and two meetings in the same neighborhood. The morning of the third day he set out on his return to Virginia.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Hawks makes Fox go from Nansemond, in Virginia, to the settlements on the Albemarle by way of Roanoke river; and makes him accomplish the journey from Somerton to some imaginary creek emptying into the Roanoke in one day: the first absurd; the second impossible! And all this wonderful detour for the sole purpose of getting rid of Fox's plain statement that in the region which he traversed there were no Quakers. Both Martin and Hawks have it so solidly fixed in their minds that the settlers were Quakers, that when Fox and Edmundson assert the contrary, their testimony must be corrected, and their plainest statements misquoted and perverted in order that they may not contradict the groundless opinions of later times.

Bancroft, in the thirteenth chapter of his History of the United States, speaking of this same visit of Fox, says that, "Carolina had ever been the refuge of Quakers and renegades from ecclesiastical oppression," and cites as his authority for this statement Lord Culpepper in Chalmers, 356. At the place referred to Chalmers gives a letter from Lord Culpepper dated in 1681, in which he says that Carolina was "the refuge of our renegades," but not a word about "ecclesiastical oppression," that being Mr. Bancroft's own addition for which there is no pretence of contemporary authority.

Digitized by Google

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

VOLUME V.

PAGE.

Genesis of Wake County..... 3—17
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations..... 19—35
Richard Dillard, M.D.

North Carolina Signers of the National Declaration of Independence: Part II., William Hooper..... 37—71
Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

ILLUSTRATIONS:

Joel Lane House in Present City of Raleigh.
St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C. Built 1745.
Book-Plate of William Hooper.
Will Hooper of North Carolina. (With autograph.)
Rev. William Hooper. (With autograph.)
William Hooper, D.D., L.L.D. (With autograph.)
Monument at Guilford Battle Ground.

The History of the Capitol..... 74—89
Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700–1750..... 90—149
Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

North Carolina's Poets.....149—166
Rev. Hight C. Moore.

ILLUSTRATIONS:

The First Capitol of North Carolina, Destroyed by Fire June 21, 1831. (From an old engraving.)
The Present Capitol at Raleigh. Built Between 1831 and 1840.

Cornelius Harnett.....171—201
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

Edward Moseley.....202—208
Prof. D. H. Hill.

Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775.....209—216
Major William A. Graham.

ILLUSTRATION:

"Hilton," the Home of Cornelius Harnett.

Digitized by Google

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

PAGE.

Governor Thomas Pollok.....219—231
Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

Battle of Cowan's Ford.....232—246
Major William A. Graham.

First Settlers in North Carolina not Religious Refugees.....247—260
Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

ILLUSTRATIONS:

Governor Pollok's Book Plate.
Map of Cowan's Ford.

Digitized by Google

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR NORTH CAROLINA ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, records of the different counties, family papers and State histories will be readily examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced. Their ancestors must have resided in the State of North Carolina during the Revolutionary and Colonial periods.

FEE FOR SUCH RESEARCHES, $5.00

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE (HOOPER) WILLS,
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

Coats of Arms Painted at Reasonable Rates

Burnt on Wood, $3.00
Painted, $3.00
India Ink Drawing, $3.00

For Coats of Arms, etc., address,

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

Digitized by Google

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern." Sarah Beaument Kenneday.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War." Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses." Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsburg."
"Historic Homes," Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays, Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"Historic Homes, The Groves, Cape Fear, Wakefield," Burgwyn, Waddell, Haywood.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service." Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro, Mr. Francis Nash
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs. L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina." Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780." Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence," John Penn and Joseph Hewes, by T. M Pittman, of Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians." Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.
"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.
"The Scotch-Irish Settlement."
"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. 1, single copies 25c.; Vols. 2, 3, 4, single copies 15c.

EDITORS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET
RALEIGH, N. C.

Digitized by Google

JOHN C. DREWRY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

Mechanics and Investors Union

A Home Investment Company for Monthly Savings
A Home Loan Company, to Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money. It promotes economy, thrift and punctuality in business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 will mature a $100 Certificate. One hundred payments will secure a home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, Secretary, 22 Pullen Building.

Allen's Forty Lessons in Bookkeeping. Over 7,000 copies have been used in schools and colleges. Commended by teachers and business men. Price $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, Manager.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery

Aside from a large line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc., we will take care of your orders for RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS.

All orders given our personal attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.
RALEIGH, N. C.

ESTABLISHED IN 1891

The Commercial and Farmers Bank

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, . .	$100,000.00
Surplus, . . .	60,000.00
Deposits, . . .	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian.

Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent.

Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B S JERMAN, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSON, Asst. Cashier.

Digitized by Google

THE

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City
It reaches the whole State
Largest circulation in North Carolina
The State's Representative Newspaper

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
Editor

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1900,	5,700 subscribers
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1901,	6,500 subscribers
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1902,	7,054 subscribers
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1903,	8,201 subscribers
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1904,	9,111 subscribers
1899,	5,200 subscribers	905,	10,000 subscribers

Digitized by Google

North Carolina Historical Commission

ESTABLISHED B LAWS OF 1903

MEMBERS

W. J. PEELE, CHAIRMAN, ...	RALEIGH, N C.
R. D. W. CONNER, SECRETARY, . .	RALEIGH, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES, ...	RALEIGH, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER, ...	CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT, ...	ROPER, N. C.

THE Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured, arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners. The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in their efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State.

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary.

Digitized by Google

WEATHERS & PERRY

Interior Decorators

WALL PAPER, WINDOW SHADES, CURTAIN POLLS, PICTURE FRAMES, PICTURES, ARTISTS' MATERIAL AND ART NOVELTIES, BRIC-A-BRAC, WASH SILKS, BRAIDS, WOOLS AND ZEPHYRS.

117 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

50,000 Old Books for Sale

Plates, Prints, Stamps, Coin, and Old Mahogany Furniture. 1,000 Titles on North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia History and the South. Send for list. Mention your duplicate for exchange.

We want all North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia Laws, Journals, Documents and Histories.

BOOK EXCHANGE

RALEIGH, N. C. and RICHMOND, VA.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

The Wonderful Headache and Neuralgia Remedy

25c. and 50c. a Bottle At All Drug Stores

Digitized by Google

Draughon's

Raleigh, N. C.
Columbia, S. C.
Knoxville, Tenn.
Nashville, Tenn.
Ft. Worth, Tex.

PRACTICAL BUSINESS Colleges

CATALOGUE
FREE

Address
J. F. DRAUGHON
PRESIDENT

Position $50 per month guaranteed or money refunded, or you may pay tuition out of salary after graduating. No vacation. Enter at any time. In thoroughness and reputation D. P. C.'s are to other business colleges what Harvard University is to academies. 7,000 students annually. Indorsed by business men from Maine to California. Cheap board.

HOME STUDY

Contract given to refund money, if, after taking our Home Study by mail, you are not satisfied. Write for prices.

Digitized by Google

THE YARBOROUGH HOUSE

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA

New and Modern Appeals to the Appreciative

HOWELL COBB

FACTS WORTH KNOWING

BOYLAN-PEARCE CO.

208 Fayetteville St., Raleigh, N. C.

LARGEST RETAIL DRY GOODS MERCHANTS IN THE STATE

Agents for Ladies' Home Journal Paper Patterns.
Members of Raleigh's Retail Merchants Association.
A Full Equipped Mail Order Department.
Dispensers of Southern Trading Stamps.
Dry Goods, Carpets, Millinery.
Ladies' ready-to-wear Suits, Waists, Skirts and Jackets.
Spring and Summer Stock for 1906 now ready.
Your patronage solicited.

WRITE FOR SAMPLES

Digitized by Google

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30,000

A personal investigation will convince anyone that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Vol. VI. JULY, 1906 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

Page

The Indian Tribes of Eastern Carolina - - - 3
By Richard Dillard, M. D.

Glimpses of History in the Names of Our Counties - 26
By Kemp. P. Battle, LL. D.

A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear - - - 48
By James Sprunt, British Vice-Consul at Wilmington, N. C.

(ILLUSTRATED)

SINGLE NUMBERS 30 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

VOLUME VI.

Glimpses of History in the Names of our Counties,
Kemp. P. Battle, LL. D.

A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), ... Mr. James Sprunt.

The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina, Richard Dillard, M. D.

Gov. Thomas Burke, . . . Mr. J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton.

Some North Carolina Histories and their Authors,
Professor Edward P. Moses.

The Borough Towns of North Carolina, . . Mr. Francis Nash.

The John White Pictures, ... Mr. W. J. Peele.

Gov. Jesse Franklin, ... Professor J. T. Alderman.

Industrial Life in Early North Carolina, . . Mr. T. M. Pittman.

Colonial and Revolutionary Costumes in North Carolina,
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

North Carolina's Attitude to the Revolution, Mr. Robert C. Strong.

The Fundamental Constitutions and the Effects on the Colony,
Mr. Junius Davis.

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1906. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 30 cents for single copy.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VI, are requested to notify at once.

Address,
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, North Carolina.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

THE INDIAN GALLOWS, BERTIE COUNTY.
As it appeared in 1846.

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

Vol. VI. JULY, 1906. No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
(Nee Hooper.)

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. J. W. THACKSTON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MRS. ED. CHAMBERS SMITH.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1901.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VI JULY, 1906 No. 1

THE FOREWORD.

The sources of information regarding our Indians are both meagre and unsatisfactory, history lends but little aid, tradition is silent, you must seek elsewhere than in books. There is a way we may study—even see them if we will—let me tell you the secret; I came upon it one evening just after sunset when I was hunting wild forget-me-nots along an idle brook away off in Pleasant Valley. If you wander alone through the deep everglade of a southern dismal you will sometimes stop suddenly to examine what you know is the faded footprint of a moccasined foot, or, if the hour is propitious, you will listen and listen again as you catch the sound of a warwhoop echoing and re-echoing through the deepening twilight of the forest. Or it may be that you will find an arrowhead or a broken tomahawk in a ramble through a summer field.

One night when the moon was full, and I sat under a tree by the deep mirror of a certain silver stream, the air grew suddenly heavy with the drowsy sweetness of the lotus in blossom, there was a troubling of the waters as by the angel's touch upon the Pool of Bethesda, the leaves clapped fitfully together like elfin cymbals at a fairy dance, a few, twisting from their stems, came fluttering down upon the river, and went sailing off like a phantom squadron; the sedges rustled violently at the water's hem—it was an enchanted spot, and I saw as in a dream two painted warriors drag a bound victim hurriedly into a canoe, and push off into the stream, but as I turned to observe them closely they blended into the dreamland of the other shore—the trick then lies in the imagination—in the embroidered fantacy of a midsummer-night's dream.

HE INDIAN TRIBES OF EASTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

BY RICHARD DILLARD, M.D.

"Ye whose hearts are fresh and simple,
Who have faith in God and nature,
Who believe that in all ages
Every human heart is human.
That in even savage bosoms
There are longings, yearnings, strivings
For the good they comprehend not,
That the feeble hands and helpless,
Groping blindly in the darkness,
Touch God's right hand in that darkness
And are lifted up and strengthened;
Listen to this simple story."

The first Indian tableau upon which the curtain of our history rises is the royal reception of Amidas and Barlow by Granganameo "in the delicate garden abounding in all kinds of odoriferous flowers" on the Island of Wocokon. The last is when, chagrined by the defeat and failure of the Tuscarora War, they are driven forever from the shores of the Albemarle. The scenes between are interspersed with acts of kindness and of cruelty, bloody massacres and the torch, with long interludes, in which the curtain is so closely hauled down that not a ray of light reaches us, so that the pathfinders of history can scarcely discern a single blazed tree to guide them through that untrodden solitude.

The mural frescoes by Alexander in the Congressional Library most beautifully tell the story of the evolution of learning in five allegorical paintings; the first is a picture of a cairn built by a prehistoric man to commemorate some important event; the second is oral tradition, an ancient storyteller surrounded by a group of attentive listeners; the third is represented by hieroglyphics carved upon an Egyptian obelisk; the fourth is the primitive American Indian painting upon his buffalo skin the crude story of the chase, the conflict, or the war-dance, while the last is the beautiful consummation of them all—the printing press. Our own alphabet, through a long series of elaboration covering many centuries, originally came from picture-writing. All knowledge began with units, and the compounding of those units in different ways like the grouping of atoms to form various chemical substances produced classified knowledge, or science in all of its labyrinthine detail. The language of the Indian is metaphorical, and essentially picture-writing, not only picture-words representing material objects, but sound-pictures, that is the formation of words in imitation of the sounds they are intended to represent. He speaks mostly with his eyes, using gestures, grimmaces and grunts where his language is inadequate, and emphasis is required. The Iroquois, which were composed partly of Eastern North Carolina Indians after the Tuscarora War, are especially metaphorical, and of course in studying their language we study the language of the different tribes which compose them. When the weather is very cold they say "it is a nose-cutting morning." They use the hemlock boughs to protect them from the snow, and when one says "I have hemlock boughs" he means that he has warm and comfortable quarters. It is said that twelve letters answer for all Iroquois sounds, viz.: A E F H I K N O R S T W. The Algonquins, the Iroquois and the Mobilians are considered the three primitive stocks, and the dialects now spoken throughout the country are traced by ethnologists directly to them.

Thoreau says in his Walden that the Puri Indians had but one word for the present, the past, and the future, expressing its variations of meaning by pointing backward for yesterday—forward for tomorrow—and overhead for to-day.

The beautiful euphoneous Indian names are so intermingled with our own names and history that time cannot erase them. Let us analyze a few of their words and our application of them. I suggest the following derivation of the word Roanoke as applied to both Roanoke river and Roanoke Island. Wampum, the Indian money, their current medium of exchange and equivalent of gold, was of two kinds—Wampum Peak, and Wampum Roanoke: It was made of a species of conch-shell (Buccinum Undatum), and shaped like beads, the darker colors being the most valuable. This was usually strung and worn around the waist as a belt, and served the double purpose of ornament and money. These belts were passed from one nation to another in making treaties and in other important transactions, e. g., "By my wampum belt I pledge thee." Now when Menotoscon, king of the Chowanokes, found that the English were principally in quest of gold, he beguiled them with all kinds of rococo stories about a great river, evidently our Roanoke, which rose in a western country, and abounded in mussels filled with pearls, and that the sands of this river were of gold, hence the English named it Roanoke, and as Roanoke meant money or gold, by metonomy Roanoke river means river of gold, a name not inappropriate at this day, considering the wealth of its fields and the richness and vastness of the forests which girt its shores. By the same fanciful analysis Roanoke Island may mean island of money or gold, from the great quantity of wampum shells abounding in that vicinity. The suffix peak appears in the words Chesapeake, Dessamonpeak, Corapeak and others, and also gives them a significance of profusion or wealth. Mattercomock or Machicomock Creek, to the west of Edenton, means Temple of God, doubtless from the exquisite beauty of the stream and the tall cypress trees along its banks, which stand like huge elaborately carved Corinthian columns supporting the dome of the sky.

The name of the section of country along the Chowan above Edenton now called Rockyhock was derived from the Indian word Rakiock, meaning cypress tree, which by metathesis and the corruptions of successive generations is now spelled Rockyhock, meaning literally the Land of Cypress Trees. Chowan means paint or color—hence the county is the land of rich colors, from the variety and magnificence of its flora, and the myriad hues of its emerald forests, or it might have been that the Indians obtained their dyes and paints there. To the beautiful reflection of trees and sky upon a placid stream they gave the name of glimmerglass, shimmering mirror. The proximity of the Chowanokes to the Tuscaroras brought them into frequent communication, and there was in consequence some similarity of dialect, a great many of their words had in common the suffix ock, e. g., Uppowock, Mattercomock, Rakiock, Moriatock and Ohanock. The original spelling of Currituck was Coratuc, Tar River was Tau, meaning river of health, and Hatteras was Hattorask. Little River was Kototine, Perquimans River was Ona, Albemarle Sound was called Weapomeiock, Yeopim was originally Jaupin. Durant's Neck was Wecocomicke. The Chowan River was called Nomopana. Captain John Smith, in his map of Virginia made in 1606, changes the vowels and spells Chowan Chawon, and gives to that tribe a large portion of the territory southeast of the Powhattan River, now the James. Theodore de Bry's map, 1590, gives the Chowans the vast territory along the upper Albemarle and Chowan River. Pasquotank at one time was spelled Passo-Tank, and was derived from the Indian Passaquenoke, meaning the woman's town.

Resting upon the very bosom of nature, amid the most picturesque and beautiful surroundings they possessed neither music nor poetry. Grave, imperturbable and mute, their souls did not burn with the glowing tints of the autumn forest, or thrill at the echo from the hills, or at the grandeur and mystery of the great solitudes, fresh with the virginity of nature, or the long light upon the rivers. They hearkened not the song of the summer bird whose flight of ecstasy drew bars of golden music across the sky, nor the soft reed notes of Dio Pan's flute, nor the arpeggios swept from Apollo's lyre—the star-embroidered peace of the midnight heavens they heeded not, but without any of the embellishments of civilization they had a picturesqueness and beauty of costume entirely in harmony with the wild state of nature.

We are well assured that the early Indians had a good idea of botany, knew the uses of the different plants, and gave them names descriptive of their qualities and physical appearances, though they knew nothing of classification. A great deal of the flora which existed here then is now entirely extinct, the law of the survival of the fittest applying more strongly to the vegetable kingdom than to any other; during my own observation one species of ground-pine in this country has entirely disappeared. Many of the wild flowers we know and see every day are really adventives from Europe, or plants which have escaped from cultivation in gardens, and are literally tramping it over the country. The botanical characteristics of our forests reveal the fact that some parts of them were in cultivation very many years ago, for pine is the original growth, and in successive rotation come gum, oak, etc: Nature does not falter, she has her own ways—her own days for doing her work, man can meddle, but cannot hinder her. Remove the earth from a piece of land, deep enough to destroy all remains of the previously existing vegetation, and when the soil reforms upon it again she will persistently repeat the law by first producing pine, and then on in regular rotation again. Now the occurrence of oak thickets in most unexpected places argues strongly that the Indians had small clearings or assarts where they grew their tobacco and maize.

It is difficult to believe that they did not love and enjoy the wild flowers which grew so profusely about them. Did they not pause in the chase to exult in the fragrance of the pine and the myrtle, or linger to inhale the delicate perfume of the wild grape in blossom, or to be lifted up by the redolence of the jessamine? Was there no "impulse from the vernal woods," no swelling of the heart in the springtime—

> "When daisies pied and violets blue,
> And lady-smocks all silver-white,
> And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue
> Do paint the meadows with delight?"

Thanks to the fertile pen and sharp-eyed observation of Harriot we know something of their plants and their uses. He says they dyed their hair and persons with the roots of Chappacor, of which I cannot conjecture the English equivalent unless it be the Sanguinaria or Bloodroot, still flourishing in our forests, but the secret is hidden down deep in the chalice of its corolla, its beautiful white petals are silent, and cannot be invoked. Kaishackpenauk was a root eaten as food, and resembled very much our Irish potato, while Openauk was nothing more than the Apios Tuberosa, growing in our lowlands, it also served them as food. Coscushaw may be the Tuckahoe or Arrowhead, of which hogs are fond, and grows in muddy pools and bogs. Ascapo was the Myrtle, and the Sassafras they called Winauk. The Prince's Pine was Pipsissewa, and Habascon was the horse-radish. One of our beautiful wild trailers wears gracefully the name of Cherokee Rose, but I condemn the sentiment which named Lobelia, a very poisonous plant, Indian Tobacco, and the Indian Turnip is also most inappropriately named. The Squaw Vine still paints its berries red in autumn to honor the Indian maiden. They knew different poisons and did not hesitate to use them stealthily and without scruple upon their personal enemies. Prominent among their list of poisons was a white root which grew in fresh marshes, and may have been Cicely, or Fool's Parsley, belonging to the poisonous hemlock family. In Hyde County was the Mattermuskeet or Maramikeet of the Machapungo Indians, Lake Mattermuskeet was called by them Paquinip, or Paquipe. Upon the shores of this lake grows and flourishes as nowhere else an apple called the Mattermuskeet, maturing late but succulent and full of excellence. The tradition is that an early settler and hunter killed a wild goose upon the lake and upon opening its craw found an apple seed which he carefully preserved and planted, and which grew rapidly, and bore luscious fruit.

The North Carolina grape called Scuppernong was originally found on Scuppernong River, a tributary of Albemarle Sound, by an exploring party sent out by Amidas and Barlow. One small vine, with roots, was transplanted to Roanoke Island in 1584, where it is still growing and bearing grapes every year. In 1855 it covered nearly one and one-half acres. Some contend that the proper spelling should be Noscuppernong, but the late Rev. Wm. S. Pettigrew, who was deeply versed in Indian legend and lore always held that it should be Escappernong. Messrs. Garrett & Co. have named one of their excellent wines made from these grapes Escappernong. An old writer of North Carolina history says "there are no less than five varieties of grapes found about the Albemarle Sound, all of which are called Scuppernongs, to-wit, black, green, purple, red and white." The darker varieties are generally conceded to be seedlings, as the original grape can at present be reproduced only by layering or by grafting upon the wild grape. The cause of the change in color of this grape is beautifully woven by Mrs. Cotten into the Legend of the White Doe or the Fate of Virginia Dare. The transposition into prose has been so graphically made that I give it verbatim. "Okisko, a brave warrior of the tribe that had given shelter to the unfortunate Lost Colony of Sir Walter Raleigh, fell in love with the governor's granddaughter, Virginia Dare, the first white child born on American soil. The jealous rage of Chico, the great magician, changed her into a white doe which baffled all the hunters' attempts to capture it, for it had a charmed life and nothing but a silver arrow or an arrow dipped in the magic fountain of Roanoke could slay the beautiful creature. Now Wanchese, the great hunter of Pomouik, has crossed the waters, and there had received as a present a silver arrow. Armed with this he lay in wait for the white doe. Near him also was Virginia Dare's faithful lover, Okisko, armed with an arrow that had been dipped in the magic fountain. The magician Wenaudon, rival of Chico, had explained to Okisko that only by piercing to the heart the white doe with this magic arrow could the fair Virginia be liberated and restored to him, thus unknown to each other the two warriors awaited the coming of the white doe, one armed with the silver arrow that meant death, the other armed with the magic arrow that meant restored life the Okisko's love. Suddenly out in the clearing jumped the startled doe; twang went the bowstrings, both arrows fled straight to the mark. To the wonder of Wanchese he saw a beautiful white girl laying where he had seen the doe fall. To the horror of Okisko he saw the arrow piercing his loved one's heart. As if shocked by the awful tragedy the magic spring died away. In its place Okisko saw growing a tiny grapevine, it seemed a message from his lost love, he watched it grow and blossom and bear fruit. Lo! the grapes were red; he crushed one and lo! the juice was red—red as his dear Virginia's blood. Lovingly he watched and tended the vine, and as he drank the pure red juice of the grape he knew that at last he was united to his love—that her spirit was entering into his—that he was daily growing more like her, the being he loved and worshipped—the joy he had lost, but now had found again in the magic seedling." It is a fact that a species of white deer is still seen in the country around Pungo and Scuppernong Lakes, but the penetrating ball of the Winchester possesses a counter charm to the magical spell of the Indian magician Chico, and the white doe often falls a victim before its unerring aim.

VIRGINIA DARE.
From a fanciful sketch by Porte Crayon in 1857.

The mother Scuppernong vine implanted upon the Island of Roanoke, as ancient as our civilization, has sent its branches like the English speaking race over our broad land, the excellence of its amber clusters dropping the honey-dew of knowledge and delight—spreading like a banyan, its broad arbor is a sacred aegis of Minerva, which will shield and hide for aye the mysterious secret of the Lost Colony.

Who gave us Indian Corn the Agatowr, that beautiful tasseled staff of life whose waving fields are a symbol of our country's bounty and wealth—this maker of brawn and muscle and of the gray stroma of the brain? I answer each red ear blushed with the red man's skin. It was cultivated and eaten here before the granaries of the Pharaohs were overflowing from the wheat fields of Egypt, or the Libyan threshing-floors were groaning under the fatness of the harvest. The Indian method of preparing it for food was by hollowing out the end of a large stump and pounding the grain by means of a log suspended to an overhanging bough.

Who gave us Uppowock, the divine tobacco? That companion of solitude and life of company! The fabled Assidos of the middle ages, which drives away all evil spirits! The nerve stimulant destined to supplant hashisch, opium, betel, kava-kava, and all others! Emissaries from China and Japan are buying American tobacco with the purpose of substituting it for the injurious opium habit of those countries. This is the herb which that rare old cynic philosopher so beautifully praises and censures by antithesis in his wonderful Anatomy of Melancholy, the book Doctor Johnson missed his tea to read, as "divine, rare, superexcellent tobacco, which goes far beyond all the panaceas, potable gold and philosophers' stones—a sovereign remedy to all diseases, a virtuous herb if it be well qualified, opportunely taken and medicinally used, but as it is commonly abused by most men 'tis a plague, a mischief, a violent purger of goods, lands and health—devilish and damned tobacco, the ruin and overthrow of body and soul."

The Indians held Uppowock their tobacco in high esteem, attributed to it magical powers. It was the gift of the gods; they often burnt it upon their sacred fires, and cast it upon the waters to allay the storm, they scattered it among their weirs to increase the catch of fish, and after an escape from great danger they would throw it high into the air as if to requite the gods themselves.

Eastern North Carolina is rich in literature based upon the history, the legends, the traditions of its Indians. The White Doe or Fate of Virginia Dare is as musical as Hiawatha, and tells the story of the change of Virginia Dare into the shape of a white doe to which I have alluded elsewhere.

That erudite scholar, Col. R. B. Creecy, in his chef d'oeuvre, the Legend of Jesse Batz, tells delightfully the story of Jesse Batz, a hunter and trapper who dwelt upon an island in the Albemarle Sound, opposite the mouth of Yeopim River, now called Batz's Grave (the U. S. Geog. Soc. gives the spelling Batts), but then called Kalola from the number of sea gulls congregating there. Hunting, trapping, and frequently engaging in the chase with the Indians Batz became intimately associated with the Princess Kickawana, the beautiful daughter of Kilkanoo, the king of the Chowanokes. Batz loved her at first sight, and she in turn loved the white man.

When Pamunkey made war upon Kilkanoo Batz fought with the Chowanokes, and in a hand-to-hand encounter took Pamunkey prisoner and helped to drive the hostile tribe back into Virginia. For this act of bravery he was adopted into the Chowanoke tribe with the name of Secotan or Great White Eagle. The current of love between him and Kickawana ran along smoothly, and with an immunity from sorrow beyond the usual lot of mortals until one night when the Indian maiden was paddling in her canoe across from the mainland to the island, as she frequently did to visit her lover, a thunderstorm swept the Albemarle like the besom of destruction:

> "The wind was high, and the clouds were dark,
> And the boat returned no more."

Batz never more left his island home, and to this day it is called Batz's Grave. Its azure outline in dim perspective upon the glistening page of the Albemarle seems the far-off island of some half-forgotten dream. At one time it belonged to George Durant, Jr., and contained many acres; the erosion of the tides has been so continuous and rapid that scarcely an acre now remains. This constant sloughing of its banks causes the magnificent timber to fall into the water in great windrows, like broad swaths of grain beneath the sturdy stroke of some giant reaper, but the ceaseless murmur of each receding wave upon its lonely beach will sigh out forave, in a throbbing tumultuous undertone, the story of those unfortunate lovers. One of the few landmarks left by the Chowan Indians is a part of the soundside road leading to Drummond's Point, which curves and re-curves upon itself at least a dozen times in a distance of two miles. The tradition is that the road was made by the early settlers along the course of the old Indian trail; over this road doubtless passed and repassed Kickawana on her visits to the island home of Jesse Batz, and it takes but a touch of fancy for the benighted traveler along this lonely road to see the lithe form of Kickawana just receding around the next bend.

One of the most interesting chapters in our history is the account given by Dr. John Brickell, of Edenton, in his history of North Carolina of a trip among the Indians. He was appointed by Gov. Burrington to make an exploration into the interior, with a view of securing the friendship of the Cherokee Indians. He left Edenton in 1730 with ten men and two Indians, and traveled fifteen days without having seen a human being. At the foot of the mountains they met the Indians, who received them kindly and conducted them to their camp where they spent two days with the chief, who reluctantly permitted them to return. They built large fires and cooked the game which the two Indians killed and served it upon pine-bark dishes, at night they tethered their horses and slept upon the gray Spanish moss (Tillandsia Usneoides), which hung from the trees. They lived in truly Robin Hood style, and the tour seems to have been more for romance and adventure than for scientific search. It is a counterpart in our history of the adventures of the Knights of the Golden Horse Shoe to the Blue Ridge of Virginia under Gov. Spotswood. Dr. Brickell had a brother who settled in Hertford County in 1739, the Rev. Matthias Brickell, from whom is descended some of the best families of that county.

The Indian Gallows, a poem by William H. Rhodes, published in 1846, deserves the highest place among the Indian classic literature of North Carolina.

The Indian Gallows was located in the Indian woods of Bertie County, a tract of land formerly owned and occupied by the Tuscaroras. It was a remarkable freak of nature in that the branch of one oak grew so entirely and completely into another oak some twenty feet asunder that it was impossible to discern from which tree the cross-branch grew. The cross-branch also had large limbs growing upward from it. This natural curiosity stood until 1880, when a severe storm uprooted one of the oaks, the other soon commenced to decay and was cut down in 1892 and made into relics.

The story of it runneth thus: A band of pilgrims exiled by religious persecution from England were hurled tempest-tossed upon the shores of North Carolina, they made their way under all sorts of difficulties and contentions with adverse fates up the Albemarle Sound to the settlement now called Edenton. The parents of the heroine Elnora, invited by the friendly chief of the Tuscaroras, decided to make their homes in the wilds across the sound. Roanoke, the son of the old Tuscarora king, soon fell in love with Elnora, and at the planning of the Indian Massacree in 1711, set out on foot to warn his white friends of their danger, but arrived just in time to see their cabin in flames and a band of Tuscaroras cut down Elnora's aged parents. Elnora herself by a superhuman effort eluded the grasp of the murderous chief Cashie and hid in the Indian Woods, where she was afterwards found by the faithful Roanoke. Enduring all sorts of hardships they eventually found a boat, and steering safely down the Moriatock River, reached the sound. On and on they paddled through the darkness of the night under the midnight sky, not knowing whither they were going, each angry wave greedy to swallow up their little canoe. Elnora exhausted, and with hands all blistered, often despaired, and would have thrown herself into the dark waters had she not been sustained and comforted by Roanoke. Just at the crucial moment of their despair Aurora with her dew-drop touch threw open the rosy chambers of the East, and the streaks of dawn went ploughing golden furrows in the wake of the morning star. Dawn is the hour of resignation and peace, they were comforted and cheered as they sighted the headland at the entrance of Edenton Bay, they soon reached the shore where they told the story of their misfortunes to a crowd of eager listeners, among whom was Henry, Elnora's lover, just arrived on a ship from England. The Tuscaroras, when they found out that Roanoke had fled to Edenton with Elnora, infuriated by his action and the escape of the white maiden, set out at once with a flotilla of canoes to take the fort at Edenton[1] and massacre the inhabitants, but they were driven hopelessly back by the well-prepared settlers, Henry and Roanoke fighting gallantly side by side. After the rout of the Indians Roanoke lingered sadly at Edenton. Elnora showed him every kindness and consideration, but her heart belonged unreservedly to Henry.

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

"As time fled on Roanoke forgot to smile,
And lonely walks his saddened weeks beguile:
A secret grief sits gnawing at his soul,
Deep are the sorrows that his mind engage,
Kindness can soothe not—friends cannot assuage."

Desperate and dejected at his disappointment in love he returned to his tribe in Bertie and met with resignation his fate. At the council of the chiefs he was condemned to be burned at the stake the next morning at dawn, when the sentence was pronounced the tragic Cashie exclaimed—

"No—not the stake!
He loves the paleface; let him die
The white man's death! Come let us bend a tree
And swing the traitor, as the Red-men see
The palefaced villian hang. Give not the stake
To him would the Red man's freedom take,
Who from our fathers and our God would roam,
And strives to rob us of our lands and home.
* * * * * * *
They seize him now and drag him to the spot
Where death awaits, and pangs are all forgot."

[1] Opposite the old Hathaway lot, on Water Street, could be seen a few years ago the foundation of what is supposed to have been the old fort built to defend the town against the attacks of the Indians, and this might have been the one in which Elnora and Roanoke took refuge. Watson, in his Journey to Edenton in 1777, says that it was then defended by two forts.

There is a striking analogy between the motif of the Indian Gallows and Campbell's Gertrude of Wyoming. Roanoke and Outalisse, the Mohawk chief, were very similar characters.

One of the largest and most remarkable Indian mounds in Eastern North Carolina is located at Bandon on the Chowan, evidently the site of the ancient town of the Chowanokes which Grenville's party visited in 1585, and was called Mavaton.[2] The map of James Wimble, made in 1729, also locates it at about this point. The mound extends along the river bank five or six hundred yards, is sixty yards wide and five feet deep, covered with about one foot of sand and soil. It is composed almost exclusively of mussel shells taken from the river, pieces of pottery, ashes, arrow heads and human bones, this may have been the dumping ground of the village. The finding of human bones beneath the mound might suggest that it is the monument of their distinguished chiefs, just as the ancient Egyptians built pyramids above their illustrious Pharaohs. Pottery and arrow heads are found in many places throughout this county, especially on hillsides, near streams, and indicate that they were left there by temporary hunting or fishing parties. Even the Indians of the present day are averse to carrying baggage of any kind, and the frail manner in which some of their pottery was made shows that it was for temporary purposes only. Certain decorations on their pottery occur sufficiently often among the Indian tribes of the different sections to be almost characteristic of them.

A sort of corn-cob impression is found on a great deal of the Chowan pottery and also in Bertie, there is however considerable variation in different localities, the corn-cob impression in some specimens being much coarser. There are also pieces with parallel striations, oblique patterns, small diamond patterns formed by transverse lines, evidently made by a sharp stick. Some are decorated with horizontal lines, while a few are perfectly plain. In the deposits on the Chowan River, at the site of the ancient Chowanoke town of Mavaton, the decorations on the pottery are both varied and artistic, and I am inclined to believe that each clan or family had its own distinctive and individual pattern of decoration—it was their coat of arms. On this same mound I found the wild columbine growing, stragglers from Menotoscon's flower-garden, and at a nearby spring flourished the spear-mint, whose ancestors two hundred years ago doubtless seasoned Okisko's venison stew. I have never seen so many distinct patterns occurring in the same mound as at Avoca, left there by the Tuscaroras. The ancient Tuscarora town of Metackwem was located in Bertie County just above Black Walnut Point, and most probably at Avoca, from the extensive deposits there. The Tuscaroras showed a more advanced civilization than any of the Eastern tribes, they were jealous and revengeful, had more numerical strength, more prowess and were more belligerent, and influenced the weaker tribes near them. They were originally descended from the Monacans, a powerful nation whose territory extended from the domains of Powhattan down into Carolina, and who were well known to many of the early discoverers, they are believed by some to have been the aborigines of Eastern North Carolina. Although amalgamated with the Iroquois Confederation the Tuscaroras have even to this day preserved, in a great measure, their individuality. The Chowanokes evidently worshipped the maize, and decorated their pottery freely with the corn-cob. We do not know the exact shape of their cooking utensils, but judging from the fragments of pottery they must have been shaped very much like the modern flower pot. Calculating the diameter and capacity of the vessels from the segments found there was great uniformity both of size and shape. The Indians knew the principle of the wedge, and applied its shape to their axes and tomahawks. There is a great similarity in them to the English axe, that implement and coat-of-arms of our civilization, this similarity of implements argue strongly the universal brotherhood of mankind.

[2]The station on the Suffolk and Carolina Railroad was named by the author for this town.

In the great dismal surrounding Lake Scuppernong is a chain of small islands surrounded by pitfalls, which are believed to have been dug by the Indians to entrap large game, along the shores of the lake a vessel of soapstone, almost intact, was exhumed some time ago, and at the spot where the best perch abound.

To the east of Centre Hill, which forms the divide between Chowan and Perquimans Rivers, lies a vast tract of land called Bear Swamp, depressed fifteen or twenty feet below the surrounding country, and a number of years ago some parties in making an excavation just east of Centre Hill, where the land falls off into this great basin, discovered a boat of considerable dimensions, fairly well preserved, six or more feet below the surface: it is supposed to be of Indian origin, as there is an ancient tradition that it was centuries ago a great lake.[3]

The numerical strength of the Indians of Eastern North Carolina in 1710 was as follows: The Tuscaroras had fifteen towns; Haruta, Waqui, Contahnah, Anna-Ooka, Conauh-Kare, Harooka, Una-Nauhan, Kentanuska, Chunaneets, Kenta, Eno, Naurheghne, Oonossoora, Tosneoc, Nonawharitse, Nuhsoorooka and twelve hundred warriors; the Wacons two towns, Yupwarereman and Tooptatmere, one hundred and twenty warriors; the Machapungas one town, Maramiskeet, thirty warriors; the Bear River Indians one town, Rau dau-quaquank, fifty warriors; the Meherrins one town on Meherrin River, fifty warriors; the Chowans one town, Bennet's Creek, fifteen warriors; the Paspatanks one town on Paspatank River, ten warriors; the Poesketones one town on North River, thirty warriors; the Nottaways one town, Winoak Creek, thirty warriors; Hatteras Indians one town, Sand Banks, sixteen warriors; Connamox Indians two towns, Coranine and Raruta, twenty-five warriors; the Jaupins (probably Yeopims), only six people; and the Pamtigough Indians one town, an island, fifteen warriors. Upon a basis that three-fifths were old men, women and children there must have been at that time at least ten thousand Indians in Eastern North Carolina.

[3] In the branch of Pollock Swamp, which drains the southern extension of Bear Swamp, is a most remarkable natural formation in the shape of a salt deposit in the bottom of the swamp. It was first discovered by cattle going there to lick during long drouths when the bottom of the swamp was dry. During the Civil War, when salt was gold, some parties dug a well there, collected the water, and evaporated it in pans, making a very good quality of salt. When I visited this well several years ago, though the bottom of the swamp was entirely dry, the well was full of a sea-green water, which I examined and found strongly impregnated with salt.

September 22, 1711, marks the day of the bloody Indian massacre in Eastern North Carolina, when 112 settlers and 80 infants were brutally murdered, and that day was kept with prayer and fasting throughout the colony for many years. With tomahawk and torch they swept like fiends incarnate over Eastern North Carolina, their bloody trail extending even to the northeastern shores of Albemarle Sound and Chowan River. The desperate war which followed was finally brought to a successful close by a series of victories through Col. James Moore and his allied Indians; Capt. Barnwell also contributed largely to the success of the war, killing more than five hundred Indians. The last of June, 1713, the Tuscaroras, who were occupying Fort Carunche, evacuated it and joined the rest of their nation on the Roanoke, soon to abandon North Carolina forever.

They migrated to the southeastern end of Lake Oneida, New York, where they joined the Iroquois Confederation, which was composed of five nations, viz.: the Mohawks, Onondagas, Cayugas, Oneidas and the Senecas; the Tuscaroras with their allies, the Chowans, the Saponas and some others, formed the Sixth Nation of this Confederation: a part of the Canadian Indians are descended from the Iroquois. King Tom Blount[4] and a few of his faithful warriors remained in Bertie for awhile, but just before the Revolution the few Tuscaroras who were left in that county then migrated to the North, and joined their brethren of the Six Nations. Before leaving they sold all their vast domain (53,000 acres) except a tract in Bertie County about twelve miles square, called Indian Woods, which they were compelled to lease for a long term of one hundred and thirty-seven years.

Succarusa, an old chief of this tribe, visited Bertie about 1830 to collect the rents due his people on that long lease, and while there he went to take a look at the Indian Gallows, this was the last footprint of the Indian upon the shores of the Albemarle.

A part of the Tuscarora tribe still reside in Western New York where they maintain a tribal government, divided into clans called Otter, Beaver, Wolf, Bear, etc. The title of Sachem Chief is still given to their governor. Thomas Williams (Takeryerter), belonging to the Beaver Clan and rather a young man, was Chief Sachem in 1890, and Elias Johnson (Towernakee), was then the historian of the tribe. In 1901 there were three hundred and seventy-one Tuscaroras, all wearing citizen's clothes, entirely civilized, the majority of them could read and write, and about five-sixths of them could speak English.

In 1768 they numbered	200
In 1779 they numbered	200
In 1822 they numbered (Then residing at Lewiston, on Lake Ontario.)	314
In 1825 they numbered	253
In 1867 they numbered	360

[4]The late King Kalakaua was a lineal descendant of King Tom Blount, one of his descendants having married into the royal family of the Sandwich Islands.

In 1775 three departments of Indian Affairs were created by Congress, and Willie Jones was one of the commissioners of the Southern Department. The Tuscarora reservation in New York in 1771 (from an old map made by order of Gov. Tryon, the erstwhile notorious Governor of North Carolina), comprised 6249 acres. After their removal to New York they were loyal to us in the Revolution and in the War of 1812; during the Civil War they furnished volunteers to the United States government. They are now peaceable and orderly, with very few laws, and fewer disturbances of the public peace; their income is small and they are poor, though there are very few paupers. The Tuscaroras have substantial churches with Sunday schools fairly well attended, the most of them are Baptists and Presbyterians, while some are still pagans. They farm, raise stock, make maple-sugar, also baskets and bead-work; hunt, trap and fish. The sewing machine has been introduced among the women. A part of the original Six Nations are also living in Wisconsin and Indian Territory. As with other people without a history the Six Nations rely greatly upon their myths, their legends, and their traditions. They account for the presence of the Seven-Stars or Pleiades in the heavens by a most remarkable story. Many years ago seven little boys wanted to give a feast by themselves, which was denied them by their parents, in defiance they secretly secured and cooked a little white dog, and while dancing around him in great glee some unseen spirit translated them to the heavens, and changed them into a constellation; and now when they watch the twinkling of the Seven Stars at night in the blue grotto of the skies they say it is the seven little boys dancing around the little white dog.

The Yeopims were never very strong and were settled along the shores of Perquimans and Little Rivers. They granted to George Durant two tracts of land, one deed dated March 1, 1661, conveying a tract called Wecocomicke, now Durant's Neck, signed by Kilcocanen or Kistotanew, King of Yeopim, and recites "for a valuable consideration of satisfaction received with ye consent of my people"...."adjoining the land I formerly sold to Samuel Pricklove." Another deed dated August 4, 1661, and signed by Cuscutenew as King of Yeopim. These deeds were both registered October 24, 1716, and are now in Book "A," Register of Deeds office of Perquimans County.

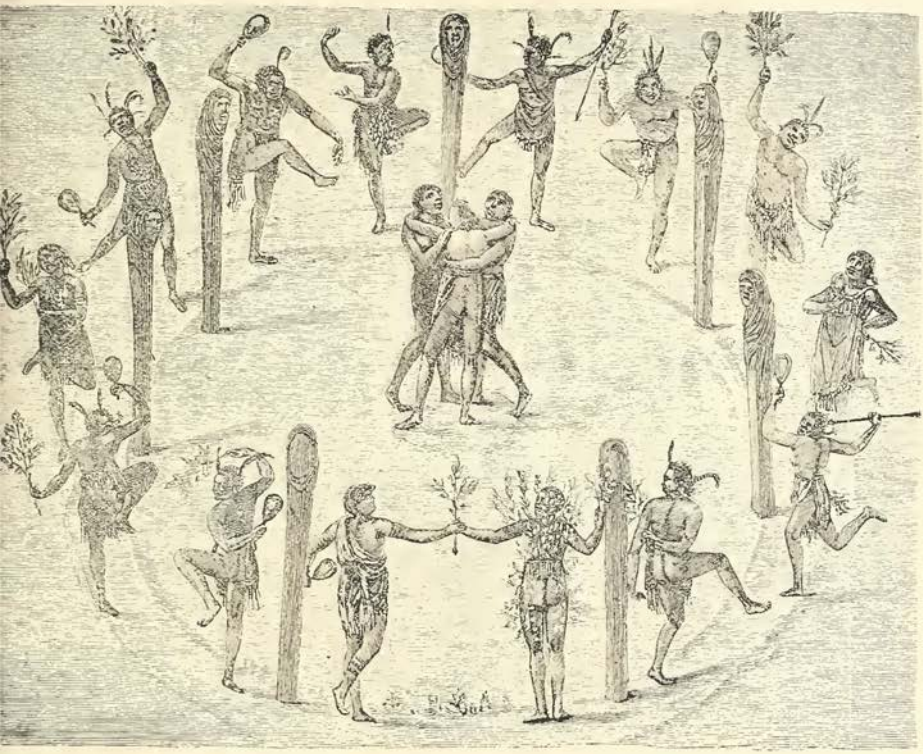
An exploring party sent out by Sir Richard Grenville in 1586 sailed up the Chowan as high as the confluence of the Meherrin and Nottoway Rivers, just below which they found an Indian town called Opanock (not very far from the present town of Winton). These Indians were very numerous then and had seven hundred warriors in the field: they were the Meherrins.

Col. Byrd in his History of the Dividing Line, 1729, describes in his own unique, original fashion his visit to the town of the Nottoway Indians near the line, then about about 200 strong, "The young men had painted themselves in a Hideous Manner, not so much for Ornament as terror. In that frightful Equipage they entertained us with Sundry War Dances, wherein they endeavoured to look as formidable as possible. The Instrument they danced to was an Indian drum, that is a large Gourd with a skin bract tort over the Mouth of it. The Dancers all Sang to this Musick, keeping exact Time with their feet, while their Heads and Arms were screwed into a thousand Menacing Postures. Upon this occasion the Ladies had arrayed themselves in all their finery. They were Wrapt in their Red and Blue Match-Coats thrown so Negligently about them that their Mehogany Skin appeared in Several Parts like the Lacedaemonian Damsels of Old."

There is a body of distinct people, mostly white, now living in Robeson County, North Carolina, who are recognized by



THE DANCE OF THE CAROLINA INDIANS AS REPRESENTED BY JOHN WHITE IN 1585.

(Original in the British Museum.)

The Roanoke Indians at their festivals and councils drank the Cassine, which served them as a sort of stimulant: it was a decoction made from the dried leaves of Ilex Yupon, now drank under the name of Yupon Tea.

The reader is referred to Mr. Edward Eggleston's able discussion of the DeBry pictures in the Nation and Century magazines.

the State as the Croatans and given separate schools, and who by their own traditions trace their genealogy directly from the Croatans associated with the lost Raleigh Colony. Prof. Alexander Brown, of the Royal Historical Society of England, has discovered some old maps dating back to 1608-1610 clearly confirming, it is stated, the traditions of these people in regard to their lineage, and the reader is respectfully referred to those able pamphlets upon that subject by Mr. Hamilton McMillan and Dr. Stephen B. Weeks.

After the Tuscarora War was over the Chowanokes, who had remained all the while the faithful friends of the whites and were residing at their ancient town on the Chowan, called Mavaton, were allotted about four thousand acres of land between Sarum[5] and Bennet's Creek, mostly poquosin, and ordered to move there. Of this once populous tribe only about fifteen warriors then remained. They had originally two good towns, Muscamunge and Chowanock—Muscamunge was not very far from the present town of Edenton; they had also at one time more than seven hundred warriors in the field. King Hoyter was the last of the Chowanoke Kings in this section. But restless and dissatisfied they finally requested permission to cast their lot with the Saponas, who migrated North to the Tuscaroras and helped to form the complement of the Sixth Nation. In their intermarriage with various tribes, their divisions, their numerous migrations and amalgamations, they have become scattered all over the North and West, and it is impossible to trace them.

So passed the pure blood of the Chowanokes, and has been lost and blended with the various tribes of our frontier—that fantastic caravan which is marching sadly to its own funeral pyre across the golden West, but when the dreamy Indian summer spreads its blue hazy gauze over the landscape like a veiled prophet, and the autumn leaves are painted upon the easel of the first frost, and the grand amphitheater of the forest is carpeted with the richest patterns of Axminster, and the whole world is a wonderland spread upon a gigantic canvass of earth, and sky, and water—when the glittering belt of Mazzaroth spans the heavens, and the jewels sparkle brightest in the dagger of Orion, it is then that the grim phantom of the red man returns to his old hunting ground, as erst he did: All feathered and with leather buskins, and bow put crosswise on his breast, in his periagua he crosses the Great Divide of the Spirit Land, and from under the black zone of the shore-shadows he glides into the moonlight—out upon the dimpled, polished mirror of the river—Hark! you can hear each stroke of his paddle, if the wind down the river is fair.

[5] An old map of this section shows a chapel just south of Bennet's Creek, which must have been the Sarum Chapel of the early ministers of the S. P. G. A school, the first in North Carolina, was at one time located at Sarum for the religious and educational training of these indians. Lawson says that in 1714 they were still residing on Bennet's Creek.

GLIMPSES OF HISTORY IN THE NAMES OF OUR COUNTIES.

BY KEMP P. BATTLE, LL.D.

No people can have a proper self-respect who are not familiar with the deeds of their ancestors. We North Carolinians have been deficient in this regard. Men will tell you more of Bunker Hill and Brandywine than of the more important, more decisive battles of King's Mountain and Guilford Court-House. They know fairly well the incidents of past times in other countries, often very minutely—that Caesar was bald and was subject to epileptic fits, that Cleopatra did not have the color and thick lips of a negro, that Queen Elizabeth was red-haired and Queen Anne was fat and had seventeen children, all of whom died young—but when you ask them about the great men of North Carolina whose valor gained our independence, whose statesmanship shaped our political destinies and whose teachings moulded our minds and morals, their answers are vague and unsatisfactory.

The names of the counties of our State are especially instructive. Associations with every epoch of our history are wrapped up in or suggested by them. Only one seems to be what is called a "fancy name," and even that, Transylvania, in its sonorous beauty, recalls the fact of our kinship to the great conquering, law-giving race inhabiting the imperial city of the Old World on the banks of the Tiber, from whom we derived much of our blood and more of our speech through the Norman-Roman-Celtic people, who followed William the Conqueror into England. We find it first in the ambitious but futile enterprise of Judge Richard Henderson and his associates, the Transylvania colony.

Counties are created for the convenience of the people who reside in them. In a State gradually filled up by immigration the times of their formation indicate quite accurately the flow of such immigration. The names given to them by the legislatures were as a rule intended to compliment persons or things then held in peculiar honor. As the statutes do not, except in two instances, mention those intended to be commemorated, we are forced to study the history of the times, to look thro' the eyes of our ancestors and thus gather their intention. Combining the dates of formation with the names of the counties we gather many interesting and important facts connected with the past.

I premise that the Spaniards once claimed our territory to be Florida. Queen Elizabeth in the Raleigh charter named it with other territory, Virginia. Charles I. (or Carolus), in the Heath charter named it Carolina, so when Charles II. in the grant to the Lords Proprietors retained the name Carolina, of course our State name comes from his father. It was not called from Charles IX., of France, as Bancroft and others say.

North Carolina has, by the creation of the county of Columbus, to the extent of her power, repaired the wrong done the learned and daring Genoese in allowing the name of Americus Vespucius to be affixed to the New World.

Our easternmost county, along which rolls the majestic ocean, which has within its limits stormy Hatteras and the lovely island of Roanoke, its county seat named after the good Indian Manteo, records only an infant's wail, a dark mystery—a memory of pathos and of wonder.

What was the fate of Virginia Dare, the first infant born to the impetuous, daring, energetic race, in a few short years to replace the forests of her day with all the grand works of eighty millions of civilized people! Did the tomahawk crash into her brain? Did she become the squaw of an Indian warrior, and did the governor's granddaughter end her days in the wigwam of a savage? Recent writers, Hamilton McMillan and Stephen B. Weeks, have brought many plausible arguments to prove that the lost colony wandered to the swamps of Robeson, and the white man's desperate energy and the red man's treacherous guile created the cunning, cruel, ferocious, bloody Henry Berry Lowery and his gang.

North Carolina was the victim of a gigantic monopoly. After restoration of Charles II., in the first flush of his gratitude, to eight of his great lords he granted of his royal prerogative a tract of land stretching across this continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the parallel which divides North Carolina from Virginia to that which passes through Florida by Cedar Keys. No claim, however, was ever made west of the Mississippi river, and part of that east of it was given up.

The names of these favored lords were: Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, George Monk, Duke of Albemarle, William, Lord Craven, John Lord Berkeley, Anthony, Lord Ashley, Sir George Carteret, Sir William Berkeley, Sir John Colleton. You find those names, besides in Albemarle Sound, in the counties of Craven and Carteret. The county of Colleton is in South Carolina.

Only one of these ever resided in America, Sir Wm. Berkeley, a member of a noble family which in the most dismal days of Charles I. and his son, were staunch adherents to the crown, suffering banishment and confiscation for its sake. He was the Governor Berkeley of Virginia who suppressed Bacon's rebellion in so bloody a way that Charles II. said: "That old fool has taken more lives without offence in that naked country than I in all England for the murder of my father," and who thanked his God that "there were no free schools or printing press here, and I hope I shall have none of them these hundred years."

Among them you will notice conspicuous lights in English History. There was the Lord Chancellor, Hyde, Earl of Clarendon, the eminent historian, whose daughter, wife of James II., was the mother of two queens, Mary and Anne. There was Anthony Ashley Cooper, the brilliant and wicked Earl of Shaftesbury, who, notwithstanding his wickedness, was one of the chief authors of that monument of liberty, the Habeas Corpus Act. And there was General Monk, the Cromwellian general, by whose skill and prudence Charles II. was restored to the throne without bloodshed. His title you will recognize not only in our eastern sound but in the county seat of Stanly. Two of Shaftesbury's names may be seen in the two rivers, Ashley and Cooper, which surround Charleston, while a kinsman of Earl Clarendon became Governor Hyde, of North Carolina, and his name was given to an eastern county.

The Lords Proprietors contemplated a county called Clarendon, after Edward Hyde, the Earl of Clarendon, who took his title from a royal hunting seat in Wiltshire, England, but the settlers moved away and the county fell still-born.

The first successful municipal corporation in the State was Albemarle, comprising all of the area around the Albemarle Sound. The plan was to have very large counties, composed of "Precincts." Two only were created—Albemarle, composd of Currituck, Pasquotank, Perquimans, Chowan, Tyrrell and Bertie, and Bath, composed of Beaufort, Hyde, Craven, Carteret, New Hanover, Tyrrell, Edgecombe, Bladen, Onslow. These minor divisions were called Precincts.

Albemarle perpetuates the ducal title of General Monk. In France it took the form of Aumale, and was the title of a famous duke of recent years, a member of the Orleans family. Until 1696 Albemarle was the only large political organization in our limits. In that year Bath County was created out of territory bordering on Pamlico Sound and as far South as Cape Fear River. It was named in honor of John Granville, Earl of Bath, whose daughter Grace married Sir George Carteret, grandson of the Lord Proprietor of the same name. Sir George dying in 1695, the Earl of Bath represented his infant grandson, Sir John Carteret, afterwards Earl Granville.

In 1738 the great counties of Albemarle and Bath, with their Marshals and Deputy Marshals and separate courts were abolished and the Precincts became counties. For convenience sake I will call these latter counties from the beginning.

In 1672 there were four, some say, others three, precincts, the eastern being Carteret, the western Shaftesbury, the middle Berkeley (pronounced Barclay), and the other unknown. Twelve years afterwards the names were changed to Currituck, Chowan, Pasquotank and Perquimans, the former name of Pasquotank being lost, if it ever existed.

In 1729 the representatives of seven of the great lords finding in their possessions neither honor nor profit but only continual torment, sold their rights to the crown for only $12,500 each, it being a wonderful illustration of the rapid growth of the country, that about 170 years ago lands through the heart of the continent were sold at the rate of 18,000 acres for $1.00.

My father was a practicing lawyer at the time of this great sale, when the lands of North Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas and California were disposed of at the rate of 100 acres for one cent.

Sixty-six years, as in other sublunary matters, make great changes in property and titles. Families die out, estates are sold, men pass away and others stand in their shoes, and so it came to pass that the Lords Proprietors of 1729, in the time of George II., were different men from the Lords Proprietors of 1663, in the reign of Charles II.

We find the names of some of these new owners affixed to counties in our State. There are Granville and Beaufort, county and town, from Henry, Duke of Beaufort, Bertie county from James and John Bertie, Tyrrell from Sir John Tyrrell.

From 1729 the State was a colony under the government of England until the war of the Revolution.

It was fashionable to compliment members of the royalty or nobility or statesmen, connected officially with the colonies, by giving their names to municipal organizations of the new country. Hence we have Orange, after a collateral descendant of the great King who banished the Stuarts, New Hanover and Brunswick in compliment to the Georges, Cumberland after the great duke who defeated Charles Edward at Culloden, Johnston after good old Governor Gabriel Johnston, Martin after Governor Josiah Martin. We had once Dobbs and Tryon, after provincial governors. We have Onslow after Arthur Onslow, Edgecombe from Baron Richard Edgecombe, Bladen, after Martin Bladen, Duplin, after Lord Duplin, Baron Hay, Hertford, Halifax, Wilmington, Hillsboro, Bute, Richmond, Northampton after the father of the Earl of Wilmington, after noblemen of those names, all of whom held places of trust in the mother country. I will tell particularly of others.

Of all the statesmen of England the most brilliant was the first Wm. Pitt, fondly named by the people the Great Commoner. He was eminent for fiery and impetuous eloquence. In a venal age the purity of his morals were unquestioned. He made Great Britain the first nation of the world. He wrested Canada from the French. He founded the British Empire in India. As Lamartine says, "He was a public man in all the greatness of the phrase—the soul of a nation personified in an individual—the inspiration of a people in the heart of a patrician."

In 1760, in the plentitude of his fame, the year after Wolfe fell victorious on the heights of Quebec, by the influence of the Royal Governor Dobbs, a new county formed from Craven was called after the great English minister.

Lord Carteret, afterwards Earl Granville, refused to part with his one-eighth share, and to him in 1744 was allotted a territory 3,000 miles long and about 70 miles broad, between the parallel near the centre of North Carolina, 35 degrees 34 minutes, and that which forms the Virginia line. The counties created while his land office was open for purchasers derived their rectangular shape from being made conformable to his boundaries, just as the counties of our new States are not defined by running streams and mountain ridges and the curved limits of swamps, but by the surveyor's chain and the theodolite. The straight line north of Moore, Montgomery, Stanly, Cabarrus, Mecklenburg, and south of Chatham, Randolph, Davidson, Rowan and Iredell shows on the map the southern limit of Granville's great property.

In the beginning of this century there occurred at Raleigh a battle of giants. The scene of the conflict was the Circuit Court of the United States. The arbiter of the fray was Judge Henry Potter. On the side of the plaintiffs the leader was William Gaston. On the side of the defendant the most eminent was Duncan Cameron. It was the heirs of Earl Granville struggling to get back from the people of North Carolina the magnificent estate which they had won by the sword. When the fight was ended all that remained to the heirs of the noble Earl was the honor of naming one of our counties Granville. They carried their futile quest to the Supreme Court of the United States, but the war of 1812 was coming on and the plaintiff retired from the pursuit, somewhat placated by a large indemnity from the British Treasury.

Lord Carteret took possession of his North Carolina territory in 1744. He sent forth his agents, Childs, Frohock and others, and opened his land offices and made his sales. His practice was to require reservations of quit-rents to be paid yearly. The settlers had the double burden of paying rents on their lands to Granville and poll taxes to the royal governor at Newbern.

The money raised from these exactions was carried to England or to Newbern, and no expenditure was made of appreciable benefit to taxpayers. A few officials about Hillsboro gathered large fees, and grew fat, and a grand Governor's Palace was built in a far-off town. So rage grew fierce and tempers waxed fiery hot, and the old flint and steel rifles were rubbed up and oiled and bullets were moulded, and rusty scythe blades were sharpened for swords, and from the hills of Granville to the secluded gorges of the Brushy Mountains the Regulators banded together, and the struggle against oppression had its beginning.

It was a duty that we the inheritors of the liberty won in part by their valor, should show our appreciation of their efforts, by giving to one of the most thriving counties in the State the name of Alamance, from the name of the battle which crushed them.

Let us proceed with our story. There were four counties created by Governor Tryon a year before the battle of Alamance, in 1770, Guilford, Surry, Chatham and Wake. Whence these names?

It is difficult for the present generation to understand the feelings of our ancestors towards Lord North, afterwards Earl of Guilford. He was not a bad nor a cruel man. He was in England personally wonderfully popular. He combined, like our Vance, genius and power with multiform wit and unfading good humor. But he was in favor of taxing America, and we hated him.

Previous to 1770 the county of Rowan covered nearly all Granville's territory west of the Yadkin, and much east of that river. Orange, then of extensive area, joined it on the east. To prevent combination among the Regulators, Governor Tryon procured the incorporation of four new counties, and wishing to please all parties he called one after the Earldom of Guilford, of which Lord North was heir apparent, another Surry, in honor of Lord Surrey, afterwards Duke of Norfolk, a follower of Chatham; a third Chatham, after the great opponent of Lord North, with its county-seat at Pittsborough, and the fourth after the maiden name of his wife.

The difference between the new and the old country grew and became more angry and wide. Again was the sound of cannon heard among our hills. With consummate generalship Greene baffled the trained soldiers of Cornwallis, and at Guilford Court House, though not technically a victor, prepared the way for Yorktown.

The obstinate King and his minister were forced to yield and a new ministry, headed by one of the warmest friends of the colonies, Charles Watson Wentworth, Marquis of Rockingham, paved the way for the acknowledgement of our independence. And, as if with a grim irony, our ancestors carved from the territory of Guilford, as a punishment for its namesake's misconduct, its northern half, and gave to it and its county-seat the names of his conquering rival. To the great General who had snatched victory from defeat, and rescued from British thraldom the Southern province, they expressed their gratitude not only by a gift of 25,000 acres of land, but kept his memory ever honored and his name ever green, by assigning it to a rich county and county seat in the east, and to the county seat of Guilford, destined to become a prosperous inland city.

The gratitude of our ancestors for the services of those abroad and at home, in legislative halls and in the conflicts of war, who had fought for our liberties, did not end here. By the neighbor of old Guilford on the south they commemorated the labors and virtues of the first President of the Continental Congress, Peyton Randolph, whose kinsmen, Edmund Randolph and John Randolph, of Roanoke, afterwards became so conspicuous.

Different sections of old Surry bear the names of John Wilkes, the champion of liberty, the victorious foe of arbitrary arrests, an ardent supporter of the Marquis of Rockingham, and John Stokes, covered with honorable scars of battle, the first Judge of the District Court of North Carolina. And dotted over the State are many other evidences of the gratitude of our people for the sufferings and success of the old heroes, not in brass and marble, but in the more enduring forms of counties and town of fairest lands and noblest men and women—such as Washington and Montgomery, Warren and Gates, Lincoln and Wayne, Franklin and Madison, from other States, and from our own limits, Ashe, Lenoir and Harnett, Buncombe and Caswell, Cleveland and McDowell, Davidson and Davie, Nash and Person, Robeson and Sampson, Rutherford and Stokes, Alexander and Iredell, Jones, Moore and Burke. Their friends in England, the leaders of the peace party which, after a long struggle, forced the obstinate King to grant independence to the colonies, not only the Marquis of Rockingham and John Wilkes and Lord Surrey, whom I have named, but Chief Justice Camden and the Duke of Richmond were honored in this land so far from the scene of their labors.

Governor Gabriel Johnston, the able Scotchman, who was by far the best Governor our State had prior to the Revolution, died in 1752, a year memorable for the change of Old Style into New Style Calendar. Shortly before his death the county of Anson was created, including all the western part of the State and Tennessee south of Granville's line. After the death of Johnston, for a short while Nathaniel Rice, and on his death Matthew Rowan, an estimable man, as President of the Council, acted as Governor until superseded by the Scotch-Irishman, Governor Dobbs.

It was found best to erect a new county, comprising all the lands of Lord Granville west of Orange. The new county was called Rowan, in honor of the acting Governor. Nine years afterwards, in 1762, Mecklenburg was cut off from Anson and its county seat was called Charlotte.

In 1761, the Admiral George, Lord Anson, with all the pomp and splendor which the British navy could supply, was bringing from Germany a blooming bride to the young King George III. Her name was Charlotte. She was a princess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz.

Few men stand out in English history more distinguished for romantic daring as a navigator, for the strong, sturdy qualities of English sailors, descendants of the old Northmen who issued from their frozen fiords in Denmark, Norway and Sweden, like an irresistible torrent to conquer the nations, than George Lord Anson. He led a squadron around Cape Horn in the perils of winter, and after many captures of Spanish ships and towns, circumnavigated the globe. He was the pioneer of the great victories of the English navy.

George Lord Anson was the teacher of Nelson. He it was who gave the daring order which has led to so many victories over overwhelming odds, by English over French and Spaniards: "Close with the enemy, gun to gun, hand to hand, cutlass to cutlass, no matter what odds against you." In early life he purchased lands on the waters of the Peedee, but his dreams of forest happiness were broken by the alarm of war. In 1749, when at the zenith of his popularity, his name was given to the vast country which extended from the limits of Bladen to the far waters of the mighty Mississippi.

George the Third began his reign in 1760, for a few short years, one of the most popular kings who ever sat on a throne, both at home and in the colonies. When his bride, the homely but sensible and pious Charlotte, came from the north of Germany to England, she was the favorite of the day. It was the fashion to admire everything Prussian from the stern Frederick, then striking some of the most terrific blows of the seven-year war, to the blooming maiden, whether princess or ganzemadchen. The bride was received in London with enthusiastic ovations. Her manner, conversation and dress were heralded as if she were a goddess. Her manners were pronounced by no less a judge than Horace Walpole as "decidedly genteel." Her dress was of white satin, brocaded with gold, distended by enormous hoops. She had a stomacher of diamonds. On her head was a cap of finest lace, stiffened so as to resemble a butterfly, fastened to the front of the head by jewels. I quote one of her speeches. When she arrived in front of St. James' Palace, where she was to meet the groom, the bride turned pale. The Duchess of Hamilton rallied her. The princess replied: "Yes, my dear Duchess, you may laugh, you are not going to be married, but it is no joke to me." It was a tremendously exciting time.

Horace Walpole writes, "Royal marriages, coronations and victories come tumbling over one another from distant parts of the globe like the words of a lady romance writer—I don't know where I am—I had scarce found Mecklenburg-Strelitz with a magnifying glass on the map before I was whisked to Pondicherry. Then thunder go the Tower guns; behold the French are totally defeated by Duke Ferdinand of Brunswick, at the battle of Minden." The joy of this period and the satisfaction over this marriage extended to the wilds of North Carolina, and the good queen's name, Charlotte of Mecklenburg, was affixed, as soon as the news came, to a county and its capital. She was a model of domestic virtue, and the court, through her influence, was pure in the midst of a corrupt society. And when our ancestors, in the angry passions of war in 1779, expunged from the map the hated name of Tryon, when the inhabitants of this section were the fiercest fighters against her husband, their swords as sharp as hornet stings, they allowed the name of the good queen to remain as a perpetual tribute to all womanly virtues.

Note the coincidence, that just as Admiral Anson introduced Charlotte of Mecklenburg into England as its queen, so in the distant colony the county of Anson in North Carolina political history, went before and was usher to the county of Mecklenburg.

It should be a warning lesson to all rulers that only 13 years after this ebullition of loyal affection the most defiant resolutions and the most spirited action against England's king came from those enlightened men whose county and town bore the name of England's queen. The chords of sentimental devotion snapped when strained by hard and real assaults on inherited liberties. With many a sigh over the sweet past, now turned into bitterness, our ancestors addressed themselves to the stern task before them.

Some of our counties bear the names of Indian tribes which once roamed over these hills and dales. There are Cherokee and Currituck, Catawba and Chowan, Watauga and Pasquotank, Alleghany and Perquimans, Yadkin* and Pamlico. A miserable remnant of the Cherokees still live under the shadow of the Smokies. As these people passed away toward the setting sun they left here and there their musical names, well nigh the sole relic of their language, their sepulchral mounds and mouldering skeletons and tawdy ornaments within, almost the sole reminders of their stalwart warriors and graceful maidens; their arrows and tomahawk heads, the harmless mementos of their once dreaded weapons of war.

*It is contended by some that Yadkin is a corrupt pronunciation of Adkin, the name of an old settler on this river.

CORNWALLIS VS. MORGAN AND GREENE.

Two of the Piedmont counties, Catawba and Yadkin, have rivers flowing by and through them, bearing their names, which bring to mind most thrilling incidents of the Revolutionary war. The gallant Morgan, fighting in defiance of the prudential maxims of war, had humbled Tarleton at Cowpens and captured many prisoners, guns and ammunition. Cornwallis, only 25 miles distant, with his trained army of veterans, hastened to avenge the disgrace. It was in the dead of winter. The roads were softened by continued rains. For twelve days the pursuit continued. Nearer and nearer rushed on the pursuing foe. Success seemed almost in Cornwallis' grasp. From the summit of every hill could be seen only a few miles off the retreating columns, foot-store and weary, in front the luckless prisoners, in the rear the dauntless rear-guards. Softly and pleasantly flowed the river over the pebbles of its Island Ford. Swiftly and easily through the waters the flying column passed. Up the steep hills they toiled and then rested for the night, while the vengeful British, only two hours behind, waited until the morning light should direct their steps to sure and easy victory.

MAN PROPOSES, GOD DISPOSES.

The race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong. As the Red Sea waves saved the trembling Israelites from boasting Pharaoh's hordes, as Old Father Tiber drove back Lars Porsena of Clusium from the gates of Rome, where Horatius kept the bridge, so the mighty Catawba roused himself in his fury to thwart the exulting Briton. From the slopes of the Brushy, and South and Linville and the distant Blue Ridge Mountains poured the angry torrents, and when the gray light of morning broke a yellow flood, swift and deep and strong, raged in his front. The Greeks or the Romans would have deified the protecting river, and in a lofty temple, with splendid architectural adornments, would have been a noble statue carved with wonderful art dedicated to Catawba Salvator, the protecting river god.

After a short rest, Cornwallis, who was an active and able officer, in later years distinguished as Viceroy of Ireland and Governor-General of India, burnt the superfluous baggage of his troops and hurried to overtake and destroy Greene's army, then being gathered out of the fragments of the forces of Gates scattered at Camden. Small bodies of militia guarded the fords of the Catawba, now become passable. At Cowan's ford was a young officer, who had gained promotion under the eye of the great Washington at Brandywine, Germantown and Monmouth. He was in the place of Rutherford, captured at Camden, Brigadier-General of the militia of the section. He was an active and able commander who had infused his fiery energy and pluck into the people. Making a pretended attack at Beattie's ford, Cornwallis directed all the force of his army at Cowan's ford. A spirited resistance was made against the overwhelming odds and the young general was left dead on the bloody field. The Continental Congress, in grateful recognition of his services, voted that a monument be erected to his memory, but a hundred years have not witnessed the inception of this worthy undertaking.

North Carolina has erected a far more enduring cenotaph by giving the name of William Davidson to one of her most prosperous counties.

Forward in rapid retreat push the thin columns of Greene, forward press the strong forces of Cornwallis. The fortunes of the entire Southern country tremble in the balance. If Greene's army shall be saved, he will rally around him the scattered patriots and soon confront his adversary, ready on more equal terms to contend for the mastery. If it shall be overtaken nothing can save it from destruction, and from the James river to the Chattahooche the standard of King George will be raised over a conquered people. The eyes of all friends of liberty are turned with alarmed anxiety toward the unequal contest.

Again does the god of battle interpose to thwart the well-laid scheme. Again do the descending floods dash their angry waters against the baffled Britons. Again does the flushed and furious foe stand powerless. The noble Yadkin emulates her sister, Catawba, and interposes her swollen stream, fierce and deep, between him and the object of his vengeance.

DAVIE AND THE UNIVERSITY.

Davie was the Father of the University. Joseph Caldwell was its first President, cared for it in its early years, while Swain carried on his work. Alfred Moore, and John Haywood, an able Attorney-General and Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, assisted as Trustees in selecting its site, while Mitchell lost his life in her service. After all these were counties named. One of the most active co-fighters with Davidson in checking the enemy and gaining time for gathering strength to meet him in the field was William Richardson Davie, at first a cavalry officer and then in the more arduous but more useful position of Commissary General. He was a strong staff on which General Greene had leaned. He was conspicuous in civil pursuits; an able lawyer, an orator of wide influence. He was afterwards Governor of the State; one of the Envoys of the United States to the Court of France, who averted a threatened war. I find him styled in the Journal of the University in 1810, "the Father of the University," and he well deserves the title. We have his portrait at the University. His face shows his character, elegant, refined, noble, intellectual, firm. It was most fitting that Davidson and Davie should be side-by-side on the banks of the rivers which witnessed their patriotism, and in the country whose liberties they gained.

The county of Wayne brings to our minds the great soldier, the military genius of whom electrified the well-nigh despairing colonists by the brilliant capture of Stony Point.

James Glasgow was one of the most trusted men of the Revolution. In conjunction with Alexander Gaston, the father of Judge Gaston, and Richard Cogdell, grandfather of George E. Badger, he was one of the Committee of Safety of Newbern District. He was Major of the Regiment of the county of Dobbs.

When North Carolina, on the 18th of December, 1776, adopted its constitution and took its place among the free States of the earth, Richard Caswell was its first Governor and James Glasgow its first Secretary of State. A grateful Legislature gave to a county formed out of old Orange, mother of counties of great men, the appellation of Caswell. And when it expunged from our map the odious remembrance of Dobbs, no name was found more worthy to designate one of the counties carved out of its territory than Glasgow.

Behold the reward of dishonesty and crime: The name of Greene has supplanted on the map that of the obliterated Glasgow, and on the records of the Free and Accepted Masons the black, dismal lines of disgrace are drawn around the signature of the poor wretch, who was weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Among the heroic men who poured out their life-blood on distant battlefields—on the far-away hills of Canada—there was none more gallant than Benjamin Forsyth, whose name survives in one of the most flourishing counties in our State.

The war of 1812 does not seem to have stirred the hearts of our people to great extent, as I find no county names from its heroes except Forsyth. I feel sure that Jackson was honored for his Presidential and Creek Indian services as much as for the victory of New Orleans and Clay for his popularity with his party, long after his service as War Speaker of the House of Representatives.

EASTERN AND WESTERN CONTROVERSY.

The constitution of 1776 was formed at a time when hatred and fear of executive power and of kingly government were at the utmost. Hence resulted an instrument under which nearly all the powers were in the hands of the General Assembly. This body appointed the Governor, and chief State officers, the Attorney-General and Solicitors, the Judges and all the militia officers, and likewise controlled their salaries. Then, as now, it elected the Justices of the Peace, and these officers elected the Sheriffs and other county officers. The Assembly thus controlled the executive and judicial branches. It had unlimited power of taxation and could incur unlimited public debt. It could, and did, tax one kind of property, and exempt others.

The powers of the Legislature of 1776 being so great it was important that the different sections of the State should have in the elections of the members equivalent voice. But this was very far from being the case. The Senate consisted of one member from each county. The House of two from each county and six, afterwards seven, Borough members. In 1776 there were 25 Eastern and 8 Western counties. In both branches the West was outnumbered 3 to 1.

The wonderful invention which is effecting greater changes in behalf of mankind than all the inventions the world ever saw before, the railroad, inflamed to fever heat, the hostility of the Western people to the old constitution, which had been quickened a dozen years before when canal digging everywhere had been inaugurated by the finishing of the Erie Canal, of New York. An agitation ensued which shook the State from the Smoky Mountains to Chickamicomico—the West demanding in thunder tones the correction of the abominable inequality and injustice of representation by counties.

One of the most prominent leaders in this movement so important to the West was Wm. Julius Alexander, in 1828 Speaker of the House of Commons, afterwards Solicitor of the Western District, in his prime one of the most popular and able men of this section. He was, young people will be interested in learning, likewise distinguished for having won the hand of a most beautiful and admired belle, Catharine Wilson, whose charms attracted visitors from distant regions.

Some of the other prominent actors in this struggle, such as Cabarrus, Macon, Gaston, Yancey, Stanly, Swain, Henderson, Graham, are represented in your list of counties.

The deep valleys which separate the hills of Devonshire in England are called "coombes," or as we spell it, "combes." On the margin of the Tamar, which with the Plym, forms the noble harbour of Plymouth, rises a hill noted for its picturesque loveliness. It is called Mount Edgecombe (the edge or margin of the valley). It is the territorial title of an English Earl. In 1733 Sir Richard, Baron Edgecombe, was a lord of the Treasury, and it was in his honor that the new-born county in North Carolina was called. The eminent Admiral, George, Earl of Edgecombe, was his son.

The name Wilson brings to our minds one of the best types of North Carolina statesmen. He was long the trusted representative in the State Senate of a people who required of their public men, prudence, economy, and strictest integrity.

It was when he might have been seeking the repose of an honorable old age that Louis D. Wilson offered his services as a volunteer in the war with Mexico. It was a grateful act on the part of the General Assembly, on the motion of the people who loved him and whom he loved, and to whose poor he bequeathed the bulk of his fortune, to name the county cut off mostly from his native Edgecombe in his perpetual honor.

The county of Nash is, like Wilson, the daughter of Edgecombe. In one of the darkest hours of the Revolution, after famine and freezing cold had reduced our troops almost to despair, fell General Francis Nash, brother of Governor Abner Nash, at Germantown. The General Assembly in the year of the battle created this county as his monument. All who knew his nephew, the late Chief Justice Frederick Nash, so distinguished for Christian virtues and the natural courtesy of the perfect gentleman, could trace in him the features of the chivalric military hero. It was reserved for a large-hearted citizen of Pennsylvania, Mr. John F. Watson, with the aid of his townsmen of Germantown, to erect a marble shaft over his dust at Kulpsville, where his shattered body was interred in the presence of Washington and his gallant army in 1777, amid the falling of the October leaves.

In a distant part of the State, among the peaks and ravines of the Blue Ridge, is the memorial county, as is stated in the charter, of another Revolutionary hero, who was wounded when Nash was killed, who fought also at Brandywine, Camden, Guilford Court House and Eutaw, and was a leading citizen for half a century after the achievement of our independence, Lieutenant-Colonel William Polk, one of our earliest and wisest friends of higher education.

Another epoch in our history I will mention and my paper will be finished. It is the great Civil War, in which North Carolina struggled for the victory with all the consciousness of rectitude, with all the devotion of patriotism and the desperate energy of a high-spirited race unused to defeat and fighting for what they thought their rights. She threw without grudging the sacrifice into the tremendous vortex the most valued of her treasures and the noblest of her sons. Although defeated and for a season crushed, she could not forget those who at her bidding served so faithfully and strove so manfully, albeit vainly, with muscle and brain to carry out her orders. She bows obediently to the decision of the God of Battles, yet in her great warm heart she cherishes the fame and the sufferings of her sons, and hence we find on the map of the State the name of one of Lee's best generals, the gallant Pender, whose blood stained the heights of Gettysburg, and of him who after a short, faithful service at the front, became the best War Governor of the South, who in the direst needs of the Confederacy fed and clothed our North Carolina soldiers and re-animated their drooping spirits with fervid eloquence, our beloved Senator, Zebulon Baird Vance. Illustrating this and other periods in legislative halls is, in the front rank of our statesmen, William A. Graham.

It is most fitting that the extraordinary advancement in industrial enterprise, first inaugurated in the town of Durham, should be recognized by our law-making power in the creation of the county of the same name. May it be an incitement to and prognostication of the development of our resources and the increase of wealth in our borders. The name is all the more fitting because to the Lords Proprietors were given the almost royal powers of the Bishop of Durham.

In conclusion, the county last created transfers to our map the name of the land so full of associations of beauty and of grandeur, from which, partly by direct immigration, partly by way of North Ireland, so many of our ablest and best people came—Scotland.

And now let us point the moral of these glimpses of past history. When you hear the names of our counties, do not stand with vacant eyes. Let them bring to mind the teachings associated with their names, the various epochs of our history, Indian traditions, hereditary aristocracy, colonial systems, the horrors of war, the upward march toward constitutional liberty, the triumphs of industry, the advance of civilization and of Christianty. In remembering the leaders do not forget the humble followers, "the unnamed demigods of history," as Kossuth calls them, who gained so much for their descendants and for mankind generally, and lie in forgotten graves.

From the exterminated Indians learn a great political lesson. If their warring tribes could have united and opposed their combined strength against the European invaders, they might for many years have held their homes, and in the end amalgamated with their conquerors. Let us all discard past differences and cherish the union of the States, for in that Union, the States "distinct as the billows, yet one as the sea," in the words of the poet, or in the language of the Supreme Court, an "indissoluble union of indestructible States," lies our strength. Let the hatreds of our great Civil War be buried forever. The God of Battles has decided against the idea of secession. On the walls of the Atheneum in Boston are two swords crossed, their deadly mission ended. Under them is an inscription showing that they belonged to the ancestors of the historian, Prescott, who fought on opposite sides on Bunker Hill. The old warfare of Whigs and Tories has long since ceased, and in like manner let the descendants of those who followed the Stars and Stripes, shoulder to shoulder with those above whom waved the Stars and Bars, strive to gain all moral excellence and all material prosperity for the great Republic of the World.

ADMIRAL SIR THOMAS FRANKLAND.

A COLONIAL ADMIRAL OF THE CAPE FEAR.

BY JAMES SPRUNT, BRITISH VICE-CONSUL AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

The Colonial plantations on the lower Cape Fear River have long yielded to the patient and persevering student of local literature a generous contribution of interesting history pertaining to the eventful years which marked the destiny of a brave and generous people. Throughout the Colonial period these important estates were held by men of eminence and of action, and from that time to the present day their owners have been gentlemen to the manner born, fitted by birth and education for the highest social and civic stations. Read, for example, the line of "Orton" proprietors who have lived upon this land for nearly two hundred years.

Originally obtained by patent from the Lords Proprietors under Charles II. in 1725, to Col. Maurice Moore, then "King" Roger Moore, William Moore 2nd, Governor Arthur Dobbs, Governor Wm. Tryon, Richard Quince 1st, Richard Quince 2nd, Richard Quince 3rd, Governor Benjamin Smith, Dr. Fred J. Hill, Richard Currer Roundell (a nephew of Lord Selbourne, Lord Chancellor of England), and, lastly, to the late Col. K. M. Murchison.

The lordly residence of the Chief Justice Eleazer Allen, upon the adjacent plantation of Lilliput, which was distinguished in his day by a large and liberal hospitality, has long since disappeared, but the grand old oaks which lifted their majestic branches to the soft south breezes in Colonial times, still sing their murmured requiem above a "boundless contiguity of shade."

Here, upon the banks of our historic river, which stretches two miles to the eastern shore, is heard the booming of the broad Atlantic as it sweeps in its might and majesty from Greenland to the Gulf. Along the shining beach, from Fisher to Fort Caswell, its foaming breakers run and roar, the racing steeds of Neptune, with their white crested manes, charging and reforming for the never ending fray.

The adjacent larger plantation of Kendal, originally owned by "King" Roger Moore, from whom it passed to others of his descendants, was later the property of James Smith, a brother of Governor Benjamin Smith's, and it was here, near the banks of Orton creek, which divides this estate from the splendid domain of Orton, with its 10,000 acres, that the quarrel between the Smith brothers ended by the departure of James to South Carolina, where he assumed his mother's name, Rhett, leaving his intolerant and choleric brother Benjamin to a succession of misfortunes, disappointments and distresses, which brought him at last to a pauper's grave. Aide de camp to Washington, a General of the State Militia, a Governor of the State, a benefactor of the University, a melancholy example of public ingratitude.

Behind Kendal is McKenzie's Mill Dam, the scene of a battle between the British troops and the minute men from Brunswick and from Wilmington.

We linger at Orton, the most attractive of all the old English estates on the Cape Fear. For a hundred and eighty-one years it has survived the vicissitudes of war, pestilence and famine, and until the recent death of its last proprietor has maintained its reputation of Colonial days for a refined and generous hospitality. Here in the exhilaration of the hunter, the restful seclusion of the angler, the quiet quest of the naturalist, the peaceful contemplation of the student, is found surcease from the vanities and vexations of urban life. For nearly two centuries it has been a haven of rest and recreation to its favoured guests. The house, or Hall, built by "King" Roger Moore in 1725, with its stately white pillars gleaming in the sunshine through the surrounding forest, is a most pleasing vista to the passing mariner. The river view stretches for ten miles southward and eastward, including "Big Sugar Loaf," Fort Anderson, Fort Buchanan and Fort Fisher.

We love its traditions and its memories, for no sorrow came to us there. The primeval forest with its dense undergrowth of dogwood blossoms which shine with the brightness of the falling snow; the thickets of Cherokee roses, which surpass the most beautiful of other regions; the brilliant carpet of wild azaleas, the golden splendour of the yellow jessamine, the modest drosera, the marvellous dionea mucipula, and the trumpet saracenias; the river drive to the white beach, from which are seen the distant breakers; the secluded spot in the wilderness commanding a wide view of an exquisite landscape where, safe from intrusion, we sat upon a sheltered seat beneath the giant pines and heard the faint "yo ho" of the sailor, outward bound; a place apart for holy contemplation when the day is far spent, where the overhanging branches cast the shadow of a cross and where later, through the interlacing foliage, the star of hope is shining; the joyful reception at the big house, the spacious hall with its ample hearth and blazing oak logs; around it, after the bountiful evening meal, the old songs were sung and the old tales were told, and fun and frolic kept dull care beyond the threshold.

Through the quiet lanes of Orton to the ruins of the Provincial Governor Tryon's palace, is half a mile. Here is the cradle of American independence, for upon this spot, now hidden by a dense undergrowth of timber, occurred, between six and seven o'clock on the evening of the 19th of February, 1766, the first open resistance to the British Stamp Act in the American colonies, by 150 armed men, who surrounded the palace and demanded the surrender of the custodians of the obnoxious symbols of the King's authority.

Ten minutes walk farther down brings us to the ruins of the Colonial Parish Church of St. Philip, the scene of many notable incidents and the resting place of the early pioneers. It was built by the citizens of Brunswick and principally by the landed gentry about the year 1740. In the year 1751, Mr. Lewis Henry deRosset, a member of Governor Gabriel Johnston's council, and subsequently an expatriated Royalist, introduced a bill appropriating to the Church of St. Philip at Brunswick and to St. James' Church at Wilmington, equally, a fund that was realized by the capture and destruction of a pirate vessel, which, in a squadron of Spanish buccaneers, had entered the river and plundered the plantations. A picture, "Ecce Homo," captured from this pirate, is still preserved in the vestry room of St. James' Church in Wilmington. The walls of St. Phillip's Church are nearly three feet thick, and are solid and almost intact still; the roof and floor have disappeared. It must have possessed much architectural beauty and massive grandeur with its high-pitched roof, its lofty doors and beautiful chancel windows.

A little to the west, surrounded by a forest of pines, lies Liberty Pond, a beautiful lake of clear spring water, once stained with the blood of friend and foe in a deadly conflict, hence its traditional name. It is now a most restful, tranquil spot—the profound stillness, the beach of snow-white sand, the unbroken surface of the lake, which reflects the foliage and the changing sky line.

Turning to the southeast, we leave the woodland and reach a bluff upon the river bank, still known as Howe's Point, where the Revolutionary patriot and soldier, General Robert Howe, was born and reared. His residence, long since a ruin, was a large frame building on a stone or brick foundation, still remembered as such by several aged citizens of Brunswick.

A short distance from the Howe place, the writer found some years ago, in the woods and upon a commanding site near the river, under many layers of pine straw, the clearly defined ruins of an ancient fort, which was undoubtedly of Colonial origin. Mr. Reynolds, who lives at his place nearby, says that his great-grandfather informed him forty years ago that this fort was erected long before the war of the Revolution by the Colonial Government for the protection of the colonists against buccaneers and pirates, and that he remembers having heard of an engagement in 1776 between the Americans who occupied this fort and the British troops who landed from their ships in the river, in which battle the British drove the Americans from the fort to McKenzie's Mill Dam.

Hence to the staid old county seat is a journey of an hour; it was originally known as Fort Johnston, a fortification named for the Colonial Governor, Gabriel Johnston. It was established about the year 1745 for the protection of the colony against pirates which infested the Cape Fear River. The name was subsequently changed to Smithville in honour of Benjamin Smith, to whom reference has been made, who had behaved with conspicuous gallantry under Moultrie when he drove the British from Port Royal; he was subsequently elected fifteen times to the Senate and became Governor of the Commonwealth in 1810. By recent authority of the State Legislature the name was again changed to Southport. In the old Court-house, which is its principal building, may be seen the evidence that on the death of Mr. Allen, 17th January, 1749, aged 57 years, at Lilliput, where he was buried, this plantation became the property (and it is said the residence for a brief period) of the great-grandson of Oliver Cromwell, Sir Thomas Frankland, Admiral of the White in the British navy, a position of great distinction, which he attained at the early age of 28 years, and of his wife, who was Sarah Rhett, the daughter of Colonel Rhett, of South Carolina, and a niece of Chief Justice Allen.

It appears also from the Colonial Records, in a letter from Rev. John McDowell, who served the twin parishes of St. Philip's at Brunswick and St. James' at Wilmington, addressed to the Secretary of the Honourable Society which supported him, in London, and written from Brunswick April 16, 1761, and also by subsequent letters with particular reference to the long delayed completion of the Parish Church of St. Philips, that Admiral Frankland and Lady Frankland contributed substantial sums of money for its support.

The records of these two interesting personages in the early history of our settlement are too obscure for a connected narrative. All of my endeavors to obtain sufficient material for a sketch of this Colonial Cape Fear Admiral, in Charleston, in Boston, in the National Library at Washington and in London, were in vain until I obtained an introduction to the present head of the house, the great-grandson of Admiral Frankland, Sir Ralph Payne Gallway, of Thirkleby Park, Thirsk, Yorkshire, one of the most beautiful county seats in England, who has been good enough to compile for me the following notes with reference to Sir Charles Frankland, the Colonial Collector of the port of Boston, and his romantic marriage with Agnes Surriage, and, to his successor, Sir Thomas Frankland, the youthful Admiral and rover of the seas, of whose life upon the Carolina station and in Charleston and on the Cape Fear River at Lilliput, there is unfortunately but fragmentary and unsatisfying evidence.

Sir Charles Frankland was born in 1716 in Bengal, India; he died at Bath in 1768. He was the eldest son of Henry Frankland, Governor of Bengal, who died in 1728, who was a brother of Sir Thomas Frankland, third Baronet of Thirk-leby, the latter being a descendant of Cromwell and also of Charles I. Sir Charles was on a visit to Lisbon during the great earthquake of 1755. He returned to Lisbon as Consul General of Portugal in 1757. In 1763 Sir Charles returned to Boston, where he resumed his duties as "Collector of the Customs of the Port," though he at the same time held his office as Consul General of Portugal till 1767, in which year he returned to Thirkleby and died the following one.

Sir Charles Frankland's romantic marriage with Agnes Surriage at Lisbon, where she rescued him from the ruins of the earthquake, has been the subject of several books and romances, even plays, as well as the beautiful ballad of "Agnes,' by Oliver Wendell Holmes." The history of Sir Charles and Agnes Surriage, or "Boston in Colonial Times," is to be found in a book by the Rev. Elias Mason. A more recent work on the same subject is called "Agnes Surriage." It is by Edwin Lasetter Bynner, 1886. Agnes Surriage was the daughter of a poor fisherman at Marblehead, near Boston. Sir Charles was buried for several hours in the remains of a church that was thrown down. Agnes Surriage searched for him until she heard the sound of his voice, and then, by large offers of money, and all the jewelry she wore at the time, she persuaded some terrified people near, who chanced to be uninjured, to excavate her lover. On his recovery from his wounds Sir Charles at once married his rescuer as a proof of gratitude. The person who was buried alive with Sir Charles at Lisbon, under the fallen stones of the church, in her madness and pain tore a piece out of his coat with her teeth. This coat, with the rent in it, was preserved at Thirkleby as a memento of an awful experience 'till it, at length, fell to pieces from age.

In 1751 Sir Charles built a good house and purchased a fair estate at Hopkinston, near Boston. This house was destroyed by fire January 23d, 1758, but on the same site a new house was ere long erected, which was built to resemble the old one. In 1747 Sir Charles succeeded his uncle, the third Baronet, but, owing to a disputed will, did not for some years inherit the estates at Thirkleby and elsewhere.

His uncle, whom he succeeded in the title, was M.P for Thirsk, 1711-1747, and a Lord of the Admirality; he died in 1747. He, Sir Thomas Frankland, third Baronet, made three wills. In the first, dated 1741, he left Thirkleby and his other estates to his nephew, afterwards Sir Charles. In 1744, he altered all this and left Thirkleby to his widow for her life. In his last and third will he left Thirkleby and all his estates to his widow absolutely. It was contended by Sir Charles, his successor, that the last will was made when Sir Thomas was of unsound mind, and under undue influence. A lawsuit was, therefore, entered on by Sir Charles to set aside Sir Thomas's last will, and in this he was successful, and hence gained Thirkleby and the other family estates.

Sir Charles died in 1768 at Bath, and in Weston Church, in the suburbs of Bath, there is a long inscription to him. He was twice in residence at Lisbon as Consul General of Portugal.

Lady Frankland (Agnes Surriage) returned to Hopkinton, near Boston, after her husband's death, near where she was born, and lived until Sir Charles took her away. She resided at Hopkinton 'till the declaration of war, and for a short time after. She witnessed from her house the battle of Bunker's Hill, a bullet breaking the glass of the window she was looking through.

Being a Loyalist, she returned to England, and paid a long visit to Thirkleby. She then moved, in 1782, to Chichester, where she married Mr. John Drew, a banker. She died the following year and is buried at Chichester; aged 57 years.

Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland succeeded, as fifth Baronet, his elder brother, Sir Charles, in the family estates and title. He was born in 1718, and died at Bath, 1784, aged 66. Member of Parliament for the Borough of Thirsk 1747-1784. Successively Admiral of the Red and then of the White in the King's navy. Buried at Thirkleby. Married Sarah, the daughter of Colonel William Rhett, of South Carolina, May, 1743; she died April, 1808, aged 84. Sir Thomas, the Admiral, was the great grandson of Oliver Cromwell and the great grandfather of the writer of these notes. The inscription to the Admiral in Thirkleby Church is as follows:

"Sir Thomas Frankland, second son of Henry Frankland, Governor of Fort William in Bengal. Admiral of the White, who represented the Borough of Thirsk in six Parliaments. He died at Bath on the 21st of November, 1784, aged 66. He married Sarah, daughter of William Rhett, Esq., of South Carolina, by whom he left seven sons and three daughters."

When in Boston, in 1742, Captain Thomas Frankland, as he then was, paid a visit to his elder brother, Sir Charles, whom he eventually succeeded in title and Thirkleby estates. Whilst at Charlestown he fell in love with Sarah Rhett, and on his subsequent visit there he married her. He was at that time Captain of H. M. Frigate Rose, though only 25 years of age. Some very effusively complimentary verses were printed in the Boston Evening Post on the occasion of Captain Frankland's visit to Boston in 1742. A few of these lines I quote, but the poem is too long to give in full here:

"From peaceful solitude and calm retreat
I now and then look out upon the great.
Praise where 'tis due I'll give, no servile tool
Of honorable knave, or reverend fool;
Surplice or red-coat, both alike to me,
Let him that wears them great and worthy be."

"We see thee Frankland dreadful o'er the main
Not terrible to children, but to Spain.
Then let me lisp thy name; thy praise rehearse
Though in weak numbers and in feeble verse.
Though faint the whisper when the thunder roars,
And speak thee great through all Hispanios shores!"

I have had a photograph purposely done of Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland's picture here to accompany these notes. I have also had one done at the same time of his ship preserved in model form in the hall here. Though this model is six feet long and most minutely made, and also, no doubt, most faithfully copied from the original vessel at great expense; yet we do not know her name. My brother, lately a Post Captain in the navy, did all he could to ascertain from the Admiralty, and from other sources her name, but without success. I should be very glad if the name could be discovered. On the sides of the model G. R. (George Rex) is painted in several parts. That the model is an exact copy of the original there can be do doubt, and it could not be built now at less than £300, at least so an expert in marine model building assures me. From the figure-head of the model she should be "Ajax," "Achilles," "Centurion," "Warrior," and the most likely of all, "Perseus," as on the shield borne by the figure on the prow is carved the head of "Medusa." None of the foregoing names belonged, as far as I can discover, to any ship which Admiral Frankland was connected with. Family tradition declares that the model is of the ship which Admiral Frankland was aboard when he captured a Spanish galleon. The galleon is said to have had so much treasure on board that from his share of the prize-money the Admiral settled five thousand pounds on each of his eight daughters, though only three of these survived him. However, I consider the very rich Spanish (so-called) ship that Frankland captured is the one described in the following extract from "A New Naval History, by John Entick, M.A., 1757":

"The Rose, man of war, 20 guns, commanded by Captain Frankland, being cruising on the Carolina station on January 12th, 1744, fell in with the Conception, a French ship with a Spanish register of 400 tons, 20 guns and 326 men, bound from Carthagena to Havana. After a smart engagement of eleven glasses, in which the Conception had 110 men killed, the Rose, with the loss of only 5 men, took the prize into Charleston, in South Carolina, where she proved a very valuable acquisition. Her cargo consisted of 800 serons of cocoa, in each of which was deposited a bar of gold, of the total value of 310,000 pieces of eight; wrought plate of equivalent value; a complete set of church plate; a large quantity of pearls, diamonds, and other precious stones, and gold buckles and snuff boxes; a curious silver chaise, the wheels, axles and other parts of it being all of silver. There was, besides, 600 pounds weight of gold, the whole of which was worth £200,000."

From this account it will be seen that the Rose, of only 20 guns, cannot be the three-decker, the model of which is now at Thirkleby. The model is of a man of war that has as many as 74 guns in three tiers, including deck guns, and she must have been a large line of battleship such as an Admiral might hoist his pennant on when in command of a fleet. Perhaps from the photograph of the figure-head of the model some information may be obtained regarding its name, which I have always been so anxious to obtain. There is no doubt that—

1. The model is a copy of a ship commanded by Captain (or Admiral) Frankland at one time of his naval career.

2. Or, that the model is a copy of a ship captured from the enemy by Captain (or Admiral) Frankland, and afterwards converted into a British man of war.

We know that the model has been here at Thirkleby for some 150 years.

You desire to know about Sir Thomas Frankland's residence at Lilliput Plantation on the Cape Fear River in North Carolina, and particularly in regard to his life in North Carolina, and his estates on the Cape Fear River.

It occurs to me that the Admiral was too busy chasing French and Spanish ships of the enemy to have retired to an estate in Carolina, and to have had a house on a plantation there, especially as he was so active and constant in his services in the King's Navy. The only suggestion I can find that the Admiral (at that time Captain) did retire from active service for a short time is hinted in the first two lines of the poem I have quoted, and which run—

> "From peaceful solitude and calm retreat,
> I now and then look out upon the great."

The old early Elizabethan Hall at Thirkleby was pulled down in 1793, when the present house was completed. The old house, of which we have a picture, was the home of Admiral Frankland. Many flowers of the old gardens still force their heads above the soil every summer. As a boy of about twelve years of age I very well recollect an old family game-keeper who lived at Thirkleby, who at that time of my life was just 90 years of age. His name was W. Hudson. He often pointed out to me the walnut tree in the park here, up which, when he was a boy of ten or twelve, the Admiral used to order him to climb to gather the walnuts; and which the Admiral used to throw his big crook-handled stick up among its boughs to try and knock the walnuts down himself. As Hudson was born in 1770 and the Admiral died in 1784, the reminiscences of the old keeper were no doubt correct, and enables me to say that I knew a man who knew Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland, who was born in 1718, and it is quite probable that the Admiral knew a man, who, as a child, saw Charles the First's head cut off at Whitehall.

On the subject of reminiscences, though rather out of place here, as it has nothing to do with the Frankland family, I may relate that an old friend of mine, now alive and well and but 72 years of age, perfectly recollects his grandfather, who lived to a great age. The grandfather in question took a purse of gold concealed in a basket of strawberries to Prince Charlie (the Young Pretender) when he was keeping court at Hobgood Palace in 1745. The messenger with the strawberries was, of course, a child at the time, and was, as such, selected, by partisans of the Stewarts, to allay suspicion as to the real object of his visit to Hobgood, which was to aid the Prince with money to establish his rights to his throne in Scotland. This incident, (with many others of a similar kind, I found here in the muniment room among the papers of my great uncle, Lord Lavington, who was Governor of some of the West Indies Islands and was buried there), I had printed and sent to the late Queen Victoria of blessed memory. Her Majesty was greatly interested in the book I compiled and sent her, the only thing she took exception to was my allusion to Prince Charlie as "A Pretender." The young pretender was tall and handsome, and the beau ideal of a gallant cavalier, but he died, alas, at Florence, as a dissipated and drunken wreck, morally and physically.

On the following page I have attached a photograph I have had specially taken to illustrate these notes.

(N. B.—The gentleman who for many years has conducted in the most able manner, at very moderate cost, in British Museum, a great deal of research for me, historical, documentary and otherwise, and who is also a most excellent copyist of old illustrations, is William Woodrow, Esq. The Reading Room, British Museum, Bloomsbury, London.)

THE BADGE OF ULSTER.

Given to Sir William Frankland, first Baronet of Thirkleby, by Charles II. in 1660 as a credential of his title. The only Ulster badge in existence, excepting one that is supposed to be a copy of it. It was worn as a proof of his rank and person by Sir Thomas Frankland, third Baronet, when on a mission abroad at the service of his King.

(Illustration is full size. The Red Hand, or Bloody Hand, is on white porcelain oval set round with stones. The date of confer and name of Baronet and his creation on reverse side.) The tradition is that the King of Ulster and another disputed the ownership of an estate. They agreed to race to it from a certain distance, and the one who first touched the land with his hand was to possess it. Ulster, finding himself a few yards behind at the finish, cut off his left hand and threw it in front of him over the boundary fence, and thus won the estate.

A characteristic letter from Admiral Frankland, in which he refers to the death of a gardener who has been inadvertently stifled in his master's hot-house.

"Bond Street (where the Admiral owned a house) 1760.
A. P. G.

"Mr. Nugent, they say, spoke an hour against opening the distillery, and when they divided, voted for it, so the joke goes that he acted in the character of his country. Surely money never was so scarce, we can hardly get enough to carry on common house expenses. We shall have no peace this year its believed, and I think another year makes us stop payment, as our enemies have done, and what must we do who have our all in the stocks.

"Have you read Tristam Shandy? The ladies say (my wife and daughters read it not) its very clever; now pray is it indelicate or not fit? Upon my word I am abused and called a Prude for saying its scandalous for a Clergyman to write such (I was going to say Bawdy), a rapsody of hard words.

"I hear you are in low spirits about the death of your gardener. Good God, what wretches we sailors must be. I order 40 men aloft and ye mast goes and they are drowned. Their deaths are not at my door. I order the ship to be smoked to prevent sickness, and some fools stay below in the smoke and dye; Sir, am I to charge myself with their deaths?

"We have expeditions fitting out now, where bound a secret.

(Signed) THOS. FRANKLAND.

(1) There is a long article on Admiral Frankland, his life and adventures, to be found in Charnock's Biographic Vavalis, Vol. V—1797—page 19.

(2) Also see Schomberg's Naval Chronology, Vol. I, page 220—1745. In this latter book the following curious incident is related:

"Another fortunate circumstance was the discovery caused thro' a little French boy that Capt. Frankland had taken into his service. This boy made a complaint against one of the sailors for having taken from him a stick in appearance of no value. Captain Frankland recovered it for the boy, and on returning it to him gave him a playful tap on the shoulder. The head of the stick fell off then and diamonds were found inside it worth 20,000 pistoles. When the enemy surrendered, the Captain gave the stick to the boy in the hopes of saving it, not imagining that such a trifle would ever be noticed."

In Charnocks Chronicles a graphic account is given of Captain Frankland's fight with (1742) three of the enemies ships, all of which he captured and took into Carolina. One of these ships tried very hard to escape, the reason being that its captain was the notorious "Fandino," who some years before had cut off the ears of Jenkins, an English Captain. Frankland sent this man at once to Hyland to be tried for his life.

I see Captain Frankland married Miss Rhett (1743), daughter of Chief Justice of Carolina, by whom he had six sons and eight daughters. (He had nineteen children in all; several died infants.)

June, 1756, made Rear Admiral of the Blue; retained the command of the Rose 'till October, 1746, when he was promoted to the Dragon. In 1755 appointed Commodore on the Antigua Station and hoisted his broad pennant on board the Winchester, 50 guns, at Spithead, 10th August, and sailed very soon after for the West Indies. On his arrival there he at once quarrelled with the retiring Commodore, Pye, because this sailor had condemned his ship, the Advice. Admiral Frankland reported Commodore Pye for doing so, and to prove he was wrong, actually fitted up the Advice for himself and started on a cruise in her to show she was seaworthy, with the result that Admiral Frankland and ship nearly went to the bottom of the sea together. This quarrel and Admiral Frankland's career is to be found in a story that appeared in the London Magazine of 1774-1775, under the title of "Edward & Maria," by Capt. Ed. Thompson, R. N. In this story Admiral Freeland is "Frankland," and Commodore Pye is "Sir Richard Spry," as he afterwards became.

BRITISH MUSEUM, Add. MS. 32, 935, p. 447.

SIR:—The Barons of the Exchequer, having ordered me immediately to Lay before the Hon'ble and Rev'd. Mr. Cholmondeley, Auditor General of his Maj'ts Revenues in America, the Amount of the French Ships and Cargoes detained by me at the Leeward Islands before the Declaration of War.

The Charge attending the Dieting the Crews of those being refused to be allowed me in those Accounts, and as it cannot be imagined that I can bear those Expenses, Lett me entreat your assistance to get a Dispensing Order to the Sick and Hurt Office that the Account there may be paid me. As they require Vouchers By their Establishment which the Nature of Those Captures could not produce.

The Governors of the Three Islands absolutely refused to give any Receipts for the French men Landed, or written Orders for their Discharges.

Their Constant Answers were they never had received the least Orders about their Detention.

No Cartel was settled or Commissarys appointed. Therefore how could I produce Vouchers from the Latter.

The account for the subsistance of those men, which I have now Laying before the Sick and Hurt Office is such, as I am ready to make any affirmation to. It has passed thro the Navy Office, in regard to the names, and Entrys and Discharges of the Particular Crews.

The Men sent into Hallifax and Jamacia have been paid By the Publick. But as where I commanded there was neither Hospital of the Kings to send them to, or Contract subsisting for me to have ordered them Agents to have victualled them or had I ships sufficient to have keep them on board and victualled them afloat, I had no other method to follow.

As this is the only obstacle that hinders my finally closing these Accounts let me again beg your aid, and I am, sir,

Your most obedient and very humble servant,

Old Bond Street THOS. FRANKLAND.

18th March, 1762.

(Endorsed) AD'L. FRANKLAND.

PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE—FRANKLAND LETTERS.

(Adm. Sec. M. Letters.)

There are two series letters—one covering the period when stationed at the Bahamas as Captain of the Rose (about 40).

Another series when stationed at the Leeward Islands as Admiral, (about 80 to 100) (1755-'59), Pye incident. These letters are of varying interest and would suggest a selection of which specimen given re-taking the Conception.

(Ad. Sec. M. Letters, No. 1782.)

Captain Thomas Frankland to Secretary of the Admiralty:

His Majesty's Ship "Rose," Cooper River,
South Carolina, Jan. ye 23rd, 1744-5.

My last was dated Nov. 14th acquainting you of my delivering the letters as I was directed by Sir Chaloner Ogle. I proceeded afterwards off St. Jago de Cuba, and so between the south side of Cuba and the N. side of Jamaica down to the Grand Comanon, where I watered, wooded and heel'd, for I was hurryed out of Jamaica without time to get or do either there. I then intended to go and cruize between the Rogues Cape Florida and the Pan of Matanzas (on the N. side of Cuba), but on my way on (about 35 leagues to the w'ward of the Havanna) the first day of December just before daylight I found myself almost on board a large ship. We were to windward and astern withall; I kept my wind until the day broke, then finding she had but one tier of guns but full of men by her working, for before I showed my colors, she run her courses up, bunted her mainsails, and I observed everything ready to engage and her decks crowded with people. About seven in the morning we began our engagement, which lasted until half after noon; we had a fresh gale and a great sea, and yet we were alongside of one another three or four times, for he would, as I observed, fought till night at a distance; he at last struck, for he had near a hundred men killed outright and four of his guns on one side disabled. The ship is called the Conception of St. Malo, Mons. Adrien Mercan, Master from Cartagena bound to Cadiz, but was to touch at the Havannah in order to land upwards of two hundred seamen besides officers that belonged to Don Blase de Leso's squadron that were destroyed at Cartagena; they were commanded by Sig'r. Don Pedro Lisagrale, a Captain of a Frigate and Major of the Galleys. We killed an officer, which will be a great loss to the Spaniards, being the best pilot they had for the West Indies; he was made a Captain de Fregattes by Admiral Tovas' request for the services he did him that way; his name is Don Pedro Manuell Long.

I had only five men killed, about ten or a dozen dangerously wounded, including the master, and several slightly. The cargo was hides and cocoa, with several chests of gold and silver, containing about three hundred and ten pieces of eight. She had several passengers on board, from which we got about five thousand ounces of gold in doublins, pistoles, bars, etc. When (we) gott all the prisoners on board the Rose and had manned the prize with my best people, for she was torn all to pieces, and began to count our numbers, I was very ..... (some words are covered in binding), but one hundred seventy and seven men, officers and boys at first, the prize manned 20 so wounded could ..... no duty and people to attend them that we had two Spaniards to one of us and in sight of their own shore running down by the Havanna and Matanzas and certain three or four of their men of war at sea, a prize astern without a ..... mast and all her other masts wounded, as was my main mast and fore yard that I immediately resolved within myself by all means to land them. Fortune favored us with moderate weather and a wind to fetch Key Sall (it ly..... E. N E 15 leagues from the Bay of Matanzas were ..... and put all the Spaniards ashore, giving them the prize's shallop and my cutter, in either of which, taking fair weather, they may go to the Havanna in 20 hours; with provisions, tents and all other conveniences of life. We stayed at that key till we put the prize to rights and so proceeded down the gulf to South Carolina; I arrived the 17th day of December. I am a getting a new mast and repairing, for I received some damage from the enemy, and shall put for the sea with all speed to proceed to the Bahamas tho' I am in great hopes the Alborough is coming out to relieve me, for I have represented to their Lordships the necessity these twelve months past.

I am sorry to acquaint you that the Swallow sloop was lost on the above keys. Captain Jelfe writes by this opportunity and has sent his Lieut. home, who I suppose will wait directly on their Lordships.

I am, sirs, your most humble servant,

(Signed) Thos. Frankland.

Rec'd. and read 20 Mar.

To Thos. Corbett, Esq.

Dr. John Campbell in "The Present State of Europe," 1761, thus tabulates the relative naval strength of the Powers:

"If the shipping of Europe be divided into twenty parts, then—

Great Britain, etc., hath	6
The United Provinces	6
The subjects of the Northern Crowns	2
The trading cities and seaports of Germany and Austrian Netherlands	1
France	2
Spain and Portugal	2
Italy and rest of Europe	1

LIST OF PLANS, MAPS, ETC., IN BRITISH MUSEUM.

K. 122 (62)	Wilmington. A drawn plan of the town of Wilmington, in New Hanover County, North Carolina, surveyed and drawn in December, 1769, by C. I. Sauther.
2 Tab. 122-51	A complete map of North Carolina, from an actual survey by Captain Collet, 1770. Two sheets.
71965 (1)	Carolina. A general map of C. describing its sea coast and rivers. Printed for R. Blome Loud 1672. This map belongs to Blome's "Description of the Island of Jamaica" Loud 1672.
71965 (6)	A new map of C. by P. Lea Loud 1700.
S. 100 (18)	A new map of C. by J. Thornton & W. Fisher (a large draught of Ashley and Cooper's rivers) Loud 1704.
71965 (2)	A map of North and South Carolina by J. Lawson Loud 1704. This map belongs to Lawson's "New voyage to Carolina" Loud 1709.
71965 (7)	A map of the province of C. divided into its parishes, etc., by H. Wall Loud 1710.
71965 (3)	A new map of the country of C. by J. Gascoigne, Loud 1710.
C. 13 A. 10 (3)	Carolina. Several maps—Carolina described in "A Brief Description of the Province of C." Loud 1666.

NAVAL & MILITARY MEMOIRS OF GRT. BRITAIN FROM 1727 TO 1783, BY ROBERT BEATSON, ESQ., L.L.D. VOL. 1, P. 281-283. LOUD 1804.

The Rose, Captain Frankland, took, after a long and obstinate engagement, the La Conception, of four hundred tons, twenty guns, and three hundred and twenty-six men, from Cartagena for the Havanna. The Rose had only one hundred and seventy-five men on board when the action began. The enemy had one hundred and sixteen men killed, and thirteen wounded. The prize was carried into Charleston, South Carolina, and proved of great value, having on board 800 serons of cocoa, sixty-eight chests of silver, gold and silver coin, and plate to a great amount, a curious two-wheeled chaise, the wheels and axletree all of silver; some diamonds, pearls, and precious stones. On board the prize was the Viceroy's Secretary, and other persons of distinction. To form a proper idea of the immense value of the prize, we shall quote the words of a very respectable author, viz., Peter Henry Bruce, Esq., who was at Charleston when the Conception arrived:

"Captain Thomas Frankland brought in here a very rich French prize, whose principal lading consisted in pistoles, a few chests of dollars, and a great deal of wrought gold and silver. The quantity was so great that the shares were delivered by weight, to save the trouble of counting it, so that the pistoles were now seen in greater plenty than the dollars had been in Providence; which could not be very mortifying to Governor Tinker, who was thereby deprived of the profits accruing from her condemnation, considering Captain Frankland was stationed there. But he met with this mortification in general, as no privateer would we enter with their prizes into the harbor of Providence, after the treatment that Gibball and Dowall had met with. After all, when the cargo was taken out of this prize, and the vessel was to be put up for sale, the French Captain told Captain Frankland, that if he would engage to reward him handsomely, he would discover a hidden treasure to him, which no one ever knew of but himself. Captain Frankland engaged to reward him very generously, and he did discover thirty thousand pistoles in a place where no one would have thought of finding them.

The French Captain afterwards told Governor Glenn, that Captain Frankland's generosity consisted only in one thousand pistoles, a poor reward, he said, for so great a discovery. Captain Frankland made another very accidental discovery; he had taken into his service a brisk little French boy, who had belonged to the French Captain, who, having a walking stick of no value, one of the sailors had taken it from him. The boy lamented this loss so much that Captain Frankland ordered search to be made for it, to return it to the boy. The stick was brought to the Captain, who, seeing it was of no value, asked the boy how he could make so much ado about such a trifle. The boy replied briskly, he could not walk like a gentleman and show his airs, without a stick in his hand. Upon the Captain's going to return him the stick, he gave him a tap on the shoulder with it, and finding something rattling inside of it, withdrew to a room by himself, and taking off the head of it, he found jewels (according to the French Captain's report) worth 20,000 pistoles. The Captain had given the stick to the boy when he surrendered, in hopes of saving it, imagining no person would take notice of such a trifle in the hands of a boy."

MEMOIRS OF THE PROLECTOVAL—HOUSE OF CROMWELL, BY MARK NOBLE, F. A. S. OF L. & E., VOL. 2, PP. 434-5, BIRMINGHAM, 1787.

Sir Thomas Frankland, the late Baronet, was born in July, 1718, and brought up to the Naval Department. He became a Captain in July, 1740, and in December, 1744, he was so fortunate as to take a French ship of great value, off the Havannah, with a Spanish register, homeward bound, after an engagement of several hours. Upon the death of his brother he succeeded to the title of Baronet. He rose afterwards to be Vice-Admiral of the Red Squadron of his Majesty's fleet, and, as such, was one of the supporters of the canopy at his royal highness the Duke of York's funeral; and was afterwards an Admiral of the White. He represented the borough of Thirsk in five successive parliaments. His lady was Miss Sarah Rhett, granddaughter of the Chief-Justice of South Carolina, in North America, whom he married in that province, in May, 1743. Sir Thomas died at Bath Nov. 21, 1784; he had five sons and eight daughters—

(1) Henry Frankland, who died an infant.

(2) Sir Thomas Frankland, the present baronet, of whom below.

(3) Hugh Frankland, who died an infant.

(4) Will Frankland, fellow of All-Souls, in Oxford, and a member of the Society of Gray's Inn.

(5) Roger Frankland, B.A., a student at Christchurch College, Oxford, and designed for the church.

(6) Mary, married to Sir Boyle Roche, bart.; there is no issue of this marriage.

(7) Sarah, died young.

(8) Harriet, unmarried.

(9) Ann, married March 24, 1778, to John Lewis, of Harpton Court, in Radnorshire, by whom she has Thomas Frankland Lewis, born May 14, 1779, and Louisa, born July 8, 1783.

(10) Dinah, married to Will Bowles, of Heale, Wilts, Esq., by whom she had one son, William, and three daughters Ann, Lucy, and Charlotte.

(11) Catherine, married to Thomas Whingates, Esq., an officer in India; their issue is two sons, Thomas and Manners, and also several daughters.

(12) Charlotte, married to Rob. Nichols, of Ashton-Kearns, Wilts, Esq. They have two sons and one daughter, Edw. Rob. and Charlotte.

(13) Grace, who is unmarried.

Sir Thomas Frankland, the present and sixth Baronet, was born in September, 1750, and was educated at Eaton, and Merton College in Oxford; he married Dorothy, the daughter of Sir Will Smelt, and niece of Leonard Smelt, Esq., Sub-Governor to George, Prince of Wales; their issue is four children, Henry, Rob., Amelia and Marian.

The history of the family of Frankland is taken from the baronetages, various other writers, and corrected and enlarged by information which I had the honor to receive from the late Lord Grantham, the late Sir Thomas Frankland, Bart., and the present baronet of that name, the Rev. De-Greenhill, the Rev. Sam Pegge, and Sam Pegge, Esq. It may be necessary to correct a passage in the history of the life of the first Sir Thomas Frankland in the Baronetages: They say that the Earl of Fauconberg was descended from Mary, daughter of the Protector, Oliver; but his Lordship married that lady instead of being descended from her, as is sufficiently proved in these Memoirs.

BIOGRAPHIA NAVALIS, BY JOHN CHARNOCK, VOL. 5, PP. 18-21, LOUD, 1797.

Frankland, Sir Thomas, was a nephew of a baronet of the same name, who was for many years one of the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral. He was on the 15th of July, 1740, promoted to the command of the Rose frigate; and at the conclusion of the year was ordered out to the Bahama Islands, to convey thither Mr. Tinker, who had been appointed Governor two years before. After he had landed his passenger he continued on the same station, being instructed to remain there and cruise for the protection of those islands and the adjacent coast from the depredations of the guarda-costas. In the month of June, 1742, he distinguished himself by his activity in capturing a Spanish vessel of that description, together with three vessels which she herself had made prizes of a short time before.

The guarda-costa, which carried ten carriage and as many swivel guns, supported by two of the prizes, which were armed vessels, engaged the Rose for nearly three hours, but finding her too powerful and too well conducted to afford them any hope of ultimate success, the two prizes stood away, one keeping to windward, the other large, with all the sail they could crowd. The guarda-costa maintained a running fight for an hour longer through the desperation of her captain, and even at last, the crew, in opposition to him, hauled down the colors and called for quarter.

Captain Frankland shifted the prisoners with all possible expedition, and having put some of his own men, under proper officers, on board the prize, dispatched her after the vessel which had hauled her wind, he himself following the other two. So successful was his activity on this occasion that the three vessels were all, without difficulty, captured and carried safely into Carolina. The cause of the obstinate defence made by the Spanish vessel was, on enquiry, discovered to be owing to her Captain being Fandino, the fellow who some years before had cut off the ears of Captain Jenkins, and thereby caused so great, so just and general an indignation through the whole British nation. Captain Frankland, judging a monster of so cruel a description, who had manifested a conduct that would have disgraced a pirate, might be released as a prisoner on parole, or even exchanged, sent him home to be treated as administration should think proper.

Captain Frankland continued in the same command, and remained on the same station some years, but is not again particularly mentioned until the year 1744, when he signalized himself remarkably in an action with a very large, and, as it afterwards proved, valuable Spanish ship, the particulars we shall insert at length from the account officially given of this very spirited encounter.

Being on his passage to his station as a cruiser between the Boques, Cape Florida, and the Pan of Matanzas, on the North side of Cuba, about thirty-five leagues to the Westward of Havannah, on December 21st, just before daylight he found himself almost on board a large ship, of which he was to windward and astern withall. Captain Frankland, who had kept his wind until day-light, then found his antagonist had but one tier of guns, but was by her working, full of men, for before the Captain showed his colors she had run her courses up, bunted her mainsail, and had everything ready to engage, her decks being crowded with people. About seven in the morning they began an engagement which lasted until half an hour past twelve. There was a fresh gale and a great sea, notwithstanding which, they were alongside each other three or four times before the enemy struck. She had near 100 men killed outright, and four of her guns on one side disabled. She is called the Conception, of St. Malo, Adrian Mercan, Master, bound from Cartagena to Cadiz, but was to touch at Havana to land upwards of 200 seamen, besides officers. The Rose had only five men killed and about ten or twelve dangerously wounded, including the master and several slightly. The cargo of the prize consisted of hides and cocoa, with seventy chests of gold and silver, containing about three hundred and ten thousand pieces of eight. She had several passengers on board, from whom they got about 5,000 ounces of gold in dollars, pistoles, bars, etc. The crew of the Rose of no more than one hundred and seventy-seven men, officers and boys included. The prize was safely carried into South Carolina.

Captain Frankland retained the command of the Rose till the month of October, 1746, and was then promoted to the Dragon, of sixty guns, in which ship he continued until the conclusion of the war, being, in 1748, on the West India Station with Mr. Pocock. We do not find any subsequent mention made of him till the month of July, 1755, when he was appointed Commodore on the Antigua Station. He hoisted his broad pennant on board the Winchester, of fifty guns, at Spithead, on the 10th day of August, and sailed very soon afterwards for the West Indies. On his arrival there his first operation was to quarrel with Commodore Pye, whom he was sent out to succeed. The first pretence was frivolous in the extreme, consisting merely in an exception, or affront Mr. Frankland thought proper to take, because the former had not struck his broad pennant on the instant he was informed of the latter's arrival.

A second, and, as it proved afterwards, equally futile, and indeed unjust cause, was a more serious charge of misconduct against his predecessor, in having condemned the Advice, his own ship. Mr. Frankland asserted this measure to have been improper and made a regular representation against it to the Board of Admiralty. In further proof of the propriety of his opinon, as if he supposed his own hardiness sufficient to establish it, he ordered the Advice to be fitted for himself, and absolutely went so far as to make a short cruise in her. The final event, however, did not reflect any great honor on Mr. Frankland's judgment; the ship on its return to England, proved so very defective and unfit to keep the sea, that it was with the utmost difficulty the crew could, by frapping her around with hausers and every other precaution, prevent her from almost literally falling to pieces during her passage.

Mr. Frankland, after his return to England, appears no more in the character of a Naval Commodore. In the month of June, 1756, he was advanced to be rear-admiral of the Blue, as he was progressively afterwards, through the different gradations and ranks of flag-officers, till he at last arrived at that of Admiral of the White, the highest in the service, the Admiral of the fleet, or senior admiral on the list excepted. On the death of his brother, Sir Charles Frankland, at Bath, in the year 1768, he succeeded to the title, and continued during his life totally abstracted from all public business, further than his occasional attendance in the House of Commons, as representative for the borough of Thirsk, in Yorkshire, for which place he had been member ever since the year 1749. Sir Thomas died at Bath on the 21st November, 1784.

INTRODUCTION TO BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND OTHER CO-INCIDENT MATTERS.

It is the object of the publishers of the North Carolina Booklet to enter on its pages short sketches of the lives and times of those men and women of the State who have contributed to its columns, from its inception to the present. To the memory of those writers who have passed from earthly existence and to those who are living, the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution owe a debt of gratitude. And in no way can they better show their appreciation than by recording their names among those other historians of the State who have helped to preserve its history, for in these individual records may be found available material, bearing on important periods, which may aid the future historian.

MAJOR GRAHAM DAVES, A.B.

BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

Major Graham Daves was the first to contribute an article for the North Carolina Booklet, which first number appeared in May, 1901.

He chose for his subject "Virginia Dare," she being the first English child born in America—a fitting subject for a magazine issued under the auspices of the North Carolina Society "Daughters of the Revolution," edited by women, and the proceeds to memoralize the heroism of women. It is also a noteworthy fact that the first expeditions for discovery and exploration were sent out under the orders of the Virgin Queen, that the new-found country was called Virginia in her honor, and that these first colonists having landed upon the Island of Roanoke were first greeted by the wife of Granganimeo, the Indian king, with all hospitality, and "entertaining them with all love and kindness." All of this no one can gainsay that women helped to form the preface to our history, and to which facts Major Daves has made special mention.

Graham Daves was born in New Bern, N. C., July 16, 1836. He was the third son of John Pugh Daves and Elizabeth Batchelor Graham, his wife, and grandson of Captain John Daves, who served in the Third Regiment of the North Carolina Continental Infantry. His father died when he was about two years old. He attended school at the New Bern Academy; and at the age of fifteen he was placed as a cadet of the Maryland Military Academy, where he remained for two years. In 1853 he entered Trinity College, Hartford, Conn., from which he graduated in July, 1857.

After his graduation he read law with Judge Richmond M. Pearson, afterwards Chief Justice of North Carolina.

On January 1, 1859, was appointed Private Secretary to Hon. John W. Ellis, Governor of North Carolina, his brother-in-law. He held this position until the outbreak of the War between the States. He joined the Confederate army, serving faithfully as Lieutenant, Adjutant, Assistant Adjutant-General, Captain, Major, and Aide-de-Camp, filling all of these positions with honor to himself and fidelity to his country. The field of his activity extended from Virginia to Mississippi during the whole war. He was paroled April 26, 1865, at Greensboro, N. C.

Returning to his home in New Bern, N. C., he was occupied at different times in mercantile and other active pursuits. Major Daves married on November 27, 1862, Alice Lord DeRosset, of Wilmington, N. C., daughter of Dr. Armand DeRosset—Mrs. Daves died on September 2, 1897; their only child, a boy, died in infancy.

Major Graham Daves retired from active business in 1891 and devoted himself to the study of North Carolina history, bringing into exercise those talents with which he was so richly endowed. He worked diligently to reorganize the dormant North Carolina branch of the Society of the Cincinnati, and on April 4, 1896, he realized the consummation of his hopes; in grateful recognition of this service he was elected honorary member of the order, and remained its faithful devotee to the day of his death. He was also a member of the North Carolina Society of Sons of the Revolution, and Association of United Confederate Veterans. To other patriotic organizations he was equally devoted. As President of the "Roanoke Colony Memorial Association" no one could have accomplished more than he. This Association was instituted to commemorate the first English settlement in America—and to this day the outlines of Fort Raleigh are distinctly visible and the angles are now permanently marked by granite pillars.

On the site of the old fort stands a monument erected by this Association, the base of which is North Carolina granite and the tablet of Virginia granite. The tablet bears the following inscription: "On this site, in August, 1585, the colonists sent from England by Sir Walter Raleigh built the fort called the New Fort in Virginia."

The monument was dedicated with appropriate religious exercises on 28th of November, 1901, and an address was delivered by Major Daves, embodying the following facts: that these colonists were the first settlers of the English race in America; they returned to England in 1586 with Sir Francis Drake; here was born on the 18th of August, 1587, Virgia Dare, the first child of English parents born in America, the daughter of Ananias Dare and Eleanor White, his wife, members of another body of colonists sent out by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1587. Two days after her birth she was baptized. Manteo, a friendly chief of the Hatteras Indians, had been baptized a few days before. These baptisms were the first celebrations of the Christian sacrament in the territory of the thirteen original United States.

Major Daves was a recognized type of the Southern gentleman of the old regime, and those who knew him can never forget his patrician military bearing and courtly manners.

He contributed many articles of historical value to the columns of various periodicals. He died in Asheville (where he had gone seeking restored health) on October 27, 1902. Mourned by a large circle of admiring friends, well deserving of honor is the memory of this pure-minded scholar and writer, whose name will go down to posterity as a master spirit in the revival of interest in the history of his native State.

(The above facts are chiefly condensed from a sketch of Major Daves in the Minutes of the North Carolina Society of the Cincinnati for 1903.)

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, Records of different States and Counties, family papers, State histories and biographies will be diligently examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced.

Fee for Such Researches, $5.20 for each Line Traced.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE WILLS.
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R. and Raleigh Circle Colonial Dames.)
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

Coats of Arms Painted at Reasonable Rates

Burnt on Wood, $3.00. Painted, $3.00.
India Ink Drawing, $3.00.

For Coats of Arms, etc., address,

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kenneday.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses." Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of B'oomsburg."
"Historic Homes," Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays, Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"Historic Homes. The Groves, Cape Fear, Wakefield," Burgwyn, Waddell. Haywood.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service." Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro, Mr. Francis Nash
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs. L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania." Judge Walter Clark
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina." Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780" Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788." Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence," John Penn and Joseph Hewes, by T. M Pittman, of Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena. 1740." Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians." Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585." Prof. Collier Cobb.
"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.
"The Scotch-Irish Settlement."
"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. 1, single copies 25c.; Vols. 2, 3, 4, single copies 15c.

EDITORS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET
RALEIGH, N. C.

JOHN C. DREWRY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

Mechanics and Investors Union

A Home Investment Company for Monthly Savings
A Home Loan Company, to Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money. It promotes economy, thrift and punctuality in business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 will mature a $100 Certificate. One hundred payments will secure a home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, Secretary, 22 Pullen Building.

Allen's Forty Lessons in Bookkeeping. Over 7,000 copies have been used in schools and colleges. Commended by teachers and business men. Price $1,00. GEORGE ALLEN, Manager.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery

Aside from a large line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc., we will take care of your orders for RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS.

All orders given our personal attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.
RALEIGH, N. C.

ESTABLISHED IN 1891

The Commercial and Farmers Bank

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, . .	$100,000.00
Surplus, . . .	60,000.00
Deposits, . . .	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian.

Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent.

Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.
A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSON, Asst. Cashie

THE

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City
It reaches the whole State
Largest circulation in North Carolina
The State's Representative Newspaper

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
Editor

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1900,	5,700 subscribers
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1901,	6,500 subscribers
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1902,	7,054 subscribers
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1903,	8,201 subscribers
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1904,	9,111 subscribers
1899,	5,200 subscribers	905,	10,000 subscribers

North Carolina Historical Commission

ESTABLISHED B LAWS OF 1903

MEMBERS

W. J. PEELE, Chairman,	Raleigh, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNER, Secretary,	Raleigh, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES,	Raleigh, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER,	Chapel Hill, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT,	Roper, N. C.

THE Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured, arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners. The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in their efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State.

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary.

WEATHERS & PERRY

Interior Decorators

WALL PAPER, WINDOW SHADES, CURTAIN POLLS, PICTURE FRAMES, PICTURES, ARTISTS' MATERIAL AND ART NOVELTIES, BRIC-A-BRAC, WASH SILKS, BRAIDS, WOOLS AND ZEPHYRS.

117 Fayetteville Street RALEIGH, N. C.

SOUTHERN BOOK EXCHANGE

RALEIGH, N. C.

LARGEST STOCK, BEST SELECTED, LOWEST PRICES OF ANY BOOK STORE IN THE SOUTH.

Headquarters for North Carolina History and all classes of North Carolina Publications, including North Carolina Laws, Journals, Reports, of the Supreme Court and of all other State Departments; also Briefs, Documents, Records, and Catalogues of all Colleges since their foundations; Relics, Autographs, Letters, Plates, Coat of Arms, Stamps, Confederate Money, Coin etc. 'Found no where else.' ¶ History of other States, Americana and all kinds of Rare Books out of print and valuable. All enquiries answered promptly. All orders given personal, careful attention, guaranteeing satisfaction, before remittance. ¶ Libraries handled on commission and best prices guaranteed. All kinds of books bought, sold and exchanged; best bargains ever offered Missing Nos. in files of all North Carolina Magaziues and newspapers supplied at publishers prices; all other Magazines at a very low rate.

ANTICEPHALALGINE

The Wonderful Headache and Neuralgia Remedy

25c. and 50c. a Bottle At All Drug Stores

Draughon's

Raleigh, N. C.
Columbia, S. C.
Knoxville, Tenn.
Nashville, Tenn.
Ft. Worth, Tex.

PRACTICAL BUSINESS Colleges

CATALOGUE
FREE

Address
J. F. DRAUGHON
PRESIDENT

Position $50 per month guaranteed or money refunded, or you may pay tuition out of salary after graduating. No vacation. Enter at any time. In thoroughness and reputation D. P. C.'s are to other business colleges what Harvard University is to academies. 7,000 students annually. Indorsed by business men from Maine to California. Cheap board.

HOME STUDY

Contract given to refund money, if, after taking our Home Study by mail, you are not satisfied.
Write for prices.

THE YARBOROUGH HOUSE

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA

New and Modern Appeals to the Appreciative

HOWELL COBB

FACTS WORTH KNOWING

BOYLAN-PEARCE CO.

208 Fayetteville St., Raleigh, N. C.

LARGEST RETAIL DRY GOODS MERCHANTS IN THE STATE

Agents for Ladies' Home Journal Paper Patterns.
Members of Raleigh's Retail Merchants Association.
A Full Equipped Mail Order Department.
Dispensers of Southern Trading Stamps.
Dry Goods, Carpets, Millinery.
Ladies' ready-to-wear Suits, Waists, Skirts and Jackets.
Spring and Summer Stock for 1906 now ready.
Your patronage solicited.

WRITE FOR SAMPLES

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30,000

A personal investigation will convince anyone that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

The Citizens National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

CORRESPONDENCE AND PERSONAL CALLS INVITED

Any Business Entrusted to our Care Will Receive Prompt and Courteous Attention

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier.

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
EDITOR N. C. BOOKLET,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

FOR

North Carolina Schools

White's Beginner's History of the United States

By Henry Alexander White, of Columbia, S. C.

In this interesting narrative, which is written on the biographical plan, special attention is paid to the acts of heroism and devotion of the men of the South.

Lee Readers

The best literature and the best thought of the South, prepared by an experienced Southern teacher.

The Rose Primer

Contains a small vocabulary, with carefully selected and graded matter and frequent reviews.

Spencer's Practical Writing

Teaches a plain practical hand' moderate in slant, and free from ornamental curves, shade, and meaningless lines.

Steps in English

Meet modern conditions in every respect, and teach the child how to express his thoughts in speaking and writing.

Milne's Arithmetics

Give the pupil an unusually thorough and practical knowledge of arithmetic and a readiness in applying this knowledge.

Natural Geographies

The most widely used series extant. This subject is developed naturally and logically, with Man and his environment as the main theme.

Bruce's United States History

Written by a Southern author for Southern schools; interesting, attractive, and profusely illustrated.

New Century Physiologies

Represents the latest scientific research and study, with the best methods of instruction in right living.

Peterman's Civil Government

Gives a good knowledge of political institutions, commencing with the family government. Special edition for North Carolina.

Webster's Dictionaries

The standard authority followed in all leading school books. Thoroughly revised and up-to date.

Progressive Speller

Based on the lines which govern the growth of a child's intelligence and the acquisition of his vocabulary.

American Book Company

New York Cincinnati Chicago

Makers of American History

BY

J. A. C. CHANDLER, PH.D.
AND
O. P. CHITWOOD, PH.D.

Our Past is full of glories;
It is a shut-in sea;
The pillars overlooking it
Are Washington and Lee.—James Barron Hope.

SILVER, BURDETT & CO.,

NEW YORK BOSTON CHICAGO PHILADELPHIA
LONDON ATLANTA DALLAS SAN FRANCISCO

Miss Dixie Washington Leach

MINIATURES ON IVORY OR PORCELAIN

Access to State Library where copies can be made on Miniature from old portraits.

STUDIO 405 TRUST BUILDING
RALEIGH, North Carolina

B. F. Johnson Publishing Comp'y

EDUCATIONAL
PUBLICATIONS

ATLANTA RICHMOND DALLAS

Modern Books for Modern Schools.

RAND, McNALLY & CO.

New York. Chicago, London

"The Standard Map Makers of the World"

Send for Catalogue of our Educational Publications

THOS. H. BRIGGS & SONS

Raleigh, N. C.

HARDWARE

Buck's Stoves and Ranges

JAP-A-LAC

FLOOR-LAC

S. W. P. the great Paint

Best Goods, Lowest Prices, Square Dealing

DESIRABLE BOOKS

That Should be on the Shelves of the Libraries of Every North Carolina Home

Lutie Andrews McCorkle's Old-Time Stories of the Old North State.

Warren's Stories from English History.

Pratt's America's Story for America's Children. Five Vols.

Katherine B. Massey's Story of Georgia.

Stone & Fickitt's Every Day Life in the Colonies.

Bass' Stories of Pioneer Life.

Horton's The Frozen North.

Kuffer's Stories of Long Ago.

Hyde's Favorite Greek Myths.

Firth's Stories of Old Greece.

Brown's Alice and Tom.

Stone & Fickett's Days and Deeds of a Hundred Years Ago.

Starr's Strange Peoples.

Starr's American Indians.

Fairbank's The Western U. S.

Heath's Home and School Classics (39 Vols. of the finest literature for young people in the world).

Eckstorms' Bird Book (a natural history of birds).

These or any other publications from our large and valuable list may be secured from your local book seller or from

D. C. HEATH & COMPANY

225 Fourth Avenue
NEW YORK

Biographical History of North Carolina

From Colonial Times to the Present

SAM'L A. ASHE, Editor-in-Chief CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher

GREENSBORO, N. C.

The publisher desires to say without fear of contradiction that there has never been anywhere in the United States any other State Biographical venture equalling the Biographical History of North Carolina in scope, selectness of subjects, excellence of literary and historical matter and general mechanical and artistic book-making.

The Biographical History will cover the entire history of the State and will contain sketches signed by authoritative writers of

All the Governors.

All the Chief-Justices.

All the United States Senators.

All the Federal Judges.

All those who have held Cabinet and Diplomatic positions.

Nearly all those distinguished in the Confederate service.

Nearly all the Supreme Court Justices.

Many of the Superior Court Judges.

Distinguished Generals, Military Men and Naval officers.

All the more prominent Editors, Educators, Ministers, Authors, Doctors, Lawyers, Agriculturists and Politicians.

All the more prominent Industrial and Commercial workers.

The most distinguished women.

In a word, as complete a publication as possible of all those who have adorned the annals of North Carolina.

Write for Booklet of Reviews and Testimonials.

CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher,

GREENSBORO, North Carolina

GREAT STATE FAIR

RALEIGH, N. C.

October 15-20th 1906. Will be Greater Than Ever.

PLENTY OF HIGH-GRADE ATTRACTIONS BUT NO MORE GAMBLING.

Buildings and Grounds Greatly Improved.

E. L. DAUGHTRIDGE, Pres. J. E. POGUE, Secretary

TRENT'S SOUTHERN WRITERS

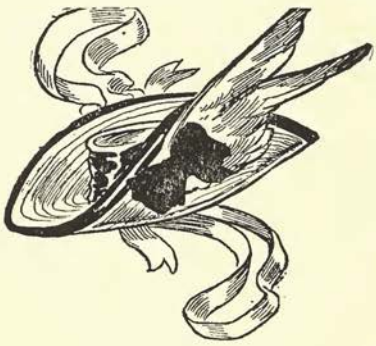
Extensively used in Women's Clubs.

Should be on the shelves of every public and private library.

THE McMILLAN COMPANY

4th National Bank Building, ATLANTA, GA.

Send for descriptive circular or call and examine the books at our Summer School text-book exhibit in Raleigh.



MISSES REESE & CO.,

10 W. Hargett St.

Fine Millinery

Correct Styles and Prices to suit

—ALL—

Trading Stamps given.

STORE CLOSES 6 O'CLOCK

Vol. VI. OCTOBER, 1906 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLINA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

	Page
The Borough Towns of North Carolina By Francis Nash	83
Governor Thomas Burke By J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph. D.	103
Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History By Col. Fred. A. Olds	123
The N. C. Society D. R. and its Objects	146
Biographical and Genealogical Sketches By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	151

(ILLUSTRATED)

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

VOLUME VI.

Glimpses of History in the Names of our Counties,
Kemp. P. Battle, LL. D.

A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), ... Mr. James Sprunt.

The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina, Richard Dillard, M. D.

Gov. Thomas Burke, . . . Mr. J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton.

Some North Carolina Histories and their Authors,
Professor Edward P. Moses.

The Borough Towns of North Carolina, . . Mr. Francis Nash.

The John White Pictures, ... Mr. W. J. Peele.

Gov. Jesse Franklin, ... Professor J. T. Alderman.

Industrial Life in Early North Carolina, . . . Mr. T. M. Pittman.

Colonial and Revolutionary Costumes in North Carolina,
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

North Carolina's Attitude to the Revolution, Mr. Robert Cowan Strong.

The Fundamental Constitutions and the Effects on the Colony,
Mr. Junius Davis.

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1906. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VI, are requested to notify at once.

Address,
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, North Carolina.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

Vol. VI. OCTOBER, 1906. No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
(Nee Hooper.)

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. J. W. THACKSTON.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MRS. ED. CHAMBERS SMITH.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

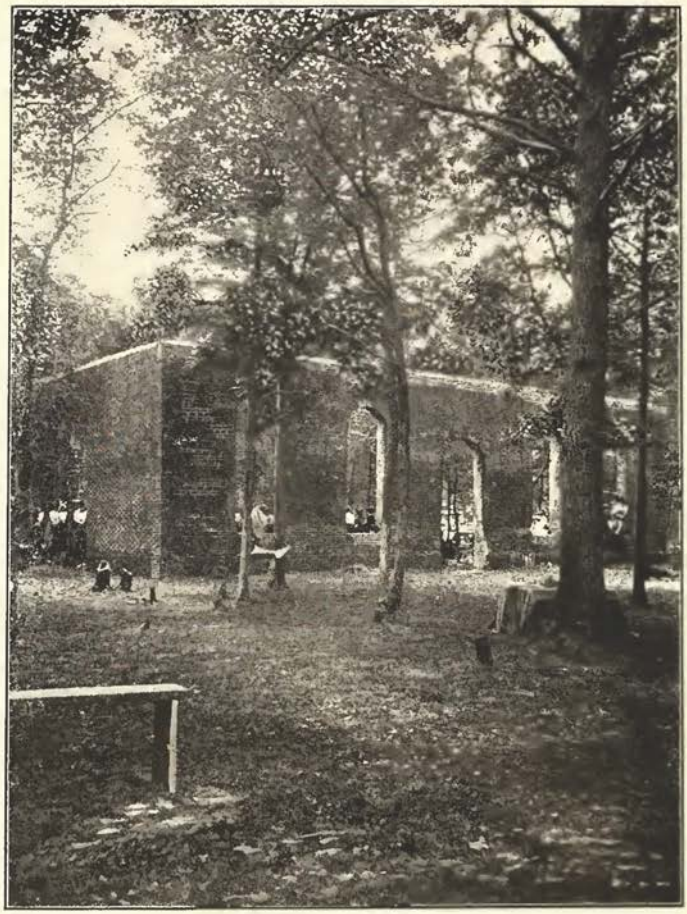
FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

* Died December 12, 1904.



RUINS OF ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH,
Brunswick, North Carolina.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VI OCTOBER, 1906 No. 2

THE BOROUGH TOWNS OF NORTH CAROLINA

BY FRANCIS NASH.

Human progress—human life, indeed—is so much the resultant of the impact of external forces upon peoples or individuals, that freedom of action, to say nothing of freedom of thought, is rather ideal than real, and can be attained only approximately, never absolutely. We inherit our temperament, our tastes, and our aptitudes; so much so that quite frequently the habits of our ancestors become instincts to us. We are also, to some degree, creatures of our training and environment, and as members of society we are subject to the will of that society, whether expressed in its legislation or in its unwritten law—public opinion. But man and nations struggle to attain this ideal freedom, and the result of this struggle, on the whole, is progress. In this struggle are two opposing forces—radicalism and conservatism—and these are but the outward expression of two instincts that are common to all humanity—the desire for the new, and the love of the old. In the action and interaction of these forces is found safety; for radicalism unchecked by conservatism is destructive, while conservatism uninspired by radicalism is stagnant.

The erection of little hamlets into boroughs, or franchised towns, in our early colonial history, is an instance of conservatism which had become stagnant. As, regardless of beauty, privacy and utility, the colonists located their residences on the street lines of these towns, because their ancestors had done the same in crowded England or Scotland, so these little communities of twenty or thirty families must be franchised because the greater towns of England had been. Thus the influence of inherited tastes, aptitudes and manners proved stronger than common sense.

It is my purpose in this article to deal with these towns as political entities. I could by no possibility compress within the limits of a BOOKLET article any satisfactory account of their social, industrial and educational life and progress.

In England, before representative government was established, the term "borough" bore the signification of a pledge; that is, when a number of men congregated in a community, thus forming a village or a town, that town or village became responsible for the acts of its inhabitants—became, in other words, a borough or pledge for their good conduct.

Later, as the merchants increased in wealth, and through that wealth acquired power, the monarch conferred the franchise upon these towns, both as a reward for services rendered and that there might be some check upon the overweening arrogance of the landed gentry.

It is well known that the first successful struggle for liberty in England was that of the lords and barons against the arbitrary power of the King; the second was that of the commercial classes against the tyranny of the aristocracy. In the latter struggle the King was on the side of commerce; and so trade, through these franchised towns, was represented in Parliament. The system itself thus forms part of the great scheme of checks and balances upon which the English Constitution is builded. In England it was a necessary safeguard against the encroachments of a landed aristocracy, and so constitutes one of the landmarks in man's progress towards civil liberty. In the Province of North Carolina, however, while in a sense there was a landed aristocracy, in no sense was there any appreciable commerce.

The Board of Trade, September 8, 1721 (2 C. R., 419), writes thus to the Secretary:

"There are great tracts of good land in this province, and it is a very healthy country, but the situation renders it forever incapable" (it must be remembered that this was before the day of railroads and river and harbor bills) "of being a place of considerable trade, by reason of a great sound, near sixty miles over, that lies between this coast and the sea, barred by a vast chain of sand-banks so very shallow and shifting that sloops drawing only five-foot water run great risk of crossing them. The little commerce, therefore, driven to this colony is carried on by very small sloops, chiefly from New England, who bring them clothing and ironware in exchange for their pork and corn, but of late they have made small quantities of pitch and tar, which are first exported to New England and thence to Great Britain."

Besides, in North Carolina the few merchants were almost without exception also land owners. If they resided in these towns their slaves, under the direction of an overseer, cultivated their plantations near by. Indeed, the merchants were as much a part of the aristocracy of the province as the land owners or the lawyers. In addition to this, the representation of these boroughs was quite frequently in the hands of lawyers and others whose interest in trade was only secondary.

The right to confer the franchise upon a town was part of the King's prerogative. At first, however, it was not asserted; New Bern, Bath, Edenton, Wilmington and Brunswick being created boroughs by act of the Assembly (23 S. R., pages 79, 133, 251 and 398). Section 31 of the Act of 1715 reads thus: "For the further encouragement of this town of Bath, and all other towns now or hereafter built within this government, it shall and may be lawful for the freeholders of said town of Bath, and of all other towns now or hereafter built or to be built within this government, at all times hereafter, when representatives or burgesses are to be chosen for the precinct wherein the town lies, to elect one burgess to represent the same in all succeeding Assemblies: Provided, that this election for members of Assembly to serve for the town of Bath, or any other town whatsoever, shall not begin nor commence till such town shall have at least sixty families." In the next section, however, New Bern is allowed to send a representative, regardless of the sixty-family provision. In the time of Governor Dobbs, 1754, the King's prerogative to confer this privilege was asserted and established. (5 C. R., pages 406-7; see also 6 C. R., page 752, and 23 S. R., page 251.)

There were some variations in the qualifications of voters in these towns. Stated generally, they must have been householder or freeholder residents for some definite period—in some instances three and others six months. (23 S. R., pages 133 and 140.) To be eligible as a burgess, one must have been a freeholder, but not necessarily a resident.

It was only at the beginning of their existence that any of them could have been considered pocket boroughs, in the sense that a single man or family could dispose of an election to the Assembly from them. Later, indeed, the elections in many instances were hotly contested and the majorities were very small.

Bath.—Though New Bern was the first town to be represented in the General Asembly, Bath was the oldest town in the province. It was laid off in 1705, but was not represented until after 1715. Of the borough towns, therefore, Bath shall be considered first. Rev. William Gordon, an intelligent missionary, gives us this account of Bath County and town in 1709 (1 C. R., page 715):

"Bath County contains most of that land which lies to the southward of Albemarle Sound to Pamlico River and thirty or forty miles more southerly to the Neuse River, which

(being but lately peopled by a few French who left Virginia) is not laid down on the draft. They have divided the whole county into three precincts or parishes, though the inhabitants of all are but equal in number to any one of the other, most of which are seated on Pamlico River or its branches. Here is no church, though they have begun to build a town called Bath. It consists of about twelve houses and is the only town in the whole province. They have a small collection of books for a library, which were carried over by Rev. Dr. Bray, and some land is laid out for a glebe, but no minister would ever stay long in the place, though several have come hither from the West Indies and other plantations in America; and yet I must own it is not the unpleasantest part of the country—nay, in all probability it will be the center of a trade, as having the advantage of a better inlet for shipping, and surrounded with the most pleasant of savannahs, very useful for stocks of cattle." In 1711 that picturesque misfit of a parson, John Urmston, styled it the most obscure, inconsiderable place in the country. He wanted Dr. Bray's library, though, and was provoked at its location at Bath. (1 C. R., page 772.) During the Indian outbreak of 1711 that town was in very serious danger, but it was protected by a stockaded fort and a small garrison, so its inhabitants were not massacred, though in much alarm. (1 C. R., 826.) In 1714, Mr. Urmston again writes: "We expect to hear that famous city of Bath, consisting of nine houses, or rather cottages, once styled the metropolis and seat of this government, will be totally deserted; and yet I cannot find means to secure that admirable collection of books sent in by the Rev. Dr. Bray for the use of the ministers of this province, but it will in all probability serve for a bonfire to the Indians. (2 C. R., 144.)

Dr. Bray had been a missionary to the province and had married Martha, daughter of Thomas Pollock, the elder. He is said to have been learned and to have originated the first systematic movement in the Church of England for missions to the dependencies of Great Britain. When he returned home in 1699 he sent a few of his own books to the colony, and the following year, 1700, was instrumental in having others sent over. (1 C. R., 572.) The Assembly, in 1715, enacted an elaborate law to secure this library. (23 S. R., 76 et seq.) It, however, shared the fate of all such enterprises in communities where there are few readers and no book lovers. Commenting on this act in 1731, Governor Burrington said: "This, though a long act, only concerns a town where little improvements have been made, and for securing a small library that was too much embezzled before the act was made." (3 C. R., 187.)

At its foundation there were some anticipations of a future greatness which have never been realized. In 1716 the Proprietors made it a seaport town, with the privileges of the same. It was the county-seat of Bath County, and many of the prominent officials of the province lived in its neighborhood, including Tobias Knight and Teach, the pirate. It was badly located, however (on sixty acres of land lying on Old Town Creek, a short tributary on the north side of Pamlico River), and was crowded to the wall first by New Bern and then by Beaufort and Washington. For these reasons, it, in its best estate, grew slowly, and never at any time became an important point. It has long since ceased to be more than a memory. It was disfranchised by the Constitution of 1776. The following is a list of its representatives, so far as they can now be ascertained, to the adoption of the State Constitution:

Roger Kennion, John Lahey, Roger Kennion, Robert Turner, Richard Rigby, Robert Turner, Michael Coutanche, Wyriot Ormond, Michael Coutanche, Robert Palmer, Wyriot Ormond, Patrick Gordon, John Maule, Wyriot Ormond and

William Brown. The latter also represented Bath in each of the four Provincial Congresses or Conventions.

New Bern.—New Bern was, from DeGraffenreid's own narration, the child of his sorrow. Hunger and starvation, disease and death preyed upon the Palatines after their arrival in the province in 1710, and when he came later in the same year with his Bernese he found them in despair. "I cannot," said he (1 C. R., 910), "enough insist on the wretched and sorrowful state in which I found these poor people on my arrival—nearly all sick and at the last gasp, and the few who had kept their health despairing entirely." Mrs. Kennedy thus beautifully describes the tongue of land on which they had been located: "A long point of land, bounded north and south by a strip of shining river; and on this land a virgin forest, draped in long, gray moss; here and there a tangle of vines, a rainbow blending of parti-colored blossoms, with brilliant grosbeaks and red-winged blackbirds darting like living flowers through the golden sunshine, leaving a trail of song behind, or whip-poor-wills and chuck-will-widows calling wistfully to each other through the lonesome darkness. And out beyond the apex of the tongue of land the two rivers, blended into one wide current, flowing ceaselessly to the distant waiting sea." Over this beautiful scene hovered the Angel of Death. Many of these recent comers from the purer atmosphere of the Upper Rhine and the mountains of Switzerland were prostrated by the fever that lurked in the low-grounds and swamps which surrounded them. The coming of DeGraffenreid with his Switzers, however, inspired the dejected colonists with new life, and they entered more heartily into the improvement of their surroundings. The town of New Bern was founded and many settlements were cleared about it. They were beginning, as their crops were maturing the following year, 1711, to look with hope to the future, when the Indians in overwhelming force burst upon them, massacred eighty of them and carried twenty or more off into captivity. During the rest of that war they were little troubled by their savage foes. DeGraffenreid, himself escaping death and imprisonment, had made a treaty with them, by which his colonists would be exempt from attack so long as they remained neutral in the war, which in a desultory way continued four years longer. Financial and other troubles coming thick upon DeGraffenreid, he, after making over all his property to Thomas Pollock, left his colonists and the country, and they (the Palatines and Swiss) being scattered about the section, lost their distinctive organization. In 1715 the town was franchised, and in 1723 it was incorporated and its limits extended to include 250 acres. A curious provision of this law was contained in section 7: "If any person or persons shall die possessed of any of said lots without leaving heir or without making a will of the said lot, then and in such case the absolute fee to the same shall come and revert to said Cullen Pollock, his heirs and assigns, forever."

The Assembly for the first time met in New Bern in 1738. The seat of government was fixed there in 1746. (23 S. R., 252.) This, however, did not mean that the Governor was to reside there, nor that he could not call the Assembly together at another place. It will appear later that it met at other places after this period. Indeed, until Tryon came, New Bern seems not to have been a favorite of any of the Governors. Johnston was evidently partial to the new town, Wilmington on the Cape Fear, while Dobbs, living at Brunswick, did all he could to make that an important place. New Bern, despite of this, continued to grow in population and to thrive commercially, and when the Tryon Palace was completed in 1770 it became the political metropolis of the province. The following were its burgesses to the adoption of the Constitution: Walter Lane, Samuel Powell, Walter Lane, George Bould, William Wilson, John Caruthers, Jeremiah Vail, Solomon Rew, James Davis, Joseph Leech, Alexander Emsley, Richard Caswell, Christopher Neale, and in the first Convention Abner Nash and Isaac Edwards; second idem, Abner Nash, James Davis, William Tisdale and Richard Ellis; third idem, Abner Nash; fourth idem, Abner Nash.

EDENTON.—The Towne on Queen Anne's Creek was established by an act of the Assembly in 1712. There a courthouse was to be built and a house to hold the Assembly in. In 1722 it was incorporated as the town of Edenton. It was located in what was then the best settled and the most prosperous section of the province. And thus it continued for many years, but, the center of population moving further west and south, it was found too much out of the way to remain a political capital. So much culture, wealth and ability were grouped about it, however, that no community had so great an influence upon affairs in the province, and later, in the founding of the State, as Edenton. Men like Samuel Johnston, Thomas Jones, Joseph Hewes, James Iredell and others could scarcely be found elsewhere in North Carolina, or, if found, had not formed themselves into a compact and efficient coterie. From 1720 to 1738 the Assembly met in Edenton. In 1738 and 1739 it met in New Bern. It resumed its sittings in Edenton in 1740, but in 1743 was the last of its meetings in that place. The following were its burgesses to 1777:

Thomas Parris, Robert Lloyd, William Williams, Charles Westbeer, William Badham, James Craven, Samuel Stillwell, Thomas Barker, Joseph Hewes, Samuel Johnston, Joseph Hewes, Samuel Johnston, Joseph Hewes, and Joseph Hewes, in all of the Provincial Congresses, with Jasper Charlton with him in the second Congress.

WILMINGTON.—If there was any section of North Carolina that vied with Edenton in culture and wealth, it was the Cape Fear section. Governor Johnston, writing of the inhabitants of this section, December 24, 1734, says: "They are a very sober and industrious set of people and have made amazing progress in their improvement since their first settlement, which was about eight years ago. As proof of this I find by the Collector's books forty-two ships went loaded from this river within these twelve months last past. There are now several of them planting mulberries for raising of raw silks, and cultivating vines for producing wine, in which they seem very expert. Some few are likewise making attempts for oil from the olive and from divers sorts of nuts and seeds which grow almost spontaneously here, for all which both climate and soil seem wonderfully adapted."

The little hamlet of Newton existed as early as 1732, and Governor Johnston opened a land office there on the 13th of May, 1735. It was incorporated in March of that year (4 C. R., page 43). Governor Johnston became the patron of this little town, very much as Governor Dobbs afterwards became the patron of Brunswick and Governor Tryon of Hillsboro. He owned lands adjoining it on the northeast, and in 1739 had it incorporated as a town under the name of Wilmington, and made a borough (23 S. R., page 133). It was found necessary to include in the borough those who resided out of the limits of the town "between the bounds of said town upwards and Smith's Creek, and within 120 poles of the northeast branch of the Cape Fear River," and who should be the inhabitant of a brick house of the length of thirty feet and width of sixteen feet. It was through Governor Johnston's influence that one session of the Assembly was held at Wilmington in 1741 and one session in 1746. During his long administration, with these exceptions and also a session at Bath in 1752, the Assembly met at New Bern. Wilmington was granted a royal charter, March 5, 1763 (23 S. R., 654.) The following were the Burgesses from Wilmington from 1740 to 1777: William Farris, Thomas Clark, Lewis DeRosset, Cornelius Harnett; to the first Convention, Francis Clayton; to the second, Cornelius Harnett and A. Maclaine; to the third, Cornelius Harnett; to the fourth, William Hooper.

Brunswick.—The Moores, Maurice and Roger, were the founders of Brunswick. It was begun in 1725, but Governor Johnston threw his influence in favor of its rival, Newton, and it was not incorporated until 1745, and was franchised by special act of the Assembly in 1754, though it did not contain more than twenty families. (5 C. R., 158 and 151.) There was for years great rivalry between Brunswick and Wilmington, but the open roadstead of the former, together with the better location of the latter, soon settled the fate of both towns. The site of Brunswick is known now only from the ruins of St. Philip's Church, while Wilmington is a thriving city of 30,000 inhabitants. The Burgesses of Brunswick to its disfranchisement by the Constitution of 1776, were as follows: Maurice Moore, William Dry, Maurice Moore, and in the first Convention unrepresented, in the second, Maurice Moore, in the third, the same, in the fourth, Parker Quince.

Halifax.—This town was incorporated in 1757. The Assembly applying the old Bath town 60 family law of 1715, admitted Stephen Dewey as Burgess from Halifax in April, 1760, and again in 1761, Alexander Emsley, but this was disapproved in England (6 C. R., 752). In 1764, however, a charter was granted to the town by Governor Dobbs, and thence forward until 1835 it continued to send Burgesses to the General Assembly. It is well known that in and about Halifax from 1770 until the Civil War, there continued to be many well-to-do and cultured planters and merchants. During the Revolutionary War it, too, became an important political point, the third and fourth Provincial Conventions meeting there. There the first instructions for independence were adopted, April, 1776, and there, too, was the birth of the State in December of the same year. A session of the Legislature of 1780 was also held in Halifax in 1781. The Burgesses of the town from 1764 to the adoption of the Constitution were: Abner Nash, Joseph Montfort; in the first Convention, John Geddy; in the second, Willie Jones and Francis Nash; in the third and fourth, Willie Jones.

Salisbury.—Salisbury was laid off by William Churton, that founder of towns in the middle section of the Province, in 1753, although it appears not to have been regularly incorporated until 1770. Governor Tryon, no doubt influenced by the inequality of representation between the East and the West, created it a borough by charter in 1765 or 1766. The Burgesses from it to the adoption of the Constitution of 1776 were: John Mitchell, John Dunn and Hugh Montgomery; to the first Convention, William Kennon; to the second, Hugh Montgomery and Robert Rowan; to the third and fourth, David Nesbit.

Hillsboro.—In 1754 William Churton laid off a town on the north bank of the Eno River, where the great Indian trail crossed it. This town was in 1759 incorporated under the name of Childsburg. In 1766 its name was changed to Hillsboro. Governor Tryon seemed to be much interested in this flourishing settlement in the back country, and, July 9, 1770, made it a market town and borough by charter. He has been criticised for this, it being said that he franchised a little hamlet that his friend, Edmund Fanning, who had been defeated by Herman Husband in the county, might have a pocket borough to represent in the Assembly. I suppose that the desire to have Fanning in the Assembly did influence the Governor in thus exercising the royal prerogative, but in doing so, he at no point strained the law. Bath, Edenton and New Bern were the only boroughs in the province that had been franchised by the Assembly. It was attempted in the case of Wilmington, Brunswick and Halifax, but in each case the act of the Assembly was repealed in England, and these boroughs were re-franchised by charter. The old Bath 60-family act, 1715, had been construed as allowing a town with due proof that it contained 60 families to apply to the governor for a charter, and thus construed it did not limit the King's prerogative, but it did not and could not prevent the King or his viceroy, the Governor, from chartering a town, though it might have contained less than 60 families. This was done in the case of Salisbury in 1766, a smaller town than Hillsboro. It is very probable, too, that the latter place, counting free blacks as well as whites, had the full complement of 60 families in 1770. The following were the Burgesses from Hillsboro to the adoption of the Constitution: Edmund Fanning, Francis Nash; unrepresented in the first Convention; in the second, William Armstrong and Nathaniel Rochester; in the third and fourth, William Johnston.

Campbelton.—Campbelton was incorporated as a town in 1762. Being at the head of the navigation of the Cape Fear River, and having dependent upon it for a market an extensive and fertile back country, then rapidly filling up with settlers, it was thought that it was one of the most eligible localities in the Province for a town. It soon had a rival, however, in the near-by village of Cross Creek, the latter seeming to absorb the lion's share of the trade. The Legislature of 1778, first session, included Cross Creek in Campbelton, and so that village ceased to have a legal existence independent of the latter place. Campbelton was made a borough by charter in 1773, Martin being Governor. In April, 1783, the Legislature, reciting that the said town from its convenience to the western settlements and the easy transportation of goods down the Cape Fear River, must necessarily become a great mart for the produce of the interior country, changed its name to Fayetteville. Campbelton was disfranchised by the Constitution of 1776, but Fayetteville was franchised by an ordinance of the Convention of 1789, which had met at that place to consider, and, in fact, adopt the Federal Constitution. The Burgesses from Campbelton to its disfranchisement were: William Hooper, Robert Rowan; in the first Convention it was unrepresented; in the second, James Hepburn; in the third, Arthur Council; in the fourth, Thomas Hadley.

Disfranchisement.—Bath, Brunswick and Campbelton were disfranchised by the Constitution of 1776, leaving New Bern, Wilmington, Edenton, Halifax, Hillsboro and Salisbury still boroughs, and as above stated, Fayetteville again became a borough town in 1789. The Convention of 1835 did away entirely with all borough representation. The Act of January 5, 1835, (the Convention Act,) gave the Convention a discretion to abolish borough representation in whole or in part. The act itself, thus committing their fate to the Convention, was enacted by the aid of the borough members. The debate in the Convention arose on a resolution of Dr. James S. Smith, a representative from Orange and for forty years a resident of Hillsboro, in these words: "It is expedient to abolish borough representation entirely." Judge Gaston opposed this, because, first, the towns had certain definite and distinct interests of their own, which could be adequately protected only by their own representatives. In them property was in a more concentrated form, and they paid a large proportion of the taxes of the county in which they were located; second, agriculture was represented through the counties—trade and commerce should be represented through the towns; third, boroughs were more apt than the counties to send their best men to the Legislature. Later in the same day, June 10, 1835, he elaborated the second point thus: "It is vain to deny that commercial communities have peculiar interests of their own. These they must endeavor to protect and advance through some agent or other. If we deny them a constitutional agent, they will be driven to get agents of another kind. If they are to have no member in the hall of legislation, they may be compelled to send you lobby members. Heard in the Legislature, they can do no harm. So few in number, their voice can be effectual only when it is the voice of truth and justice. But when members of the Assembly shall be approached through the other agents, means of persuasion may be used of a different character. The intelligent may indeed be addressed by reason, and the just by fair statements—but the uninformed may be misled by falsehood, and those whose consciences are in their pockets, may be convinced by arguments directed to the seat of their sensibility."

These arguments were met by the suggestions, first, representation in the House of Commons was to be based upon Federal population. If these small, though compact and populous communities, were to be allowed a special representative this principle would have to be disregarded, and as a consequence there would be an unequal representation, the very evil that the Convention had been called to remedy.

Second, if there had ever been anything in the doctrine that trade and commerce were entitled to special representation, the Federal Constitution had removed this by placing interstate and foreign commerce under the care of the Federal Government. On this point Mr. Jesse Wilson, of Perquimans, trenchantly asked: "If it be true that this right of representation is essential to the protection of their interests, why has not the fostering care of the Legislature, for more than fifty years, been able to prevent them from sinking into ruin? Halifax, sir, is gone; Edenton is gone, and New Bern is not far behind." And again: "But, sir, it is said that there are mysteries about this trade and commerce that only mercantile gentlemen can understand. Why then, sir, do they not send merchants, instead of lawyers or doctors?"

Third, though it was true that the majority of borough representatives were men of intelligence and character, the counties may still avail themselves of the services of such men, so the State will in reality lose little in this regard. But what seemed to have most weight with the members of the Convention was the debauchery and corruption and violence that accompanied nearly all these borough elections. In 1825, in a contest between that brilliant, but thoroughly unprincipled, firebrand, Robert Potter, and Jesse A. Bynum in Halifax, the election became first a free fight and then a riot in which one man was killed and a number injured. Dr. Smith said in the Convention: "Has the moral condition of the borough towns been improved by the privilege which they possess of sending members to the Legislature? On the contrary, the annual elections, it is notorious, in most of the towns are productive of feuds, quarrels and bloodshed. Mechanics and others are excited by the parties interested in such elections, business is neglected, and the morals of the people are corrupted." This of Hillsboro. Mr. Charles Fisher, of Salisbury, said: "Who has not witnessed the excitement caused by these borough elections? Who has not seen the worst passions of our nature brought into active exercise by them? Who has not heard that corruption of the basest kind is frequently practised to carry a doubtful contest. He knew these things and how the whole system worked. Every man is known, as are his calling and necessities. His weak side is sought out, that he may be successfully approached. Sir," (to the Chair, Judge Daniel, of Halifax), "you know all these things. Have you not witnessed at the elections in your borough scenes of the most violent character, which not unfrequently terminated in bloodshed? Have you not seen men pressed for their debts, in order to drive them to pursue a course in direct opposition to their convictions of right? Have you not, sir, like myself, seen the elective franchise abused in every variety of form? * * * I have seen in these contests family arrayed against family—carried to the extremes of bitterness. I have seen neighbors separated and estranged, and social intercourse destroyed. Yes, sir, even has this pestiferous influence penetrated the church, and disturbed its harmony and brotherhood." And then Mr. Holmes, of Wilmington: "But, sir, great as are the evils which he (Mr. Fisher) portrayed, they are infinitely magnified in our commercial towns. Our population is of a more abandoned cast. We have more dependent and more pliable materials to work upon. He alluded to seamen and others who went to their employers to know how they should vote. Nothing was more common than a day or two before the election to house the voters as they housed their cattle. This was no extravagance; he had participated in these contests and knew the fact."

Certainly there could not have been a more forcible arraignment of the whole system than this, and it proved effective, notwithstanding it was opposed by such able men as Gaston, Swain, Daniel and Toomer. These sought to save from the general wreck of the borough towns, Edenton, New Bern, Wilmington and Fayetteville, but could not. After debating the question for two days, it was, on June 11, 1835, referred to a committee of 26, at whose head was Governor Swain. That committee reported on June 23 in favor of the franchise for Edenton, New Bern, Wilmington and Fayetteville. The report, after discussion on the 25th, was disagreed to by a vote of 50 yeas to 73 nays, and so, though other votes were taken with the same result, all these towns were disfranchised.

Mr. Wilson, of Perquimans, said irreverently in the debate: "The monkey is not the only imitative animal. Men are equally so. Our forefathers scarcely touched this soil before they began to exercise this imitative faculty. You have seen, sir, little misses dressing their dolls, and boys switching their stick horses. Like them in the exercise of imitative powers, our fathers, to ape Great Britain with her Manchester, her Birmingham, and her Liverpool, gave the right of representation to Halifax, to Edenton, and to Hillsboro." However defective Mr. Wilson's knowledge of history may have been, it must be admitted that there is some truth in his assertion. The fact that neither Birmingham nor Manchester was a franchised town until after the Reform Bill became a law in 1832, may impeach his accuracy, but it detracts little from the force of his remarks.

From the Lords Proprietors' day to the beginning of the Civil War, those in authority in North Carolina continued to deplore the lack of an adequate seaport. Among the earliest of the Proprietors' instructions was one requiring the establishment of three towns in the Colony. In addition to what has already been said of the physical difficulties in the way of such a project, was this, which has been suggested by Capt. S. A. Ashe: In the early days the small vessels plying to colonial ports could readily approach the private wharves of the rich planters, thus rendering the concentration and regulation of trade difficult. On this account the attempt to establish central marts was a failure. This of course applies only to the towns on navigable waters. As to the interior towns other reasons prevailed. The inhabitants of the country districts had few interests in common with those of the towns. Says Prof. C. L. Raper: "Town life never became very attractive to many of the colonists of North Carolina, and what few towns there were became much more important as centers of political activity than they did of commercial, industrial or social life. They were centers of local government, and often of political conflicts. They were places where a few products were bought and sold—not places of their making. The surplus products of the farms for miles about them were taken there and exchanged for a few simple articles, salt being a very important one, and now and then converted into currency. At times they were the centers of religious devotion and of intellectual life. There churches were erected, but during the last fifty years of the province more places for religious worship were to be found in the country than in the towns. Here, too, were a few schools and libraries, but there were more in the rural districts."

Of course the making of certain of these towns boroughs was, throughout their whole history, intended as a stimulus to their growth, but it may well be doubted whether the possession of the franchise added anything to their commercial or industrial development. The Convention of 1776, still impressed with the view that commerce, being a special interest, was entitled to special representation in the Legislature, determined to continue the tide-water towns as boroughs. Selecting these—New Bern, Wilmington and Edenton—there immediately arose a political necessity, in order to placate the western interest, to continue an equal number of the western towns as boroughs. The continuing of the franchise to Salisbury, Hillsboro and Halifax was probably based wholly on such a compromise as this. By 1835, however, the people had thoroughly tested the system, and no doubt they were wholly right in doing away with it forever.

There is a debt of gratitude that the State owes these towns, to which I must refer before I close. They had been recipients of special favors from the royal government, and might perhaps have been excused for some degree of lukewarmness in the controversy between that government and its colonies. But they were not lukewarm. Instead, the history of the times, properly interpreted, shows that the revolutionary movement had its origin in these towns and spread from them to the country districts, where, finding excellent food to feed upon, it grew so great as to cover the whole province. Wilmington, New Bern and Edenton were the head and front of this "sedition and treason," and following immediately after them were Halifax, Hillsboro and Salisbury. The story of the Revolution in North Carolina would be very tame, very fragmentary, very inconclusive, if the part that the great men who lived in or about these towns took was eliminated from it. They were the men whom Providence raised up for the emergency, and without them North Carolina would probably have remained a hot-bed of Toryism. So we who live to-day may well acknowledge our indebtedness to them.

GOVERNOR THOMAS BURKE.

BY
J. G. DEROULHAC HAMILTON, PH.D.,
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF HISTORY, UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Among those who accompanied William of Normandy on his victorious expedition to England in 1066 were two brothers, sons of Eustice de Burgo, Serlo and John de Burgo, or, as it soon became, Burke. For their services the Conqueror rewarded them with the grant of several manors in York, where Serlo built the castle of Knaresborough. Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his brother John, now called Monoculus, on account of the loss of one of his eyes. The latter married a Norman lady of large fortune, Beatrice de Vessey by name, and from this union were born two sons, James of Knaresborough and Richard the Red. Richard had one son, Walter, who in turn was the father of three distinguished sons, Haburt, Earl of Kent and Chief Justice of England; Jeffrey, Bishop of Ely; and William, surnamed de Adelmel, who was sent to Ireland by Henry II and was given a grant comprising the greater part of the Province of Connaught. The line of descent of the branch of the family remaining in England must have been lost, as a letter from Edanus Burke to Thomas Burke, dated December 2, 1769, states that all trace of the family in England had disappeared. Of the Irish branches the same writer states that from the similarity of arms[1] until 1627 he judged that all were related. One of these branches was known as the Burkes of [1] The arms were as follows:

The field. Or. Cross-Gules, in the dexter canton, a Lion Rampant, Sable.
Crest: A wreath, a cat and mountain. Proper.
Motto: Un Proy, Une foy, Une Loy.

Tyaquin, after the family estate which had descended lineally since Henry II, and from this branch was born the subject of this sketch.

Thomas Burke, the son of Ulick Burke and Letitia Ould, was born in Galway, Ireland, about 1747. Almost nothing is known of his early life, except that he spent some time at a university, probably Dublin. Before he reached manhood he became involved in some family quarrel, the particulars of which are unknown, and about 1764 he came to Accomac County, Virginia, and commenced the study and practice of medicine. He tells in a letter to an old acquaintance in Ireland, a Mrs. Jones, that his proficiency was equal, if not superior, to that of most physicians in the colonies, and that his success was very great. But the pecuniary rewards were small, and he soon found that law would be more profitable and of far less responsibility. After pursuing his studies for a few months with great earnestness, he was licensed at his first examination, and, as he said, "with great applause." At some time during this period he removed to Norfolk, where, in 1770, he married Mary Freeman.

Soon after this, probably about 1771, he moved to North Carolina and settled in Orange County, about two miles north of Hillsboro, on a place which he named Tyaquin, after the family place in Ireland. He had already gone to Halifax with a view to settling there, but decided in favor of Hillsboro. There he was licensed to practice before the Superior Court in March, 1772. In his new home he soon won distinction in his profession and made many friends.

When the relations between the colonies and the mother country became strained in consequence of the Stamp Act and other measures which the colonies thought oppressive, Burke was a strong advocate of American rights. While living in Virginia he had written against the Stamp Act. Concerning his position he wrote his uncle: "I am and ever shall be avowedly a passionate lover of Liberty and Hater of Tyranny. The essentials of the former I take to, being governed by Laws made with Constitutional consent of the community, ultimately Judged by that Community, and enjoying and disposing of their property only agreeable to Will, and the latter is undeniably anything Subversive of those Privileges. How far the Stamp Act was so, sufficiently appears upon the very face of it."

Dr. Burke's first official public service was as a member from Orange to the Provincial Congress which met in New Bern in 1775. He was again a member of the Congress which met in Hillsboro August 20, 1775. In the first day's session he was placed upon two important committees—the first, to prepare a test to be signed by all the members of the Congress; the other, to confer with such of the inhabitants of the province as might entertain religious or political scruples in regard to taking part in the American cause, with a view of inducing them to unite in the common defence of the rights of the province. The test, as prepared and signed, declared that the Parliament of Great Britain had no right to impose taxes upon the colonies, and that any attempt to do so ought to be resisted by the people; that the people were bound by the acts of the Continental and Provincial Congresses, because they were representative of them; and, finally, the members bound themselves to support all such acts to the utmost of their power. A few days later Burke was placed upon the committee to prepare an address to the inhabitants of the province. He was also a member of the Ways and Means Committee, of which Richard Caswell was chairman.

Dr. Burke was also a member of the Congress which met in Halifax April 4, 1776. In this body he was on the following committees: Privileges and Elections; Claims; to take into consideration the usurpations and violences attempted by the King and Parliament of Britain against America, and the further measure to be taken for frustrating the same; and for the better defence of the province; Ways and Means; to prepare a temporary civil Constitution; to supply the province with arms and ammunition; a standing committee to form a temporary form of government; and ways and means to prevent the desertion of slaves. He was chairman of the Committee of Secrecy, Intelligence and Observation, and was also on nine minor special committees. On April 12th the Committee on Usurpations reported a resolution empowering the delegates of the colony to the Constinental Congress to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring independence, reserving for the colony the sole right of forming a Constitution and laws for the colony, and of appointing from time to time delegates to meet those from the other colonies in regard to matters of common welfare. This was passed unanimously. Before the Congress adjourned Burke was elected paymaster of militia for the Hillsboro district.

Before he went to Halifax the people of Orange had caused Burke to sign certain instructions which, it is said, he wrote himself, in regard to the form of the proposed new government. In brief, they were as follows:

1. Political power of two kinds, principal and supreme, derived and inferior.
2. Principal possessed only by the people at large. Derived by their servants.
3. Whatever persons chosen by people can possess only derived power.
4. Whatever constituted by principal power can be altered only by people.
5. Rules for derived power's exercise made by principal.
6. No power but principal shall exist.
7. Derived power never to subvert principal.
8. Constitution to be submitted to the people.
9. No established religion.
10. Three branches of government, Executive, Legislative, and Judicial, all distinct.
11. Two houses in Assembly.
12. All elections by ballot.
13. Executive elected every year.

The election of delegates to the Congress held at Halifax in November of the same year was accompanied by great tumult, and in consequence a petition was sent up against those elected, with a request for a new election. The Congress at first refused to unseat the sitting members, but later rescinded their action and ordered a new election. This was probably due in large part to Burke's influence, as he was present at the sessions of the body. It is very likely that the leaders in the body wished for his presence. When the new election was held he was among those elected, and took his seat on December 16th. Here, besides being placed on a number of minor committees, he was a member of a committee appointed to consider, prepare and report on the business necessary to be transacted by the Congress. The Bill of Rights and Constitution adopted at this session is said to have been largely the work of Thomas Jones, Thomas Burke, and Richard Caswell.

On December 20th, Burke, with William Hooper and Joseph Hewes, was elected a delegate to the Congress of the United States. For their services each was allowed the sum of $2,000 per annum. Dr. Burke now resigned his position as paymaster of militia, but remained at Halifax until the close of the session, December 23, 1776.

In the Congress Burke seems to have taken quite a prominent part in the debates, particularly when he thought the rights of the individual States were threatened. His letters express great fear lest an attempt should be made to give Congress more power than was compatible with the rights of the States. In fact, he was opposed to any forms of government, not absolutely necessary, being set up until entire independence should be secured.

During the first part of his attendance upon the sessions of Congress, Burke wrote regular and full accounts of the proceedings to Governor Caswell, but this did not continue.

In April, 1777, he was re-elected. At the same session of the General Assembly a new county was erected from a part of Rowan and was named in his honor.[1]

In the autumn of that year Burke left the sessions of Congress for a few days and took part as a volunteer in the battle of Brandywine. This adventure of his was the indirect cause of a serious quarrel later. He became convinced that the American defeat there was largely due to the inefficiency of Gen. John Sullivan, and preferred charges against him in Congress. General Sullivan wrote a letter to Congress containing reflections on Burke, though he was not mentioned by name. A correspondence between the two followed, resulting in a challenge from Burke, and seconds were named. No meeting was ever brought about, probably on account of the distance separating them.

In October Dr. Burke returned to North Carolina, and on December 1st took his seat as a member of the House of Commons, to fill the unexpired term of Nathaniel Rochester, who had shortly before resigned to become Clerk of the Court of Orange. As usual, Burke seems to have served upon most of the important committees.

It is not known when Burke returned to Philadelphia, but he was there by the middle of February, 1778. The preceding summer he had recommended the appointment of Hand, of Pennsylvania, as an additional brigadier for North Carolina, and this excited great feeling among the North Carolina troops and in the State. Probably this was the reason why he was not re-elected to Congress in April, 1778.

[1] There has been some discussion as to whether or not Burke county was named for Governor Burke or Edmund Burke. Wheeler says it was for the latter, and his statement has usually been accepted. But the following extract from a letter of Abner Nash seems final authority on the subject: "Our Assembly have paid a compliment to our worthy delegate Dr. Burke, which no private man has experienced before. A new county taken from Surry (sic) is called for him."

He was, however, very anxious to get home, and this may have had something to do with it, though it is scarcely probable. But for an incident which occurred in April, 1778, his political career might have closed here.

The report of a committee of Congress appointed to reply to a letter of General Washington contained certain expressions which seemed to reflect upon Washington. A prolonged and bitter debate followed, in which Burke took an active part in opposition to the reply of the committee. The opposition was so strong as to secure an amendment to the reply. The final vote on the amended reply came late at night. It was then discovered that there was no quorum, nine votes being necessary, and Dr. Burke, who was worn out by the long session, having gone to his lodgings and to bed. A messenger was sent for him, and returned with a most violent message of refusal to comply with the demand of Congress. It turned out that the messenger had not made himself clearly understood to Dr. Burke, who thought that he was hearing a message from Colonel Duer, of New York. He repeatedly expressed his regret for his language, but when Congress was not inclined to accept his explanation, but debated the matter for fifteen days and actually served a rule upon him as for contempt, Burke, while acknowledging that he had been wrong in absenting himself without the consent of Congress, which had a right to compel the attendance of its members, said:

"An unreasonable exercise of any power is tyranny and to keep a member at such unreasonable hours, and under such circumstances is, in my opinion, tyranical, and I will not submit to it but by force upon my person. I consider every freeman as having a right to judge for himself when the exercise of any power is unreasonable, and if I err in my judgment, the power of punishment lies within the State which I I represent."

He further stated that he would regard any attempt of Congress to act in the matter as an infringement upon the rights of his State, and that to North Carolina alone would he be responsible. Congress then appealed to the General Assembly of North Carolina, which referred the matter to a committee headed by William Hooper. Before the committee could report, the Assembly elected Dr. Burke and Whitmel Hill as additional delegates to Congress, thus showing where the sympathies of the members were. The committee reported, August 14th, exonerating him from all blame and agreeing with him that Congress had no power in the matter. This naturally closed the incident.

Burke was again elected in 1779 and 1780. In October, 1779, he and Whitmel Hill were invited to the State Senate and formally thanked by the Speaker for their long and faithful service in Congress. The Speaker of the House of Commons also expressed the thanks of that body. In May of the same year Burke had been elected by the Legislature a trustee of Granville Hall, an institution of learning in Granville County.

By this time Burke had become heartily tired of Philadelphia, and in April, 1780, he wrote Cornelius Harnett that his health was declining, and, said he: "I am satisfied that another year's close application in Congress would make a perpetual citizen in Philadelphia and give me a right to the soil from whence nothing short of the final Judgment of the World could evict me."

In the summer of 1780 Burke returned to Hillsboro. His presence at the time was most fortunate, for the conditions in the section around Hillsboro were most distressing and alarming. General Gates, with the army, was there on his way south, and no provision having been made for feeding the troops, they subsisted for the most part by foraging and impressment. Not only was food taken, but there was wanton destruction of property. Horses and wagons were seized, horses were turned into fields of standing grain, and numerous other outrages were committed, which excited the anger of the most loyal and roused the slumbering disaffection of those already inclined to Toryism. This was increased by the insolence and haughtiness of the officials who had charge of the matter of procuring supplies. Burke declared that he would resist any such injustice with force, and, his neighbors appealing to him for advice and assistance, he at once entered into correspondence with General Gates and the President of Congress, stating that he would see that supplies were furnished if the people were fairly treated. To him, largely, belongs the credit of settling what threatened to be a most serious matter.

On June 25, 1781, the General Asembly which met at Wake Court House elected Dr. Burke Governor to succeed Abner Nash, and he entered upon the duties of his office the next day. The Speaker of the Senate, Alexander Martin, in his announcement speech, said, among other things:

"It gives me a particular pleasure to have at the head of the Executive, a Gentleman on whose Integrity, Firmness, and Abilities, we can rely with confidence at a Time this State is invaded by a cruel Enemy, and threatened with all the Horrors of War, which to oppose and avert call for the most spirited Exertions of this Country, that Independence and Peace be secured to it on a lasting Basis."

Governor Burke, in expressing his thanks and appreciation for the honor conferred upon him, said:

"At any period less difficult, dangerous and critical than the present, I should beg leave to decline an office so much above my abilities and so illy suiting my private Inclinations and Circumstances. But no considerations of private convenience or of difficulty or danger shall deter me from any duty to which my Country may call me while her affairs labor under unfavorable Appearances. I therefore consent to take upon me the Office and Dignity to which the Honorable the General Assembly have been pleased to elect me, and shall entirely devote myself to the Establishing of Internal Peace, Order, and Economy and Security from External Enemies."

For the next three months Burke devoted all his energies to the task of properly arming and equipping the North Carolina troops. He became involved in a disagreement in regard to executive power with the Board of War, but notified them that he had the alternative of obeying the Constitution or the laws, and preferred the former, and that if he could not exercise the powers given him under the Constitution, he would immediately resign. This ended the discussion.

He spent most of the summer in Halifax, but early in September came to Hillsboro. When he reached there he heard that McNeill and Fanning were advancing with a large force against General Butler, who was on Haw River. Burke warned Butler, and the Tories were disappointed in the main object of their expedition. But they at once turned to Hillsboro, and, before daylight on September 12, 1781, captured the town. Burke was then residing on Queen street, at what is now the residence of Mrs. Edwin Heartt. The house was besieged, and Burke, believing that all would be massacred if they surrendered, decided to hold out as long as possible. After some hot firing, a British officer, brought up by Captain Reid, Burke's aid-de-camp, assured him of proper treatment and received his surrender. The jail was then opened and the town sacked. The party then set out for Wilmington. At Cane Creek they were attacked by the Whigs, who, if properly led, would have won a decisive victory. As it was, a drawn battle was the result. Colonel McNeill was killed and Fanning was wounded. A bit of contemporary doggerel on the subject is interesting:

"The Governor and Council in Hillsborough sought
To establish some new laws the Tories to stop.
They thought themselves safe and so went on with their show,
But the face of bold Fanning proved their overthrow.
We took Governor Burke with a sudden surprise,
As he sat on horseback and just ready to ride.
We took all their cannon and colors in town,
And formed our brave boys and marched out of town.
But the rebels waylaid us and gave us a broadside
That caused our brave Colonel to lie dead on his side.
The flower of our company was wounded full sore
'Twas Captain McNeill and two or three more."

Governor Burke was taken to Wilmington and kept as a prisoner of State for some time. From there, in October, he wrote to Willie Jones, giving a rather humorous account of his uncomfortable surroundings. He described his room as a grotto in winter and a hot-house in summer, and said it had, at first, utterly lacked furniture, but that later he had been given a bed and some other furniture by a Mr. William Campbell. He stated that, although he was not shut up in a seraglio, yet he was as difficult of access as his Majesty of Constantinople. The following extracts from his letter seem worthy of quotation:

"My pride if I have any, has this consolation that my most trifling movements are considered as dangerous to a Prince who is lord of so many brave battalions and so invincible a navy and such inexhaustible resources as his Majesty of Great Britain. And this perhaps it is, that has restored my good humor. I knew before that I was upon the axle-tree of the chariot but never thought that I made much of the surrounding dust. You will no doubt perceive I sometimes smile while I am writing, but I beg you not to conclude from thence that I am upon a bed of roses and that I may well stay there sometime longer. You know, Sir, that tho' I have some firmness, I have also much sensibility of spirit, that tho' the one enables me to bear, the other obliges me to feel my situation, and with peculiar poignancy, that restraint which prevents me from employing such talents as nature has given me, be they what they may, for the bringing to a complete and happy Issue the cause in which our country is engaged. You know me well enough to believe that I cannot lose sight of what I was, nor cease to compare it what I now am and what I have the prospect of being if this absurd and vexatious question [1] should be drawn to any length.

* * * * * * * * *

"I will not injure you by thinking it necessary to urge you to hasten my exchange. I will only add that the opinion my enemies entertain of my power of injuring them ought to have some weight with my country since I must be capable of serving her in proportion, but do not take this as a promise. I will be assured always to do my best, but the Enemy think me capable of more than I ever thought myself, altho' I am no pretender to humility, but enough in all conscience on such a subject."

[1] Governor Burke was here referring to the difficulties which were being put in the way of his exchange, and the question as to whether he was a prisoner of State or merely a prisoner of war.

From Wilmington Governor Burke was removed to Sullivan's Island, where he was closely confined. Burke at once wrote Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour, the commandant at Charleston, demanding an explanation of the difference between his treatment and that of the other prisoners. Colonel Balfour answered that he could make no decision, but offered to parole him to James Island. On November 6th Burke accepted the parole and went to James Island, where he was treated with consideration and respect. After he had been there for some time a number of refugees were sent there. They were of the lowest type, and outrage and crime at once became frequent. Many of them were from North Carolina, and Burke was to them an object of venomous hatred. He was often threatened, but at first made no complaint, hoping that he would soon be exchanged.

Finally a group at his quarters was fired on, and a man standing on one side of him was killed and one on the other wounded. Further violence was only prevented by a British officer who interfered. The next morning Burke wrote General Leslie, explaining the danger of his situation and requesting a parole within the American lines. No answer was made to the letter, nor was anything done for his safety. For sixteen days he waited, exposed always to great danger and finding it necessary to change his sleeping place constantly and secretly. Finally he was notified that General Leslie was prevented from keeping his promise of paroling him to North Carolina by Major Craig's making it a point that the governor should be kept as a subject of retaliation for the Tories in North Carolina, particularly Fanning. Governor Burke had seen a letter from Major Craig to Abner Nash, in which he said he would not hesitate to deliver to those who were in arms for the King such prisoners as would most gratify them in their sentiments of revenge. After thinking over the treatment he had received, and remembering how James Island was regarded with horror in Charleston, even by the British, he decided that he had been exposed intentionally to the dangers of the place. Nor can the impartial student of the facts in the case fail to arrive at a similar conclusion.

After long reflection, he decided that as a parole was given in exchange for protection, failure to protect a prisoner would have the effect of releasing him from his parole. He then decided to make his escape, and wrote a letter to North Carolina, asking that the laws might be executed against the Tories, regardless of him. Finally, on January 16, 1782, he made good his escape and at once went to General Greene's headquarters. From there, at the advice of General Greene, he wrote to General Leslie, informing him of his escape. He said at the close:

"But though I carried this resolution to escape into effect, I do not thereby intend to deprive you of the advantages which my capture, by the rights of war, entitle you to. I purpose returning to my Government, and there to expect an answer from you to the following proposition:

"I will endeavor to procure for you a just and reasonable equivalent in exchange for me, or if this cannot be effected, I will return within your lines on parole, provided you will pledge your honor that I shall not be treated in any manner different from the officers of the Continental Army when prisoners of War."

No answer was returned, and Governor Burke, who had gone to Halifax, North Carolina, where his wife had been during his captivity, notified General Greene that he would wait no longer than April 1st before assuming the reins of government. This was his most fatal mistake, but there were many reasons to cause him to make it. When he left Greene's headquarters it was with the avowed intention of having nothing to do with political affairs. He expected to find the General Assembly in session at Salem and to resign to them his office. But it did not meet, and Governor Burke decided to go to some other State in order not to embarrass the acting Governor. But Alexander Martin, the Speaker of the Senate, reminded him that the office of Speaker would expire at the next general election, and that the State would be left without an executive head. So Burke, fearing that confusion and injury to the affairs of the State would result, decided to undertake again, and at once, the duties of his office, comforting himself by coming to the conclusion that it was not unjustifiable unless his escape was equally so, which he declined to concede.

In the meantime General Leslie had written to General Greene that the reasons Burke had advanced were so chimerical that he could not give them the smallest credit, and expressing the belief that General Greene would at once direct Burke to deliver himself up to the commissary of prisoners at Charleston, where he would be assured of every protection. General Greene replied that while he could not justify the breaking of a parole, he could not agree with him in regard to Governor Burke's reason for doing so, stating that Colonel Washington had said that he would prefer a dungeon to going on parole to James Island. He desired to know in what light Governor Burke was regarded—whether as a prisoner of war or of state.

As might be expected, criticism was at once aroused by Burke's action. Col. William R. Davie wrote him in February from Salisbury that Colonel Williams, who had lately come from Greene's headquarters, had stated that Greene and his officers believed that his conduct was reprehensible and dishonorable to the State, and that the enemy still had a claim on him. He advised Burke to take some measures for his justification, at the same time offering his services in the matter. Governor Burke at once wrote General Greene, stating what had been said and thanking him for his efforts to procure an exchange. At the same time he informed him that he would not feel bound to consent to any arrangement which provided for his return, as he had decided that if General Leslie did not answer him he was done with him, and that if he (General Leslie) asked anything unreasonable he would not feel bound to accede.

On March 18th, on learning that Burke had resumed the duties of his office, Greene wrote him, expressing his regret that he had done so, and informing him that all attempts at exchange had proved futile. On April 8th he again wrote him, denying that Colonel Williams had any authority to make the statements concerning Burke. In his letter he shows that he thought Burke's escape justifiable, though he said on another occasion that his idea of the sacredness of a parole was such that he would sooner have abided the consequences than left the enemy's lines. Burke had already written to Colonel Williams, accusing him of misrepresentation. His letter shows traces of the bitterness which was already rising within him at the general misunderstanding and disapproval of his course. April 12th he wrote Greene that the enemy placed a higher value upon him than his own country did, but that he was fast preparing to take a final leave of all public business. Greene replied, expressing sympathy for his hard case, and closing the personal part of his letter with these words of advice:

"If the people intend to treat you with ingratitude, I am sorry for it. Much is due to your zeal and ability and as far as I am acquainted with the people of your State, they think your captivity a very great misfortune. I beg you will not copy the example of many other great men who have gone before you, refuse your services because the people appear at the time to be insensible of their importance. We all have our dark days. No man has been under greater censure and reproach than myself; but I was always determined to persevere to the end in the persuasion that the public would be just at last."

The General Assembly met on April 16, 1782. Governor Burke, in his message, gave the members a full account of the circumstances of his capture and escape. On April 23d, when the election of Governor came up, he was placed in nomination. He at once wrote the Assembly, in part, as follows:

"This afternoon is appointed for the Election of a Governor, and I am in nomination. Permit me to say it was my wish that the several Intimations I have given the General Assembly might have prevented any Gentleman from naming me as a candidate for an office which I sincerely wish to be filled by a much abler man, or by any man rather than myself. When the General Assembly did me the honor to make choice of me for their Chief magistrate, tho' nothing could be more injurious to me or repugnant to my inclinations, I accepted the trust because I was apprehensive that declining it would be construed into a doubt of our success, which at a time when our prospects were overcast, might have had bad Consequences. Happily that reason no longer exists, and I do not now feel the necessity of sacrificing my time and Industry which are absolutely necessary to retrieve my private affairs from the ruin in which my being constantly employed in public Service for several years has very nearly involved them. My misfortunes during this year have been heavy and complicated and have involved me in debts and in private distresses which it would be painful to particularize. I hope it may be sufficient to say that it will require the best exertions of my Industry to Extricate me from them."

The General Assembly at once passed a resolution of thanks to Burke for his services as Governor, and elected Alexander Martin to succeed him.

Burke was notified on October 25th of his exchange. The following extract from General Greene's letter is interesting, particularly when Burke's States' Rights views are remembered:

"That you can retire from public life with honor I never had a doubt, but I am by no means satisfied that you should. Your State, and indeed all the Southern States, require many singularities and improvements to render civil government perfect. Few men have the necessary abilities and still fewer a proper degree of industry to effect it. Many improvements are also wanting in the plan of Confederation and national government. Those characters who have long been in Congress and have had their views and ideas enlarged and their minds unfettered from local attachments and directed to National policy are the only men fit for this undertaking. Unless our governments are rendered more perfect and our Union more complete I fear we shall feel but in a negative way the blessings we expected from Independence. Think not therefore of retiring too soon. Private interest has its advantages and domestic ease its charms; but the glory of establishing a great empire is a noble object and worthy of great sacrifices, and that you may think on the matter with perfect freedom and independence, I have the pleasure to inform you of your exchange."

Burke seems to have been approached in regard to removing to Georgia, but the plan did not suit him and he declined to consider it. There was much criticism of his conduct in the State, and, while he still had the confidence and friendship of men like Davie, Johnston, Hooper, Iredell and McClaine, the reproach of others, which he felt to be undeserved and ungrateful, rankled. With his capacity for making warm friends, he had its usual accompaniment—the capacity for making bitter enemies, and these were very active. Burke's was a most sensitive nature, and the accusations which affected his honor were more than he could bear. He seems to have given himself over to dissipation, and died, December 2, 1783, at Tyaquin. His body rests in a grave, unmarked save for a heap of stones, in a grove on his old plantation.

He had only one child, a daughter, named Mary, who, after teaching for many years in Hillsboro, moved to Alabama, and died there, unmarried, after the close of the Civil War. His wife, a few years after his death, married a Major Dogherty. Of this marriage there are numerous descendants.

Taking into consideration all the known facts of his history, Burke is one of the most interesting and certainly the most pitiful figure in North Carolina history. That he made a mistake in violating his parole and then assuming the reins of government is undeniable, but it cannot be believed that his conscience was otherwise than free of guilt in the matter. Further than this, it must be believed that he was actuated by the motives of purest patriotism.

Burke's personality seems to have been particularly attractive. In person he was of middle stature, well formed, with his face much marked with smallpox, which had caused the loss of his left eye. In spite of this, it is said that his face was not without charm. His remaining eye was blue and very expressive. He was very convivial, a capital raconteur, sang a good song, and, without effort, wrote verses, of which many are preserved, that, while possibly as good as the generality, even a partial critic could not adjudge of much merit. Most of them are addressed by him to some fair Chloe or Phyllis, for he was inclined to be very gallant. But the following is of a different kind. Two passages—one to Pitt and the other to the ladies—are quoted:

"Triumph America! Thy patriot voice
Has made the greatest of mankind rejoice,
Immortal Pitt, an everglorious name!
Far, far unequalled in the Rolls of Fame,
What Breast (for Virtue is by all approved
And Freedom even by Asia's slaves beloved)
What Breast but glows with Gratitude to Thee, Boast of Mankind, great Prop of Liberty."

* * * * * * * * *

"And you, ye fair, on whom our hopes depend
Our future Fame and Empire to Extend,
Whose Fruitful Beds shall dauntless Myriads yield
To Fight for Freedom in some Future Field
Resign each dear.
To-day let gladness beam in every face,
Soften each Smile and Brighten every Grace,
While the glad roof with lofty notes resound,
With Grace Harmonious move the Mazy Round;
Make our Hearts feel the long forgetted Fire,
Wake into Flame each spark of soft Desire;
Too long Indignant Tumults and Alarms
Have made us heedless of your lovely Charms;
With Freedom blest, our care will be to please,
Each day the genial pleasure to improve
And add new Sweetness to Connubial Love."

These qualities, as may be imagined, coupled with a genial and frank manner and great cordiality, won for him numerous friends. He was of an ardent temperament and was frequently betrayed into rash acts. Ready to resent any fancied insult, he was equally ready to atone for any wrong he might commit. He was probably the most versatile of the men of his time in North Carolina.

Mention has already been made of his quarrel with General Sullivan. He also became involved in a difficulty with Richard Henry Lee, which would probably have resulted in a duel but for the intervention of General Wayne, who settled the difficulty, which was one of misunderstanding.

Burke was a Roman Catholic, but there seems to have been no question of his right to hold office. His case was quoted in the Convention of 1835 as proof that there was no intent to bar Roman Catholics from office.

He was a man of good education, as is shown by his letters. The following catalogue of his library, an unusually good one for the time, is somewhat indicative of his tastes:

Piere Williams' Reports, Atkyns' Reports, Burrows' Reports, Brown's Abridgment, Raymond's Reports, Carthew's Reports, Gilbert's Reports, Finch's Reports, Nay's Reports, Salmon's Abridgment of State Trials, Shower's Cases in Parliament, Treatise on Equity, Dalton's Justice, Dawson's Origin of Law, Abridgment of Cases in Equity, Lillie's Entries, Coke's Institutes, Laws of North Carolina (two volumes), Jacobs' Dictionary, Cases in Chancery, Blackstone's Commentaries, Sidney on Government, Abbe DuBois' Critical Reflections, Ferguson on Civil Society, Attorneys' Practice in Civil Pleas, Law of Devises, etc., Moley's Maritime Law, Law of Evidence, B. G., Gilbert's History and Practice of Civil Actions, Collection of Statutes, Foster's Law of Trade, Bacon's Law Tracts, Law of Errors, Lutwyche's Reports (Abridged), Law of Trespass, Foster's Crown Law, Lord Francis' Principles of Equity, Wilson's Reports, Hubbart's (sic) Reports, Hale's Pleas of the Crown, Shower's Cases in Parliament, Cases in Chancery, Coke's Reports, Robertson's Lexicon, Boyer's French and English Dictionary, Dormat's Civil Law, Lord Littleton's Works, Political Disquisitions, Smellger's Midwifery, Gibson's Surveying; 2d, 3d and 5th volumes of Pope's Iliad; 1st and 5th of the Odyssey, Pope's Essays, Euclid's Elements, Locke's Human Understanding, Orrery's Pliny, Littleton's Henry II, Beattie's Essay on Truth, Robertson's History of Charles V, Vergil, Horace, Terence, Juvenal, Cicero's Orations, and Cæsar's Commentaries.

As to his ability, it was undoubtedly equal to that of any of his contemporaries. His whole course as a public man would indicate that, without the testimony of men well qualified to judge. Samuel Strudwick said he was "the ablest advocate and completest orator our country affords." Abner Nash, his predecessor as Governor, said he was "a gentleman of activity, experience and ability and public spirit." Richard Henderson wrote Judge John Williams in 1778 regarding Dr. Burke's conduct of the case of the Transylvania Company before the Virginia Assembly: "It is universally given up on all hands that Mr. Burke did Justice to the Cause, and, for my own part, think we could not have been better served on or off the Continent."

Taking him as he was, with all his faults and mistakes, and they were comparatively few, he deserves honor and grateful remembrance from North Carolinians.

Authorities: State Records, X–XVII, Encyclopædia of American Biography, The University Magazine, Carruthers, Old North State in 1776, McRee, Life and Letters of James Iredell, and certain unpublished records of Orange county.

The writer also wishes to acknowledge his indebtedness to Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood's sketch of Governor Burke in the Biographical History of North Carolina, and to Mr. Francis Nash for much material relating to Burke, and for numerous suggestions in regard to this paper.

COLONIAL AND REVOLUTIONARY RELICS IN THE HALL OF HISTORY.

BY COL. FRED A. OLDS.

The development of literary activity in North Carolina during the past five years has been accompanied by the ripening of a taste for historical research and for the collection of matter bearing upon the history of North Carolina—not only documents, but the more tangible and personal things which have gone to form the history of the State, and which, more than aught else, put the people of this day and generation in touch with those of the olden time. Thus it has come about that the "Hall of History" has taken its place very firmly as a feature of historical development—one of those outward and visible signs which indicate a great movement, and which is full of hope and promise of yet greater things to come. When the agricultural building was enlarged it was decided, at the request of this writer, to build a noble room especially for the proper display of those objects which bear directly upon the history of the State, and on the 15th of December, 1902, the work of installation began, the writer having been engaged since 1885 in collecting, always hoping that such a place for historical objects would be sooner or later provided. North Carolina is yet rich in such objects, notably of the Colonial and Revolutionary period; but until this collection began, a little over three years ago, nothing had been done, except in what may be termed very justly a local way, to gather together such objects. By such failure the State has suffered enormous loss, due to the burning of courthouses, public buildings, and, most of all, private homes, in some of which there were extensive groups of objects, the loss of which is irreparable. But at last the gathering together at Raleigh, where by all manner of means the collection ought to be, has been begun, and the fact that the number of objects now exceeds the 4,000 mark shows not only zeal in collecting, but also an awakened public interest. It must be borne in mind that collecting is no easy matter, since, first, there must be obtained knowledge of the existence of particular objects; next, of their location and ownership; then coming the work of getting in touch with the owners and securing the objects, as loans or gifts—their acquisition by either of these methods being desirable at the earliest possible moment, since losses by the failure to acquire them are occurring all the while. It is felt that the present Hall of History is what may truly be termed a stepping-stone to higher things; in other words, that it is but a forerunner of a far more noble one, generous as to space, and built on the most modern lines as regards the elimination of risk by fire. Given such a building, and the writer can undertake to secure almost everything in North Carolina; only relatively few persons being unwilling to place objects in such safe-keeping. Of course there are a few who hide their treasures away, "under a bushel," so to speak, instead of letting them be set broad and fair before all the world to instruct and to stimulate the people of their State who pour through the great North Carolina Museum by so many thousands every year.

The task of telling a story about a collection so great and with so wide a scope as the one here presents no little difficulty, since if there be too much detail it is very apt to degenerate into a sort of catalogue; and so it will be the effort now to touch only upon those salient things which stand out and which ought to be seen, as taking a place in the State's history from the remotest time of which there are white men's records.

In another room will be found the relics of the Indians, since it is extremely difficult to locate the period of the latter; the making of weapons of war, and the chase, as well as various other Indian articles of domestic use, sport, etc., having been continued until a comparatively recent period. The story, therefore, as told by the objects in the Hall of History, begins with the coming of the white men, those daring voyagers who, sent out by the great Raleigh, crossed the sea and landed on the Isle of Roanoke. The story of this landing of the whites themselves, and the Indians, is set before the visitor in a wonderful series of pictures, photographic reproductions of the engravings on copper in the 1590 edition of DeBry's book, the first to contain the pictures, from the drawings made by John White, the special artist sent over with the expedition of 1585. A map in this series of twenty-four pictures shows the English vessels and also one of their small boats going to the Isle of Roanoke, with an Englishman holding up a cross in the bow of the boat, which is nearing the island on which is the Indian town, with its palisade or stockade of sharpened timbers, this seeming to occupy a spot very near that on which the Englishmen built their first fort in what is now the United States, this being "Fort Raleigh," which is wonderfully preserved, and of which a map, photographs and a painting are also shown. Among the objects in the cases are ballast brought over by the English vessels and thrown out at a point on Roanoke Island yet known as "Ballast Point," and charcoal which was dug up a few years ago when the excavation was made for the monument to Virginia Dare, which now stands in the center of the venerable earthwork, and of which there are also special pictures. When the writer was at the fort last January, soundings were made with slender steel rods all over the place. The well which the colonists used was by this means located. No objects were found, and it was discovered that for perhaps much more than a century the ground, both within and without the fort, had been again and again the object of curiosity to relic or treasure seekers. Gone are the tiny cannon which the colonists left there when they abandoned the fort, and which were seen somewhere about 1615, and only a low mound, like a star, marks the boundary of this most interesting of American fortifications. It is a neglected spot, the rude fence and ruder gateway having almost completely decayed. In any other State than this it would be marked in a splendid fashion, and it would be also a place of pilgrimage.

There is a long skip in white life in North Carolina after the abandonment of Roanoke, an intermission of almost three-quarters of a century. The next document bears upon a meeting held in what is now Perquimans County in 1684. Then there is a will of John Trueblood, of the Province of Albemarle, dated 1692, and this is interesting as showing that the style of handwriting had changed hardly at all from the date of the great days of Queen Elizabeth and the knightly Raleigh, that fosterer of adventure and promoter of daring deeds, to whom North Carolina owes so much. There are memorials of the oldest towns in North Carolina, the chief one being Bath, which was really founded about 1694, though its charter was not granted until eleven years later. Bath, as the picture shows, is unique in North Carolina, as being the one place at least where time has stood quite still. The pictures of the oldest church in the State and of the oldest residence, formerly known as "Government House," the chimney of which, the largest in the United States, was built for use as a fort, a place of refuge and defence, tell the story of the quaint village far better than any words. There are relics of the historic Blackbeard, or Teach, that bloodiest of all pirates along this coast, together with his pistol, a button from his coat, a brick from his house at Bath, and part of a wine bottle or flagon from which no doubt that roystering devil had drank deeply many a time and oft. There is an English coin from Bath, taken from a pit near Teach's house, in which some three thousand or more were found, this being of the reign of William and Mary and dated 1694, and there are other strange coins of that time, known as brass farthings, which were taken from the same hoard.

Some of the oldest papers are records of the Quakers, who got an early footing in eastern North Carolina, particularly in Perquimans, where there is yet quite a colony of these worthy people. A document of a singular character tells of one of the two recorded Spanish invasions of North Carolina, if these may be termed invasions—one being an attempt at the capture of Beaufort, and another an attempt upon old Brunswick, when it was the seat of government, on the Cape Fear river, below Wilmington. The document in question is a bill for looking after the wounded Spaniards who were taken at Beaufort, and part of it is for "physiking and dieting" them; the charges including quite a variety of food and drink. One of the most thrilling periods of North Carolina history was that of the Tuscarora war, in the days of brave old Governor Thomas Pollock, who, to be sure, with all his English courage, was well put to it to save his colony from what looked like almost sure extermination; and had not South Carolina come to his aid with whites and friendly Indians in great numbers, the Tuscaroras must needs have gotten the upper hand and have soon killed ten where they had slain one of the settlers. There is the treaty of peace between the whites on the one hand and the portion of the Tuscaroras headed by Tom Blount, who was declared to be the king of those most bloodthirsty of all red men in North Carolina. The treaty itself breathes cruelty in every line, though cruelty in that day meant safety. The text of the treaty is as follows:

"Preliminary articles in order to a Gen'l. Peace, had, made, concluded and agreed upon this 25th day of November, Anno Domini, 1712, between Tom Blunt, Saroona, Heunthanohnoh, Chountharuntshoe, Newoonttootsere, chief men of several of ye Tuskarora Townes for and on behalf of themselves and ye Townes of Eukurknornet, Rarookshee, Tostohant, Rauroota, Tarhunta, Keuta, Toherooka, Juninits, Consotoba, on ye one part and the Honble. Thos. Pollock, Esq., Presdt., of and ye rest of ye Councill for and on behalf of themselves and this Government of North Carolina on ye other part, Witnesseth:—

"Imprimis. The afs'd Great Men doe hereby covenant and agree to & with ye said Presdt. and Council that they shall and will with ye utmost Expedition and Dilligence make warr ag't. all ye Indyans belonging to ye Townes or Nations of Catachny, Cores, Nuse, Bare River and Pamlico and that they shall not nor will not give any Quarter to any male Indyan of those Townes or Nations above ye age of fourteen yeares and also that they shall and will sell off and dispose of all ye males under that age, and that further after they shall have destroy'd those Townes or soe soon as this Government shall think proper to require it, the said Great Men doe hereby promise to join ye English with soe many Men as may be thought proper to distroy and cutt off all Matchapungo Indyans.

"2dly. The afs'd. Great Men doe hereby covenant and agree that if in this Warr they shall take any armes which shall be proved to have been owned by ye English and taken away in ye late horrid massacre such arms shall be delivered to ye right owners thereof.

"3dly. It is hereby further agreed by said Great Men that they shall and will well and truly deliver up to ye English all ye white captives and horses that they shall find among ye Indyans.

"4thly. It is hereby further agreed by ye Great Men afs'd. that these Severall Townes of Tostochant, Rauroota, Tarhunta, Keutah, Toherooka, Junitis, Caunookehoe, nor any of ye Indyans belonging to them or either of them shall not nor will not hunt nor range among ye English plantations or stocks without leave or then above the number of three at one tyme, neither shall they clame any proprty in ye land on ye southside of Nuse caled Chatooka River nor below Catachny Creek on Neuse nor below Bare Creek at Not-Sha-Hun-Han-Rough on ye south side of Pamptico River.

"5thly. It is mutually agreed by and between all ye said parties to these presents that if any injurey shall hereafter be done on either side, upon complaints made to such persons as shall hereafter be appointed for that purpose, full satisfaction shall be made.

"6thly. The afs'd. Great Men doe hereby agree that from & after ye Ratification of a Gen'l. Peace they shall and will pay into this Government such a yearly Tribute as hereafter shall be agreed upon.

"7thly. The afs'd. Great Men doe hereby further agree that for ye full & true performance of all and every ye above articles on their part to be performed, ye several Townes of Tostehant, Rauroota, Tarhunta, Keuta, Toherooka, Juninits & Caurookehee shall bring in and deliver up to this Government at ye Honble. Col. Thos. Pollock's six of ye chiefest women and children from each Towne, for Hostages, by ye nexte full moons, provided that they doe not distroy ye Enemy afs'd. by that tyme.

"8thly. The said President & Councill doe hereby covenant and agree with ye Great Men afs'd. that upon the just and true performance of these articles the severall hostages afs'd. shall be well and truly delivered up againe and a free and open trade shal be had with said Indyans as existed formerly.

"Lastly, the afs'd. Great Men doe hereby agree that they will endeavor to bring in to some of their Townes alsoe Chauaneckquockenerook, Enuquner-called Johetaoin shrdluap uapapup called John Pagett, Ekehorquest called Lawson, Correuiena, called Barbar, Colsera, called Henry, Lyahe Oumskinneree, called Suarehooks, Touhquinanch, Erunvanhyne and Young Yyler, and send two Runners to Mr. Redding's Garrison, give there three Hoops, then show a white cloth for a signale in order to pilott such prsons as we shall think proper to send to see the operation done upon ye afs'd. murderers.

"In witness hereof the several parties to these presents have interchangeably sett their hands and seals the day and yeare first above written.

"TOM T. B. BLUNT,
"I. P. SAROONTA,
"H. HEUNSHANOHNAH,
"I. CHAUNTHARUNTSHOE,
"I. NEWOONTTOOTSERY,
"SAROONTHA HORUNTTOCKEN, absent.

There is also a map of the lands which the whites gave to Tom Blount in return for his co-operation with them, these lying in Bertie County, and to this day being known as the "Indian Woods." Surveyors in those days were generous, and when in later years it was found necessary to re-survey this tract, it was discovered that the area was more than thrice as great as originally stated. There are tomahawks, made of iron and evidently obtained from the Indian traders; that is, white men who sold guns, ammunition, tomahawks and, worst of all, "fire-water"—that is, whiskey—to the red men, and who aided more in debauching them than did the very worst Indians. The tomahawks show by their shape that they were for no peaceful purpose, far unlike the English hatchets, and their very lines seem to tell a story of those days of horror.

While DeBry's pictures were the first ever printed about North Carolina (then "Virginia"), it was a great many years before the colony printed its own first book, and this did not appear until 1752, being a compilation of the laws of the colony, printed by James Davis, the official printer, at New Bern. It was bound in yellow leather, and hence became known in common language as the "Yellow Jacket." The example of it shown is perfect. New Bern had then become a place of importance. It was the east which in those days was the real seat of life, progress, culture and development, since the colonial towns were necessarily along the streams or sounds or broad estuaries—places which could be easily reached by vessels from the other side of the ocean. The early settlers showed much judgment in their selection of sites for their towns, and to this day the site of old Bath will strike any person with a practical eye, by reason of its situation. Old Brunswick, Edenton, Hertford, Plymouth, New Bern and other points were all well chosen. The collection is rich in objects illustrating the colonial life in all of these.

Edenton remains the most interesting of all the towns in the State, from a colonial point of view, and the illustrations of it show that it ought to be a place of pilgrimage for the Colonial Dames and the Daughters of the Revolution as well, since there is a remarkable blending of life of the two periods in North Carolina.

The stately court-house, with a "spring floor" on the upper story, built for the special purpose of dancing, was modeled after assembly rooms in England, at such places as Bath and Tunbridge Wells. On this second floor is the Masonic Hall, with the chair in which Washington sat when master of the lodge of Masons at Alexandria, Va. Very beautiful pictures of "Hays," the great estate of the rich and powerful Samuel Johnston at Edenton, show this building to be one of the most beautiful of all existing country houses in America, and photographs which are wonderfully fine reproductions show some of the treasures of the library at this house, which has come down through a century and a half in such perfect condition. Of these treasures is the only known copy of the New Bern Gazette of June 16, 1775, containing the Mecklenburg Resolves of May 31, 1775, this paper having been sent to Richard Caswell, then a member of the Congress at Philadelphia, by Richard Cogdell, the chairman of the New Bern Committee of Safety, this letter saying, in part: "You will observe the Mecklenburg Resolves exceed all other committees or the Congress itself. I send you the paper in which they are inserted, and I hope this will soon come to hand." This letter is dated June 18th. These resolves did not appear in the Wilmington Mercury until a week after they had appeared in the New Bern Gazette. There are water-colors of the House with a Cupola, once the residence of Francis Corbin, Lord Granville's agent, and of the house where the patriotic women held the "tea party," and there are photographs of the former building and of the bronze tea-pot which Mr. Julian Wood has placed on the site of the tea-party house.

A pair of pistols of unique and striking form were the property of Capt. Hugh Waddell, and were carried by him in the expedition against the French and Indians in 1758, at which time the British troops and militia captured Fort DuQuesne, in Pennsylvania, and by the capture really broke the French power in the colonies. These weapons are perfectly preserved and have what are known as cannon barrels, because of their shape, tapering from breech to muzzle.

Recent acquisitions to the collection are portraits of the first Lords Proprietors, these being photographs, the gift of Mr. James Sprunt, of Wilmington, of the portraits in his private collection, which are copies made to his order of the originals, which are in libraries and private homes in England. They include King Charles and all of the first Proprietors except Sir John Colleton, whose portrait has never been found. There is the Earl of Craven, who gave his name to the county of that name; Hyde, who is yet paid a similar honor; that Berkeley who was the only one of the Lords Proprietors who came over to this side and whose stay here was marked by death and destruction, mainly the execution of Governor Drummond of Virginia and the burning of Jamestown, the next place settled after ill-fated Roanoke. There is Anthony Ashley Cooper, Sarl of Shaftesbury, who wrote the Habeas Corpus Act, and for whom Locke wrote his "Fundamental Constitutions," which was intended as a chart of laws for the government of the colony of North Carolina, and who himself made additions to that interesting document, which to be sure provided a most impracticable mode of government, hard to be even imagined in these latter days. There is a deed by the Lords Proprietors to George Burrington for the fisheries in North Carolina for the term of seven years, this being a striking document, of great size, on parchment, and bearing the autographs and seals of the gentlemen who then owned North Carolina. Later it came about that all of the Lords Proprietors except Granville surrendered their proprietorships. There are interesting documents signed by him and by his agents, one of whom was Francis Corbin of Edenton, whose house is yet perfectly preserved and who was visited by the "Regulators" and made to give bond that he would be just and true in his financial dealings with the people. There are also deeds signed by Nisbet, Granville's agent in the up-country, for lands granted to the United Brethren, otherwise the Moravians, whose headquarters were then and now are at Salem. There are royal seals, some weighing a quarter of a pound and of wax; bullet-moulds, button-moulds, candle-sticks, snuffers, pewter platters and plates, tuning forks and scores of other relics of the Colonial times. There are deeds and newspapers bearing the stamps used in collecting the stamp tax, which presently became so odious as to form one of the key-notes of the Revolutionary uprising. There are relics of the earliest Scotch settlement along the Cape Fear, with its center at Fayetteville, including wonderfully fine pictures of "Bonnie Prince Charlie" and his savior, the brave though unlucky Flora McDonald.

Very interesting indeed is the collection of maps of the State, dating from 1585, the most accurate of the early ones being that by Lawson, the Surveyor-General of this colony, which was made about 1708. An original edition of Lawson's history of the State is on view. This particular copy is a gift from President James Madison, to replace a much-prized one lost in the fire which destroyed the State capitol here in June, 1831.

Photographs of Edenton include the burial-place of a number of notables, among these governors Pollock and Eden, and the wife of Governor Edward Moseley, who is truly a lost governor, since no amount of search has so far availed to find his remains. Capt. Samuel A. Ashe, so well informed about all things North Carolinian, thinks that his grave is at Rocky Point, Pender County, and search will probably be made there. These remains of notables were gathered at various points and interred in this cemetery of old St. Paul's Church, Edenton.

There are many extremely fine examples of penmanship in the collection of colonials, and notable among these are maps or plots of lands, some of these going back to the time when the Roanoke River was known as the Morotoke or Morotuck. These maps show the origin of many of the present names. One of them shows the location of an Indian town, Tauhunta, which was on the Tau river, now known as the Tar.

Of the Regulators there are a number of relics, chief among these, perhaps, being the bell which they used for the double purpose of calling themselves together, having no drum, and also giving notice of the approach of the British. The bell has a very thin and peculiar tone, like a cow-bell. There is a pay-roll of the company commanded by Captain David Hart, of the Orange County Regiment, which served 70 days in what was then termed the "Insurrection." There is also a plan of the battlefield of Alamance, made on the spot by an engineer the day after the battle, and showing the positions of the militia under Governor Tryon and the Regulators.

But few old taverns yet remain in North Carolina, yet fortunately there is a very striking example at Hertford, the building being of wood, long and rambling, two-storied, with double portico its entire length, and this is excellently illustrated by photographs.

The most noted collection of letters in all North Carolina is unquestionably that of the Iredells, now in the possession of Col. Charles Earl Johnson, of Raleigh, this being very extensive and containing letters from practically every man in high public life in this colony and the others during the late colonial period and throughout the Revolution. Two cases of these documents are shown and there are some striking relics among these, one a proclamation by Governor Josiah Martin, who used on public documents his private seal instead of the State seal. There are other special cases, containing the documents of the Devereux family, which go back to the time of Governor Pollock; documents, rare books, etc., collected by Bishop Joseph Blount Cheshire, and the very important collection of autograph letters made by Governor Swain while in office, this being of documents from the executive office, and covering not only the Colonial period but the Revolutionary, and coming down to a later date.

The period during the Revolution, when North Carolina was what may be termed an independent commonwealth, is illustrated by various articles, but certainly by none more striking than the currency issued by authority of congress at Halifax, April 2, 1776. This money is excellently well printed, the plates having been made on copper, and the designs are striking, being in sharp contrast with money issued a little later. Very perfect copies of the journals of two of the most notable State conventions are on view; one, that held at Hillsboro in 1788, which declined to ratify the Federal Constitution; the other, that at Fayetteville the following year, which ratified that great document. The "Resolves" of the Committee of Safety of Surry County and of Tryon County are unique as showing on their face that there was great loyalty to the King, while there was the sternest opposition to the policy of oppression practiced upon the colonies by England. The Surry County resolves, exquisitely written, bear in graceful design upon the cover the inscription, "Liberty or death. God save the King."

Mention has been made of the Johnson collection, covering a number of Iredell documents. A special case in this collection is devoted to the portraits of Colonial and Revolutionary celebrities, including Willie (or Wiley) and Allen Jones, the former of whom was to exercise a remarkable influence upon John Paul Jones, the first admiral of the United States Navy, the patronage and affection shown by Willie Jones having led John Paul to add Jones to his name and to show in many other ways his regard for the great and warm-hearted North Carolinian who had done so much for him. There is in the Swain collection a characteristic note written by the Chevalier Paul Jones, while in Paris, to a friend, desiring a copy of the Constitution of North Carolina to be shown to a gentleman in high favor at the French court. The collection of portraits is mostly composed of etchings, and upon the borders of some of these Mrs. Robertson, a daughter of the late Col. Cadwallader Jones, has painted in colors the family arms, she being the official painter to both the Colonial Dames and the Daughters of the American Revolution in the United States. The collection embraces portraits of the three signers of the Federal Declaration of Independence at Philadelphia—Hooper, Hewes and Penn—and there are various other memorials of these worthies.

The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, claimed by some to have been made on the 20th day of May, 1775, and by others to have been made (in the shape of what have been known as the Resolves) May 31, 1775, is a disputed point in North Carolina. The evidence as to the 31st is beyond any human question. There is a special collection of autographs of Hezekiah Alexander and others, whom it is asserted signed the Declaration of May 20th. As has already been stated, the Resolves of May 31st appear in the New Bern Gazette of date sixteen days later, and also in the Charleston Gazette, the latter paper having been sent to England, and the most obnoxious of the Resolves having been marked by the royal governor, the original of this particular paper being in the British archives, but the photographic copy being of the precise size and very clear.

Of the Revolutionary period proper there are over four hundred relics, among these some of Richard Caswell, the first governor under American rule, being naturally prominent, including a cup and saucer made in France for him, while there are particularly valuable documents bearing his autograph and the State seal of the time.

As has been stated, it is difficult to draw the line between the Colonial and the Revolutionary periods, so much do these blend in certain respects. Thus there are shown superb copies of the Bible and Prayer Book of the Church of England, both royal gifts from King George III. to the vestry of Christ Church in the good town of New Bern, when it was the capital of the State. These books were in continuous use in the church until a comparatively recent period. The "Palace" of Governor Tryon, at New Bern, built at what was considered a vast expense in those days, is illustrated by a very old wood-cut. This building did not a little part to fan the flame of unrest of the "Regulators." They harped upon it, and not a few of the colonists objected to paying taxes because of the fact that their money was going towards paying for this edifice, which provoked both their contempt and their hatred. It was the boast of Tryon that the building was to be the handsomest in the southern colonies if not in the whole country. Of it but a wing remains, long used as a stable, but now as a private residence.

There is a "letter of orders" from the Bishop of London (Compton), authorizing the holding of services in the Colony by a clergyman. There is money issued at a number of points in the State prior to the Revolution and during that period. Some of the colonial currency is what was known as "Proclamation Money," and the enormous depreciation of the revolutionary currency is shown by the fact that in a bill rendered in 1786 iron is quoted at four pounds, English money, the pound; sugar 12 pounds, pepper 90 pounds, rum 165 pounds a gallon, a glass tumbler 75 pounds. This bill, by the way, is for a total of over 1,500 pounds, and two of its entries are in these strange words: "By spirits rum drank at my father's funeral, 45 pounds." "A difference of seven pounds; so near a balance that a drink of grogg settles it." Of the money issued during the Revolution some was emitted at Hillsboro, some at New Bern, and some at Smithfield and Fayetteville. There is a journal of the Provincial Congress at Halifax, April, 1776. Some of the bills issued by the Provincial Congress at Hillsboro, August 21, 1775, are signed by Richard Caswell and Samuel Johnston. There is a printed order, dated at Johnston Court-House, December 24, 1775, signed by Cornelius Harnett, the president of the council. Another document which shows how stirring were the times is a letter from the Wilmington Committee of Safety, or Committee of Intelligence, as it was termed, to the New Bern committee, signed by Cornelius Harnett and others, dated July 2, 1775.

In striking contrast to the bell used by the Regulators, so thin in material and in tone as well, is a great hand-bell which was used by Governor Tryon at the "Palace" and later by the provincial assembly and by Governor Caswell. It is deep in tone, rotund and heavy.

The wearing apparel of the blended periods is shown, and from it, certainly as to the shoes, we learn that our grandmothers were addicted to high heels and the most papery of slippers, with toes so pointed as to put to blush any modern creations. There are buckles of paste and other gewgaws of the time, and from these relics of the gay days of old there floats out like incense the subtle yet pervasive odor of sandalwood, since my lady of those far-away days must needs have a case of this wood in her boudoir, to contain some at least of her fripperies. What tales of dancing days, of the stately old assemblies, the graceful if slow minuet, of hoops so great as to render the curled darlings of the time unapproachable to caresses unless they bent over like a tree in a storm; with towering headdresses, tier upon tier, hair and feathers, with powder galore, and the faces, fair enough, disfigured by rouge and beauty-spots most cunningly placed. There are combs of tortoise-shell most daintily carved, which were a fad in those days, and one of these was worn by a lady, herself a member of a great family, who it is said was for a number of years engaged to one of the signers of the National Declaration of Independence and who yet never became his bride. Soon after her death he died, brokenhearted.

There are more humble articles of domestic use, including a foot-warmer, in those days thought to be a necessity for those who went abroad in vehicles; lamps, made in some cases by a native blacksmith, to contain lard and twisted wicks of cotton; some being in rude imitation of ancient Greek and Roman lamps; flax-hackles, linen cloth, spun and woven by the good house-keepers of that time, cotton not being in much favor then, some of this cloth having been made by Mary Slocumb, a revolutionary heroine; pins made in rudest fashion, the head being twisted around the shank and rudely soldered.

There are Revolutionary warrants which were issued by the State to soldiers as pay, and there are also warrants which the State issued for considerable sums, one being for $7,500; this particular one being endorsed as having been "Rejected by the United States in 1791, upon presentation on loan." There is the roster of the North Carolina troops who served in the Continental line, some of whom had such hard fortune in falling into the hands of the British at the capture of Charleston.

Written school-books are another evidence of the hardships of those early days, one being an arithmetic written with great skill and at infinite labor and showing large numbers of examples under all the various heads.

The early Moravian life, from the first settlement by the United Brethren of the region round about Salem, is illustrated in various ways, and a catechism printed in Germany for use by the Brethren in North Carolina is quite unique.

The illustrations of Colonial and Revolutionary architecture are both numerous and varied. Happily a number of the older buildings, which have escaped the usual fate of destruction by fire, have not been tampered with. Some have been destroyed by fire and some torn down. There are some iconoclasts in North Carolina, and these do not spare upon occasion. Some of the handsome structures on the great estates in the eastern counties have been destroyed or so changed as to be unrecognizable, while the noble groves around others have been cut down and sold. In other ways iconoclasts have shown what they can do. The church at Bath is a pitiful example. The old windows were recently taken out, the antique high pews removed and the tiled floor except the aisle; the lofty pulpit with its shell-shaped sounding-board was carted off as rubbish, and now unsightly modern benches fill the church, the pulpit is something of the commonest, while the windows are those vari-colored abominations which one can see in any cheap new church here and there in the little towns and sometimes in the country. Over the front of this striking old building is a brown-stone slab containing date of erection, etc. This, too, was removed, and some relic-hunter took it up to Washington, N. C., where luckily it was found on a hotel counter and given to a lady of the place, who took it to Bath and had it replaced where it belonged. This is only one story out of many. The enlarged and very striking picture of the church at Bath shows it as it is to-day.

Among the Revolutionary autographs will be found those of generals Wayne, Lincoln, Davidson, Greene, Nash and Davie. The fact developed upon inspection of these that General Davidson sometimes signed his name simply William Davidson and sometimes William L. Davidson. Of Davie, who was so eminent in civil life, there are very interesting memorials, one of these being his appointment as an envoy extraordinary to France, his letter of credit issued by that country, and also a note from Citizen Joseph Bonaparte, expressing his appreciation of a call by Davie during the Frenchman's illness.

The Revolutionary battlegrounds are being illustrated. The picture-story of that at Guilford Court-House is very complete and impressive. It has the honor of being the best marked of all the Revolutionary battlegrounds, and this has been done to a large extent privately, though the State has aided somewhat by an annual appropriation. Pictures are to be made of the battlefield at Alamance and the monument there, and also of that at Moore's Creek, the latter being a battle which had a notable effect in cheering the patriots, having been the first success of the American arms in the struggle. Mention has been made of the Regulators and of the battle of Alamance. Of them and of this engagement there are two views in North Carolina, one being that the affair bore directly upon the Revolution and tended as much as anything else to precipitate the latter; the other view being that there was no connection between the two and that the Regulator movement was merely what some writer has termed "An uprising of peasants." The juster view seems to be that the affair did bear upon the Revolution, though in a somewhat indirect way, having perhaps as much connection with it as did John Brown's raid upon the Civil War—disconnected yet connected. Of King's Mountain, so important an engagement of the Revolution, there is not a single relic, strange to say, though there are several of these in the State and a number in other States, one or two being in the possession of the United States government. Of Revolutionary uniforms there is not an example, only the gloves of Benjamin Cleveland being shown. Of the weapons of the Revolutionary period there are a number of examples, including swords, pistols, and muskets. The most interesting of these is a musket of extremely fine workmanship, for that date, which was carried by a soldier in one of the Scotch regiments which was in the army of Lord Cornwallis, who fought at Guilford Court-house and then marched, or as we may say, retreated, to Wilmington. There this particular soldier was on duty when Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, and then he and his musket went together into what is now Robeson county and settled. The Revolutionary swords of home manufacture show what the native blacksmiths could do at that day, as their construction was not upon lines at all graceful, but solely for lethal purposes. The bullet-moulds are of the time when the women used to lend their hands and make the bullets, and when, upon occasion, they could shoot them, too.

One of the most interesting places in the State during the Revolution was Hillsboro, a small town but containing noted men and being much visited by those from the low-country, being considered much in the west at that time, before the mountains became civilized enough for resort. Hillsboro has, until recently, preserved a number of its old examples of architecture, and its streets, paved with cobblestones, were reminders of the days when Cornwallis sojourned there and of that yet earlier period when Tryon paid the place visits. It is most unfortunate that illustrations were not made years ago of such places as Hillsboro, as now but few striking features remain. One of these is the court-house, in the belfry of which are a clock and bell, the gifts of King George III., who seems to have had much regard for the town, which was named in honor of the Earl of Hillsboro, while the county bears what may be termed a royal name, in honor of that Dutch King who came over and saved England at so critical a time. There is a picture of the court-house and some other views of places of note. There is luckily a picture, the only one known, of the building at Fayetteville, long destroyed, where the convention met which ratified the constitution.

These pictures are found to tell the stories as well as direct objects and this process of illustration is to continue until every part of the State which is historical is covered. The writer last January made the first tour for the express purpose of gathering historical objects of any and all periods. This was in what may be termed in the footsteps of the pioneers, embracing Fayetteville, Wilmington, Southport, New Bern, Washington, Bath, Plymouth, Hertford, Elizabeth City, Edenton and Roanoke Island. It was a resultful tour, as no fewer than four hundred objects were collected, in addition to more than one hundred photographs, most of the latter being originals made by special order. The result is that there is to-day more knowledge by the mass of the people as to the fine old towns in the early settled parts of the State than ever before. There pass through the State Museum and the Hall of History each year more than 100,000 visitors, representing nearly every county in North Carolina and a large number of other States. The interest in the historical collection is not local, not confined to Raleigh or North Carolina, but is widespread and some acquisitions to the collection come from persons from other States, who thus show their appreciation of the work of preservation which is being so earnestly pressed. One of the facts which is very plain is the influence which North Carolina has had upon other parts of the country in settlement and otherwise, notably in the great middle-west. Visitors from that part of the country manifest the keenest interest in the Colonial and Revolutionary objects in view, and there are students of those periods who are availing themselves of the Hall of History as a medium of information. To show the scope of the collection already, it may be stated that books are being illustrated by pictures made of the objects therein, notably readers and histories by such writers as Capt. Ashe, Prof. D. H. Hill and Prof. R. D. W. Connor. The photographs taken are not only of pictures, but of objects in every department. The Colonial Dames and the Daughters of the Revolution are frequent visitors to and close students of the exhibits which closely interest them, and they have been no small contributors, while their influence is regarded as of very high value by the writer. It is felt that more ought to be done in regard to the Revolutionary period. The fact that articles are equally available as loans or gifts should have its weight upon the public mind, and the Colonial Dames and the Daughters of the Revolution, so closely linked in their work, should see to it that the most notable objects in private collections should come here. There is in the Raleigh a picture of King George III, which is of deep historical interest. Upon its back these words are written with red chalk, "O, George! Hide thy face and mourn!" General Nathaniel Greene wrote those words himself, having turned the King's face to the wall in a house at Salisbury.

What has been written here is designed merely to show in a partial way what has been done in so brief a space, comparatively speaking, in forming North Carolina's first collection of historical objects. This much may be added, that no collection was ever made at so small an expense, the writer's work being solely that of a volunteer, and this very fact being an incentive of endeavor to make the collection as good and as complete as if it were the work of some paid specialist. Surely the people of North Carolina will give hearty co-operation, and will see to it, sooner or later, that every object which bears upon their colonial and State history comes here.

The oldest documents in North Carolina connected with the history of any family now living are those of the de Rossets at Wilmington, which reach well back into 1500, and are mainly commissions issued by the kings of France.

The writer, it may be said, keeps very closely in touch with the North Carolina Historical Commission, which by gift has placed a number of extremely interesting pictures in the Hall of History, and he has had these prepared under the auspices of the Commission. There is, of course, also close co-operation with the North Carolina Literary and Historical Association, as chairman of its Museum Committee. The co-operation of the North Carolina Department of Agriculture has been very thorough and generous; in fact, all the surroundings and influences have been such as to very greatly aid in facilitating the work.

It is proposed to make special tours through other portions of the State than the east, and to revisit that particular section also. Wherever such visits are made there are conferences with and addresses made to such bodies as the Colonial Dames and the other societies of ladies, and these have proved resultful in every case. It is found that the personal equation enters very largely into this matter. State pride and family pride go well together, and the time is arriving when the large hall, already so nearly filled, will be crowded. The facilities for caring for documents and any and all objects, of whatever material, are of the best, with cases which are moth-proof, dust-proof, and are also thoroughly guarded against any and all insects. The fact that the collection, of which only two departments are here treated of, is so wide in its scope is found to add to the general interest in it, since something is afforded for the student of any period. It has been a distinct inspiration to teachers, of whom more than twelve hundred visited it in a body during the present year. It is set before the Legislature as an object-lesson and as the very best and most practical way of showing that it is worthy of the most complete preservation.

THE N. C. SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION AND ITS OBJECTS.

BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT, REGENT.

The Society "Daughters of the Revolution" was founded by Mrs. Flora Adams Darling, October 11, 1890. It was organized August 20, 1891, and was duly incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose.

The occasion of its founding was to provide a society whose terms of membership should be based upon direct descent from Revolutionary ancestors, in which organization admission upon collateral claims would be impossible. This rule, clearly stated at time of organization, has been rigidly observed, and the Society is justly proud of its membership, representing as it does the direct descendants of soldiers and statesmen of the Revolution.

The distinctive feature of the government of the Society is its system of State Societies and local Chapters; the officers and Board of Managers of the General Society have entire superintendence and management of the whole organization, while subject to this oversight, State Societies regulate and direct their own affairs. A State Society may be organized wherever there are at least twenty members residing within the State, and a local Chapter may be formed by five members living in the same locality. The State membership includes all members of local Chapters formed in the State.

The objects of the Society as stated in the Constitution are: "To perpetuate the patriotic spirit of the men and women who achieved American Independence; to commemorate prominent events connected with the War of the Revolution; to collect, publish and preserve the rolls, records and historic documents relating to that period; to encourage the study of the country's history, and to promote sentiments of friendship and common interest among the members of the Society."

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY.

Founded by Mrs. Spier Whitaker, a lineal descendant of Wm. Hooper, a signer of the National Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, a biographical sketch of whose life by Mrs. Whitaker was published in the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET of July, 1905.

The North Carolina Society was organized in Raleigh, Oct. 19, 1896, the anniversary of the surrender of Cornwallis; and a Constitution and By-Laws adopted on April 6, 1897, its declaration upon honor being, that "if admitted to membership in this Society, I will endeavor to promote the purposes of its institution, and observe the Constitution and By-Laws."

MEMBERSHIP AND QUALIFICATIONS.

"Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, or a member of the Congress, Legislature or General Court of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence."

As will be seen, the watchword of the Society is "Patriotism." Love of Liberty, Home and Country is a heaven-born instinct not bounded by latitude or longitude, nor is it confined by wealth or position. It is imperative and should be absolutely understood in all social and official acts members should avoid all semblance of sectional feeling, or political or religious partisanship.

That such a society for women was needed is attested by its sure growth—its patriotic activity in marking Revolutionary sites, erecting monuments, the finding and preservation of records vital to the history of the Nation and which in many instances have been preserved from destruction through the efforts of patriotic Societies which had gained a knowledge of their value.

The North Carolina Society grew in strength of purpose, more than numerically. Their meetings were held on important anniversary days—valuable historical papers were read by members on the Revolutionary services of their ancestors, all of which are preserved in our archives.

In December, 1900, it was determined to take up some special work. At this meeting a very interesting account of the "Edenton Tea Party of October 25, 1774," by Dr. Richard Dillard of Edenton, was read, and the idea of commemorating in some tangible way this important event filled the minds of all present. It was then determined to erect a memorial to the heroism and patriotism of those women of the State who by their aid and zeal helped to make this country a free and independent Nation, thereby in a measure setting aside that ignorant prejudice which has hedged them in with such false ideas of their place and power, that the history of mothers, even of the greatest men, is not easy to obtain. As the eye of history is opening to the fact that some credit is due the women of the past for the success of the War of the Revolution, a motion then prevailed to erect in this State a memorial to the brave and patriotic women who organized and participated in the aforementioned "Edenton Tea Party of October 25, 1774," who met to endorse the "Resolves of the Provincial Deputies" in New Bern, August 25, 1774, "not to drink any more tea or wear any more British cloth" until the tax had been removed by Parliament from these foreign commodities.

On the reception of this news, obedient to the instinct of womanhood, ever ready to do her duty, a meeting was called to testify and put on record their adherence and co-operation in any movement for the peace and happiness of their country. Fifty-one ladies signed this document, an act which deserves an enduring monument.

Ways and means for the accomplishment of this purpose were discussed, and, on motion of Mrs. Helen Wills, a committee of the following ladies was appointed to consider the matter: Mrs. Walter Clark, Mrs. Hubert Haywood, Miss Martha Haywood, Miss Grace Bates and Mrs. Ivan Proctor. The committee reported at the next meeting that they would adopt a suggestion of Miss Martha Haywood to issue a monthly publication on great events in North Carolina history. The idea was adopted unanimously, and Miss Martha Haywood and Mrs. Hubert Haywood (nee Emily Benbury) volunteered to begin the enterprise. The treasury furnished means for issuing circulars, for postage, etc.

Through the indefatigable efforts and enthusiasm of our Regent, Mrs. Whitaker, and her associates, "The North Carolina Booklet" has become an assured success. The first number appeared in May, 1901, and consisted of a monograph by Maj. Graham Daves on Virginia Dare, she being the first English child born in America—"a fitting subject for a magazine issued under the auspices of the North Carolina Society 'Daughters of the Revolution,' edited by women, and the proceeds to memorialize the patriotism of women."

After two years of arduous labor freely given to the cause, the editors resigned and were succeeded by Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton and Mrs. E. E. Moffitt. For the first four years the Booklet was published as a monthly, beginning in May each year. In 1905 it was decided to issue it quarterly, and the first number of Volume V was issued in July of that year.

The subscription list continues to justify the publication, and the profits therefrom have brought to the treasury of the Society a creditable amount.

Having in bank a sufficient amount for the erection of the memorial, the accomplishment of its object has been delayed in order to secure historical evidence beyond contradiction, that the heroic act of these patriotic women really took place. A correct list of the names of those who signed the document has been obtained, through the continuous efforts of Mrs. Spier Whitaker, who in correspondence with Rev. H. S. Iredell, of Tunbridge Wells, England, secured a correct list from the "Morning Chronicle and London Advertiser of Monday, January 16, 1775"; and through Mr. R. T. H. Halsey, a member of the Grolier Club of New York, and author of a late work entitled "The Boston Port Bill as Pictured by a Contemporary Boston Cartoonist." Additional evidence has been obtained through Mr. Horner Winston, of Durham, N. C., now at Christ's College, Oxford, England, winner of the Cecil Rhodes scholarship. The plans are so far perfected as to insure the unveiling on the next anniversary.

The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution appeals to the patriotism of all descendants of those who will be commemorated, and of North Carolinians all over the United States, to co-operate in the work of "rescuing from oblivion the virtuous actions" of their ancestors, and with such encouragement and co-operation the BOOKLET will continue to succeed in its work for other patriotic purposes.

RICHARD DILLARD, M.D

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COLLECTED AND COMPILED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

DR. RICHARD DILLARD.

There needs no apology for presenting with this article the picture of Dr. Richard Dillard, the one who revived that incident in North Carolina history of the notable "Edenton Tea Party of October 25, 1774." His researches on the subject have been exhaustive and scholarly. As nearly all of the information regarding that important event has been derived directly or indirectly from his original researches, he may justly be called the "Reviver of the Edenton Tea Party" incident.

A monograph which he wrote on the subject in 1892 was so well received that it was republished in 1898. It was the reading of this article that inspired the "North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution" to memorialize in a fitting way the heroism and patriotism of representative women of the State preceding the stormy days of the Revolution. The desire to endorse the proceedings of the Provincial Congress took shape in the "Tea Party," and the resolves were signed by fifty-one ladies.*

Dr. Dillard, bachelor, born at "Farmers Delight," Nansemond County, Va., December 5, 1857, descended from the old cavalier stock, which early in our history had settled along the shores of the Albemarle; received literary education at University of North Carolina, 1875-'77; studied medicine at University of Virginia; graduated at Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, Pa., in 1879; since that time has been practicing at Edenton, N. C.

Many honors have been bestowed upon him by his State.

* American Archives, Vol. 1, p. 891.

Among these, the honorary degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon him by Rutherford College in 1899. He was appointed a member of the first Historical Commission by Governor Aycock; has contributed a number of historical papers to various magazines; was a contributor to the old Magazine of American History, so ably edited by Mrs. Martha J. Lamb, in which magazine appeared his article on the "Edenton Tea Party," and which reappeared in the BOOKLET in August, 1901. The original of the picture of this Tea Party was upon glass, and by some misadventure became mutilated and broken into several fragments. Dr. Dillard, in 1893, had the painting reproduced on canvass, and presented it to the State. He was also the owner of the only portrait in existence of Martin Ross, the celebrated evangelist, called the "St. Paul of North Carolina," which he presented last year through the venerable Dr. Hufham to Wake Forest College.

He is a member of the North Carolina Society "Sons of the Revolution," through the services of Col. John Campbell, who was a member of three Provincial Congresses, during and prior to the Revolution, to-wit, the one which met at New Bern in August, 1774, at Hillsboro in 1775, and at Halifax in spring of 1776. Is passionately fond of botany and flowers, and contributes to the "House and Garden Magazine."

He resides at his old home in Edenton, which he has fitted up elaborately and named "Beverly Hall," in honor of his mother.

His descent from his Revolutionary ancestor, Col. Campbell, is contained in the manuscript archives of the North Carolina Society "Sons of the Revolution."

FRANCIS NASH.

I. Francis Nash, born at Floral College, N. C., 1855. Son of Rev. Frederick K. Nash and Annie M. McLean. His father was a distinguished Presbyterian minister, who died in his early career.

II. Grandson of Chief Justice Frederick Nash and Mary G. Kollock, his wife—Frederick Nash was born in Tryon's Palace at New Bern during his father's incumbency of the gubernatorial office, February 19, 1781; he graduated from Princeton College in 1799; admitted to the Bar in 1801; married Miss Mary G. Pollock, of New Jersey, with whom he lived fifty-five years; he died in 1858, distinguished as legislator, jurist and orator of high rank, and a Christian gentleman. The controlling motive of his conduct through life was a sense of accountability to God.

III. Great grandson of Gov. Abner Nash, the able and active friend to the rights of the people, and a member of the Provincial Congress in 1774. Governor 1780; member Continental Congress 1781-1786; died 1786.

IV. Great grand nephew of Gen. Francis Nash, of Revolutionary fame.

I. Francis Nash, subject of this sketch, and a worthy descendant of the above, was left an orphan when a child, was reared by his aunts, the Misses Nash, of Hillsboro, educated at the school of Misses Nash and Kollock and the R. H. Graves schools. At sixteen he began life for himself as clerk; began study of law at night; clerk in law office of Judge George Howard, of Tarboro; obtained license 1877, and was given a partnership by Judge Howard; by reason of failing health resigned. After a year of rest in the country he resumed the practice of law in Tarboro; was elected Mayor; Presiding Justice of Inferior Court of Edgecombe County 1883; again became partner with Judge Howard, but his health again failing he retired from the practice for ten years.

Resumed practice in 1894 in Hillsboro; has filled for short terms U. S. Commissioner and Referee in Bankruptcy. He is a writer of ability. A series of papers on Judicial Evolution, published in Albany Law Journal 1890-1; "Belleville," 1897-8, a story of Reconstruction period; "The Mac Travis Sketches" in 1898; "A Lawyer's Mistake" in 1899; and "Wiolusing," a sequel to "Belleville," in 1900-1; "Hillsboro, Colonial and Revolutionary." For the "Biographical History," which is being published by Charles N. Van Noppen, he has written twenty-three sketches of the worthies of North Carolina. He wrote "Historic Hillsboro" for the August number of the "Booklet" in 1903. He has written many other legal, political and historical articles.

In 1879 he married Miss Jessie P. Baker, of Tarboro, N. C., who died 1896, leaving two daughters—one a teacher of English in Goldsboro High School, the other of Mathematics in the Lucy Cobb Institute, Athens, Georgia.

J. G. de ROULHAC HAMILTON, Ph.D.

J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, the author of this sketch, was born in Hillsboro, N. C., August 6, 1878. Was educated at the University of the South, Sewanee, Tenn., 1896-1900. Instructor at the celebrated Horner Military School, N. C., 1901-'02, student of Columbia University 1902-'04, Ph.D. 1906, Principal of Wilmington, N. C., High School 1904-'06, and now Associate Professor of History, University of N. C. Member of the American Historical Association, Southern History Association, N. C. Literary and Historical Association.

I. Son of Daniel Heyward Hamilton (Major of 13th N. C., C. S. A., later Adjutant 1st South Carolina); married Frances Gray Roulhac, on maternal side a granddaughter of Chief Justice Ruffin.

II. Grandson of Daniel Heyward Hamilton, of S. C.; member of S. C. Convention of 1851; Colonel 1st S. C. Regiment, C. S. A.; married Rebecca Middleton, a descendant of Mrs. Rebecca Motte, of Revolutionary fame, and relative of Arthur Middleton, the signer of the Declaration of Independence

III. Great grandson of James Hamilton; soldier of 1812; member S. C. Legislature; member of Congress; Governor of S. C.; President of Nullification Convention; Ambassador to the Court of St. James from the Republic of Texas; Senator-elect from Texas at death; married Elizabeth Heyward, a grand-daughter of Thos. Heyward, a signer of the Declaration of Independence.

IV. Great, great grandson of James Hamilton; Major in Continental line on Washington's staff; married Elizabeth Lynch, a sister of Thomas Lynch, Jr., the signer of the Declaration, and a daughter of Thos. Lynch, a member of the Continental Congress of 1776.

COL. FRED. A. OLDS.

Col. F. A. Olds began newspaper work in 1877 in Raleigh, and has been continuously in this profession ever since, having in 1886 become the correspondent of out-of-town papers and devoting himself to this line of work, writing considerably for magazines. For twenty years he has been collecting historical objects, and since December, 1902, has given much time, labor and study to the Hall of History. He is the Chairman of the Museum Committee of the North Carolina Literary and Historical Association and the Director of the Hall of History, and he also co-operates very heartily and extensively with the N. C. Historical Commission. He has written many historical articles and stories, which have been in most cases illustrated, and he edited a new edition of Lawson's History of North Carolina, which was published by the Charlotte Observer, and has prepared for publication a new edition of De Bry's edition of Hariot's narrative of the discovery of Roanoke Island. Last January Colonel Olds made a tour, which was extremely successful, of the older towns in Eastern North Carolina, in the interest of the historical collection, and will later visit other sections. By the co-operation of the citizens of North Carolina, Colonel Olds would be greatly aided in the work he has undertaken of collecting relics and documents vital to the interest of the State's history—besides making a place of general interest to the students of our city, and in fact to all visitors to the Hall of History.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Sixth Volume began in July, 1906.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second-class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kennedy.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury."
"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs. L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman, and E. Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M. D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II' William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700–1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor, "Edward Moseley," Prof. D. H. Hill.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok." Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, D. D.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, Single Booklets, 25 Cents Each.

Vols. V and VI, Single Booklets, 35 Cents Each.

NOW IS THE TIME TO
SUBSCRIBE TO THE

NORTH CAROLINA JOURNAL OF EDUCATION

Published twice each month at Durham, North Carolina, under the editorial supervision of Mr. E. C. Brooks, assisted by associate editors and numerous contributors.

SUBSCRIPTION, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR

Address all communications and make all remittances to H. E. SEEMAN, Publisher, Durham, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, Records of different States and Counties, family papers, State histories and biographies will be diligently examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced.

Fee for Such Researches, $5.20 for each Line Traced.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE WILLS,
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R. and Raleigh Circle Colonial Dames.)
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12 00
Same style and size, but unframed	10 00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet, lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arms, including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

JOHN C. DREWRY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

Mechanics and Investors Union

A Home Investment Company for Monthly Savings
A Home Loan Company, to Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money. It promotes economy, thrift and punctuality in business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 will mature a $100 Certificate. One hundred payments will secure a home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, Secretary, 22 Pullen Building.

Allen's Forty Lessons in Bookkeeping. Over 7,000 copies have been used in schools and colleges. Commended by teachers and business men. Price $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, Manager.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery

Aside from a large line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc., we will take care of your orders for RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS.

All orders given our personal attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.
RALEIGH, N. C.

SOUTHERN BOOK EXCHANGE

RALEIGH, N. C.

LARGEST STOCK, BEST SELECTED, LOWEST PRICES OF ANY BOOK STORE IN THE SOUTH.

Headquarters for North Carolina History and all classes of North Carolina Publications, including North Carolina Laws, Journals, Reports, of the Supreme Court and of all other State Departments; also Briefs, Documents, Records, and Catalogues of all Colleges since their foundations; Relics, Autographs, Letters, Plates, Coat of Arms, Stamps, Confederate Money, Coin, etc., 'Found no where else.' ¶ History of other States, Americana and all kinds of Rare Books out of print and valuable. All enquiries answered promptly. All orders given personal, careful attention, guaranteeing satisfaction, before remittance. ¶ Libraries handled on commission and best prices guaranteed. All kinds of books bought, sold and exchanged; best bargains ever offered Missing Nos. in files of all North Carolina Magazines and newspapers supplied at publishers prices; all other Magazines at a very low rate.

King-Crowell Drug Co.

THE MODERN DRUG STORE

Fayetteville and Hargett Sts. Raleigh, N. C.

BROWN

Funeral Directors and Embalmers

HARGETT AND SALISBURY STREETS

PLUMBING, HOT WATER HEATING, STEAM FITTING
SANITARY PLUMBING A SPECIALTY

W. A. Stunkel & Company

No. 13 West Hargett Street
RALEIGH, N. C.

Phones: Interstate, 576
Bell, 1502

Personal Attention Given
to All Work

Dr. ERNEST H. BROUGHTON

DENTIST

Associated with
DR. J. H. CRAWFORD

116 Fayetteville Street
RALEIGH, N. C.

The Mecklenburg Hotel

Chase City, Virginia,

IS AN IDEAL PLACE FOR

Health, Pleasure, Rest and Comfort All the Year Round

Because of What Nature, Science and Art

Have Done For It

ART has beautified and adorned it

SCIENCE has equipped it with the famous Baruch Baths and the most approved Sanitarium Appointments And

NATURE has done her best in the now famous Mineral Springs of Chloride Calcium, the only known water of its kind in this country or Europe; and of Lithia, containing many fine medicinal properties besides the amount of Lithia equal to any in existence, the combined use of which splendid waters effects wonderful cures in cases of Rheumatism, Eczema, Malarial Poison, Nervous Troubles and conditions showing presence of Uric Acid.

Voluntary Testimonials Received Constantly from our Guests.

These Waters for Sale by the Leading Druggists Everywhere

ESTABLISHED IN 1891

THE COMMERCIAL AND FARMERS BANK

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, . .	$100,000.00
Surplus, . . .	60,000.00
Deposits, . . .	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian.

Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent.

Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.

A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSON, Asst. Cashier.

THE

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City
It reaches the whole State
Largest circulation in North Carolina
The State's Representative Newspaper

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
Editor

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1900,	5,700 subscribers
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1901,	6,500 subscribers
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1902,	7,054 subscribers
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1903,	8,201 subscribers
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1904,	9,111 subscribers
1899,	5,200 subscribers	1905,	10,000 subscribers

North Carolina Historical Commission

ESTABLISHED BY LAWS OF 1903

MEMBERS

W. J. PEELE, Chairman, ...	Raleigh, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNOR, Secretary, . .	Raleigh, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES, ...	Raleigh, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER, ...	Chapel Hill, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT, ...	Roper, N. C.

THE Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured, arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners. The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in their efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State.

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30,000

A personal investigation will convince anyone that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

The Citizens National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

CORRESPONDENCE AND PERSONAL CALLS INVITED

Any Business Entrusted to our Care Will Receive Prompt and Courteous Attention

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
EDITOR N. C. BOOKLET,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

FOR

North Carolina Schools

White's Beginner's History of the United States

By Henry Alexander White, of Columbia, S. C.

In this interesting narrative, which is written on the biographical plan, special attention is paid to the acts of heroism and devotion of the men of the South.

Lee Readers

The best literature and the best thought of the South, prepared by an experienced Southern teacher.

The Rose Primer

Contains a small vocabulary, with carefully selected and graded matter and frequent reviews.

Spencer's Practical Writing

Teaches a plain practical hand' moderate in slant, and free from ornamental curves, shade, and meaningless lines.

Steps in English

Meet modern conditions in every respect, and teach the child how to express his thoughts in speaking and writing.

Milne's Arithmetics

Give the pupil an unusually thorough and practical knowledge of arithmetic and a readiness in applying this knowledge.

Natural Geographies

The most widely used series extant. This subject is developed naturally and logically, with Man and his environment as the main theme.

Bruce's United States History

Written by a Southern author for Southern schools; interesting, attractive, and profusely illustrated.

New Century Physiologies

Represents the latest scientific research and study, with the best methods of instruction in right living.

Peterman's Civil Government

Gives a good knowledge of political institutions, commencing with the family government. Special edition for North Carolina.

Webster's Dictionaries

The standard authority followed in all leading school books. Thoroughly revised and up-to date.

Progressive Speller

Based on the lines which govern the growth of a child's intelligence and the acquisition of his vocabulary.

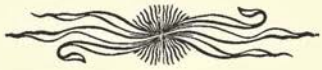
American Book Company

New York Cincinnati Chicago

RAND, McNALLY & CO.

New York, Chicago, London

"The Standard Map Makers of the World"



Send for Catalogue of our Educational Publications

THOS. H. BRIGGS & SONS

Raleigh, N. C.

HARDWARE

Buck's Stoves and Ranges

JAP-A-LAC
FLOOR-LAC

S. W. P. the great Paint

Best Goods, Lowest Prices, Square Dealing

DESIRABLE BOOKS

That Should be on the Shelves of the Libraries of Every North Carolina Home

Lutie Andrews McCorkle's Old-Time Stories of the Old North State.

Warren's Stories from English History.

Pratt's America's Story for America's Children. Five Vols.

Katherine B. Massey's Story of Georgia.

Stone & Fickitt's Every Day Life in the Colonies.

Bass' Stories of Pioneer Life.

Horton's The Frozen North.

Kuffer's Stories of Long Ago.

Hyde's Favorite Greek Myths.

Firth's Stories of Old Greece.

Brown's Alice and Tom.

Stone & Fickett's Days and Deeds of a Hundred Years Ago.

Starr's Strange Peoples.

Starr's American Indians.

Fairbank's The Western U. S.

Heath's Home and School Classics (39 Vols. of the finest literature for young people in the world).

Eckstorms' Bird Book (a natural history of birds).

These or any other publications from our large and valuable list may be secured from your local book seller or from

D. C. HEATH & COMPANY

225 Fourth Avenue
NEW YORK

Biographical History of North Carolina

From Colonial Times to the Present

SAM'L A. ASHE, Editor-in-Chief CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher

GREENSBORO, N. C.

The publisher desires to say without fear of contradiction that there has never been anywhere in the United States any other State Biographical venture equalling the Biographical History of North Carolina in scope, selectness of subjects, excellence of literary and historical matter and general mechanical and artistic book-making.

The Biographical History will cover the entire history of the State and will contain sketches signed by authoritative writers of

All the Governors.

All the Chief-Justices.

All the United States Senators.

All the Federal Judges.

All those who have held Cabinet and Diplomatic positions.

Nearly all those distinguished in the Confederate service.

Nearly all the Supreme Court Justices.

Many of the Superior Court Judges.

Distinguished Generals, Military Men and Naval officers.

All the more prominent Editors, Educators, Ministers, Authors, Doctors, Lawyers, Agriculturists and Politicians.

All the more prominent Industrial and Commercial workers.

The most distinguished women.

In a word, as complete a publication as possible of all those who have adorned the annals of North Carolina.

Write for Booklet of Reviews and Testimonials.

CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher,

GREENSBORO, North Carolina

TRENT'S SOUTHERN WRITERS

Extensively used in Women's Clubs.

Should be on the shelves of every public and private library.

THE McMILLAN COMPANY

4th National Bank Building, ATLANTA, GA.

Send for descriptive circular or call and examine the books at our Summer School text-book exhibit in Raleigh.

Miss Dixie Washington Leach

MINIATURES ON IVORY OR PORCELAIN

Access to State Library where copies can be made on Miniature from old portraits.

STUDIO 405 TRUST BUILDING

RALEIGH, North Carolina

FOR

PIANOS, ORGANS

AND EVERYTHING MUSICAL
AT REASONABLE PRICES

SEE

DARNELL & THOMAS

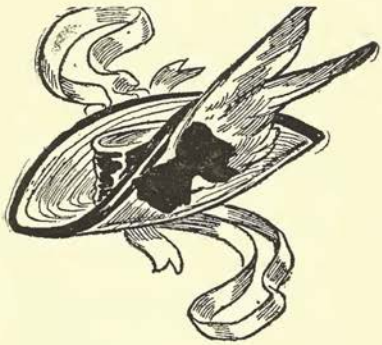
RALEIGH, N. C.

B. F. Johnson Publishing Comp'y

EDUCATIONAL
PUBLICATIONS

ATLANTA RICHMOND DALLAS

Modern Books for Modern Schools



MISSES REESE & CO.,

10 W. Hargett St.

Fine Millinery

Correct Styles and Prices to suit

—ALL—

Trading Stamps given.

STORE CLOSES 6 O'CLOCK

Vol. VI. APRIL, 1907 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLINA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

Page

North Carolina's Attitude to the Revolution - - - 217
By Robert C. Strong

John Lawson - - - - - - - - - 227
By Marshall DeLancey Haywood

Some Overlooked North Carolina History - - - 238
By J. T. Alderman

The White Pictures - - - - - - - - 243
By W. J. Peele

Biographical Sketches - - - - - - - 251
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1907. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME VII.

1. North Carolina in the French and Indian War, Colonel Alfred Moore Waddell
2. Colonial Newspapers, ... Dr. Charles Lee Smith
3. Finances of the North Carolina Colonists, Dr. Charles Lee Raper
4. Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry, Judge James C. MacRae
5. Schools and Education in Colonial Times, . Mr. Charles L. Coon
6. Joseph Gales, ... Mr. Willis G. Briggs
7. General Robert Howe, ... Hon. John D. Bellamy
8. The Resolution of April 12, 1776, . Prof. R. D. W. Connor
9. Our First State Constitution . . . . Dr. E. W. Sikes
10. Permanent Settlement of the Lower Cape Fear, (1725-1735) Mr. W. B. McKoy
11. Colonial Edenton, . . Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D.
12. The Quakers of Perquimans, . . Miss Rebecca Albertson

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VII, are requested to give notice at once.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VI. APRIL, 1907. No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
(Nee Hooper.)

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VI APRIL, 1907 No. 4

NORTH CAROLINA'S ATTITUDE TO THE REVOLUTION.

BY ROBERT C. STRONG.

An attitude is a relative quality. Surrounding circumstances and conditions combine with and are a part of it. These were of a threefold character in North Carolina during the revolutionary period of her history: First, our colony had to neutralize the effect of the War of Regulation; second, she had to deal with the disaffected Cumberland district, and, third, she had to overcome opposition to her movements for independence by leaders whom she had theretofore followed. Her success in meeting these great difficulties was a national triumph.

The district of the trouble which caused the War of Regulation comprised the counties of Guilford, Orange and parts of Rowan and Granville. The culmination of this trouble was the battle of Alamance, of 1771, only a few years before the Declaration of Independence. The feeling of hostility arising from this source was such that the Convention of Hillsborough could not totally alleviate. Organized opposition in the Cumberland section to the national cause and the steps taken by the State therein, culminated in the battle of Moore's Creek on February 27, 1776; but resistance did not cease during the war. This disaffected district reached up from South Carolina and lay in North Carolina between the far divisions of Bladen and Rowan counties. Taking this in connection with the section of the Regulators, it made a broad section of disaffected country sweeping up from South Carolina around to the west of the center of our State and back again, reaching upward nearly to the Virginia line. The British naturally considered North Carolina an easy mark, and in consequence laid their plans to operate through the port of Charleston; recruit their army by marching around and to the south of the Cumberland district, thence northward, to fall upon us from the west.

Our Representatives at the Continental Congress feared this more than they should have done. They used all methods they thought would be effective in calling upon the patriotic sentiment of the western counties, and it was not until they were present at the Convention at Hillsborough did they recognize their mistake.

This Convention met on August 20, 1775, and especially to be noticed in the full representation of the counties was that from the western counties, concerning which such useless fears had been expended. Saunders, in his Prefatory Notes, says: "Time proves all things, and it needed not much time after the struggle for freedom and for independence began to show what was the worth and what was the temper of the people of the center and west. How patriotic the feeling among them was, and how thoroughly united they were is apparent from the fact that, in spite of all the threats and all the inducements held out to them, 'not more than a hundred people of the county' could be enlisted under the King's banner in February, 1776, the rest being 'Highlanders,' new-comers, not yet incorporated into the body politic, in sentiment, at least, of North Carolina."

These changes of condition were not brought about by impulsive enthusiasm or domination of the majority voice in the Convention. The cause was not sought to be compromised, but their faith in its rectitude caused them to give time for more careful thought to those holding the minority view. The six months' adjournment of the Convention to Halifax thus put the reins of a temporary government, so vitally essential, more firmly in their hands.

The early months of the year 1776 found Continental Congress in a state of indecision as to the final acts of separation, delaying necessary and unavoidable measures upon various pretexts. England had refused the North Carolina colony the right to issue currency. It was found that making certain commodities a medium of exchange did not meet the exigencies of the situation, and debenture bonds had to be issued redeemable at certain dates from taxes to be collected. They were only good among the colonists and were to meet the emergency of paying off a debt incurred in an Indian war. Abroad they had no value. Financial emergencies had to be provided for and perplexing financial situations faced. We can therefore appreciate the fear expressed in a letter written by Mr. Penn, our Continental delegate, to Mr. Person, a member of our Provincial Council, of February 14, 1776:

> Matters are drawing to a crisis. They seem determined to persevere, and are forming alliances against us. Must we not do something of the like nature? Can we hope to carry on a war without having trade or commerce somewhere? Can we ever pay taxes without it? Will our paper money depreciate if we go on emitting? These are serious things, and require your consideration. The consequences of making alliances is, perhaps, a total separation with Britain, and without something of the sort we may not be able to procure what is necessary for our defense. * * *

Soon after receiving this momentous communication, the third of the following March, the Provincial Council ordered an assembling of our Congress to be held at Halifax on April 2, 1776. On the fourth the Provincial delegates met. On the eighth a committee of seven was appointed to draft appropriate measures; and on the twelfth their recommendation by resolution was unanimously adopted. This resolution, thus formed with that deliberate haste which can only be accorded to the disposition of the truly great, has given us the revered date of "12th April, 1776," for our State flag:

> Resolved, That the delegates for our colony in the Continental Congress be empowered to concur with the delegates of the other colonies in declaring Independence, and forming foreign alliances, reserving to this colony the sole and exclusive right of forming a constitution and laws for this colony, and for appointing delegates from time to time (under the direction of a general representation thereof) to meet the delegates of the other colonies for such purposes as shall be hereafter pointed out.

This authoritative expression preceded by more than a month that of any other of the colonies. It was decisive upon the questions of independence and the forming of foreign alliances, and its reservation was not only consistent with the spirit of those times, but is indicative of the opposition of our people to-day to any encroachment upon the rights of this State and to centralization of power at Washington.

While at this Convention a constitution could have been adopted as well as later, yet, in the spirit of forbearance and for the purpose of creating harmony, such action was again postponed. On December the 18th, 1776, the colony declared her independence of British rule. There was a full representation, conservative, considerate of the small minority views, but resolute in the face of opposition from those who had been wont to lead. It was a movement of the people, and not of their leaders, though leaders of their own views arose to the occasion. They were strengthened by the wise course which they had pursued at the Convention at Hillsborough, and the "Declaration of Rights," with the Constitution incorporating it, proclaim their framers as men of moral and intellectual force and of great culture. Yet Mr. Johnston, in one of his letters, says of them: "Every one who has the least pretentions to be a gentleman is suspected and borne down per ignobile vulgus—a set of men without reading, experience or principle to govern them." Notwithstanding, eleven of the twelve of these declarations of the bill were adopted in the Federal Bill of Rights, and the matters of the Constitution then adopted are for the greater part familiar to us in our own constitutional government of to-day.

The Representatives of the colony in the Continental Congress misunderstood her people, as we have seen, and learned them aright in Hillsborough. Her agents in England likewise undervalued their disposition. Destiny pointed in but one direction, working through an inflexible human agency, and human acts were impotent to change it. The people of the colony were astonished, outraged and indignant when they heard that the colony was not included in the act of the British Parliament of April, 1775, cutting off the trade of her sister colonies with Great Britain and the West Indies. On the date this act was to be operative, the 20th of July, 1775, the Committee at Wilmington, in the language of Saunders' Prefatory Notes, "formally and unanimously resolved that the exception of this colony out of the said act was a base and mean artifice to seduce them into a desertion of the common cause of America, and that North Carolina, refusing to accept advantages so insidiously thrown out, would continue to adhere strictly to the plans of the Continental Congress, and thus keep up a perfect unanimity with her sister colonies." It was afterwards that it was learned that the agents in England had substituted for the petition sent them "a memorial in more decent terms." Thus we glance backward from December 18, 1776, to July 20, 1775, for another view of the position that the colony assumed towards the common cause, and find the people unyielding in their consistency and uprightness. Through internal strife, Indian troubles and dangers, financial straits, political disagreements of her people and sectional strategic difficulties, North Carolina, considered the weakest colony for attack, was prompt in maintaining her rights under the Stamp Act, in the town of Wilmington, and the foremost to throw overboard the vessel the tea upon which this tax was imposed, in the town of Edenton. This assertive spirit breathed through her people, and found expression, more or less formal, in many places, the most formal being that of Mecklenburg in May, 1775.

Despite the powerful opposition of leading citizens, looking forward from the time of the establishment of the temporary government at Hillsborough, we find a concert of deliberate and effective action. To this temporary government is greatly due the gallant aid given to repulse the British at Charleston on June 28, 1776. Quoting again from Saunders' Prefatory Notes:

> And so we have another instance of the efficiency of the temporary government established at Hillsborough. In a short twelve months it sent troops to the help of Virginia, and twice to that of South Carolina, fought the battle of Moore's Creek, and sent some three thousand men against the Cherokees. Within the year it put near ten thousand men into service in the field, certainly a very large proportion of its fighting population in so short a time.

For the history of North Carolina's part in the War of the Revolution, from the beginning of the year 1777 to the termination thereof, reference is made to the History of North Carolina, by Moore, beginning at chapter 12.

General Washington had but seven thousand men under his command when he took the field in the spring of 1777, almost too weak to oppose the British; but the defeat of Sir Peter Parker and Lord Cornwallis at Charleston, in June, 1776, left the way open for North Carolina to send him six batallions, numbering four thousand muskets. The first and second batallions were of experience, and all were of great courage. In the battles of Princeton and Brandywine they won honor, and honor greater still at Germantown. At home, in the year 1778, the Tories could not make organized opposition, and so they formed a regiment at St. Augustine, Florida. The Legislature was busy with pressing affairs of government, among other things, gravely concerning the finances of the colony.

Having won distinction at the battle of Monmouth Courthouse in the engagement of June 28, 1778, and there being more need for their active service in the army of the South, five batallions of North Carolina troops were sent with General Lincoln to Charleston. In the beginning of the year 1779 two thousand North Carolina militia were sent to South Carolina. In Georgia defeat overtook the Continental forces, but of the character which enhanced their courage and determination. Let our attention revert to the North. At Stony Point, on the 19th day of July, our troops not only shared in the glory achieved by the Northern army, but occupied the post of honor and peril; and then, being needed in the South, were sent to Charleston.

The inevitable fall of Charleston on April 9, 1780, caused us the loss of our veteran troops, and gave occasion to the rise of Lord Cornwallis, and Tarleton, a partizan Loyalist, his "right arm." Tarleton surprised the Virginia troops at Waxhaw on May 29, 1780, as they were on their way to the relief of Charleston. In his opposition he was daring and formidable, and he and his Tory troops were a source of continuous menace. Had it not been for our successful issue at the battle of Moore's Creek, and the wise course taken at the Convention at Hillsborough, our history might have been written differently. As it was, great concern was felt for the unprotected condition of South Carolina and the loss of our veteran troops at Charleston. Cornwallis was commanding four thousand British regulars, to oppose which there was only available a troop of cavalry and two companies of mounted infantry. Our resources were well-nigh drained, and the maintenance of armies was a very grave difficulty. Under these conditions it was cheering to our people to win over the Loyalists of North Carolina the small but important battle of Ramsour's Mill, fought in June, 1780. At this time Lord Cornwallis was with his army at Camden, South Carolina, awaiting supplies. General Gates, lacking in the forethought and consideration for the ideas of others that characterized our people, met with his disastrous defeat there, and fled to the town of Charlotte without providing for the safety of the men under his command. On the 8th day of September, 1780, Tarleton, having surprised and defeated Sumter's command, Cornwallis, counting upon reinforcements from the Tories of the State, moved forward to subjugate North Carolina with much assurance. Just before this time the fighting at Hanging Rock had taken place, and, following this, transpired the decisive battle of King's Mountain and the strategic movements of Morgan to intercept the reinforcements of Royalists for Cornwallis' army. Then followed the famous retreat of Morgan before the British, his uniting with Greene, and the further retreat to Guilford Court-house, where Cornwallis was defeated in his plans by his more than doubtful victory. Then began the retreat of the British army, which ended in its surrender to General Washington.

Conciliatory and forbearing, our colony achieved a victory over those who theretofore had been the leaders of thought and action within her borders, and when the occasion demanded, with more than heroic courage, she subjugated those of her people who would interfere in her fight for independence. She neutralized the effect of her foreign disaffected element as much as possible, and successfully met force with force upon occasions of vital importance to the entire Continental cause. Duty and devotion could call successfully upon her every resource, and especial privileges and bounties brought very poor results. So liberal was her contribution to the common cause, and so self-sacrificing was she of her strength, that on September 13, 1781, her Governor, while at Hillsborough with his suite and other prominent military and civil officers, fell into the hands of the Loyalists. The attempt to re-capture at Lindley's Mill, on Cane Creek in Chatham County, was brilliant but unavailing.

There yet remains to complete the thought contained in these pages the consideration of the principles which actuated such brilliant achievements. Like all great principles, they are of a simple nature.

The following extracts are from the Mecklenburg Petition for the Repeal of the Vestry and Marriage Acts, 1769.

> In the Great Charter, His Majesty confirms to his subjects removing from Great Britain into this province, and their descendants, all the rights, privileges and immunities to which His Majesty's subjects in Great Britain, to-wit, England and Scotland, are entitled. * * * We assure your excellency, Your Honours of the Council, the Honourable Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Burgesses, that we shall ever be more ready to support that Government under which we find the most liberty.

In speaking of the necessity of the Declaration of Independence James Iredell, in a letter to Joseph Hewes, written from Edenton June 9, 1776, said:

> I do not view the subject as a matter of ambition; in my opinion it is criminal and impolitic to consider it in that light; but as a matter of necessity; and in that case, in spite of every consequence (and very bad ones may be dreaded) I should not hesitate for an instant in acceding to it.

It is gratifying to know that Judge Iredell was one of our first judges, and that he afterwards acquired a national reputation. Also, that Mr. Johnston was placed in positions of trust by our people after the events of the Revolutionary War.

From the above quoted expressions we may judge the spirit of the times. The people had their rights under the Royal Charter, and, later, under the Great Deed or Grant from the Lords Proprietors. These rights were clear and unmistakable. They would live up to those rights, and enforce them when necessary. Feeling secure in them, they did not follow South Carolina in 1719 when she threw off the government of the Lords Proprietors. The third Royal Governor wrote home to England that he and the written instructions of the King were set at defiance, for that the people openly declared "that their charter still subsisted." Indeed, the people appeared to pay little heed to any arrangement that was made between King and Lords respecting them and their property. They appreciated charter rights by inheritance, and when necessary would enforce them without counting the cost. They were "ready to support that government under which they found the most Liberty" when in keeping with their Rights. This they Did, not as matters of Ambition, but those of Necessity.

This same spirit reaches upward into the disposition of our people of to-day, and presents an ever conservative but undaunted front. In more recent years it has been as splendid in its defeat as it was then exalted in its victory. To-day the wealth of the East and of the West are alike. The people of all sections are as one people, and Prosperity is their constant visitor. The United States are at Peace with themselves and with the World.

NOTE.—Biographical Sketch of above writer will appear in July number of Vol. VII.

JOHN LAWSON.

BY MARSHALL DeLANCEY HAYWOOD.

The writing of history has never met with much encouragement in North Carolina. Our first historian is said to have been burned alive. Should another, in this day and generation, adopt historical work as the sole means of gaining a livelihood, he might meet death in a no less miserable manner—by starvation. But, notwithstanding these trivial obstacles, the work goes forward. As we glance backward to find the forerunner of historians in our State (or Colony, as it then was), we must pass over Richard Hakluyt and other early writers who gave accounts of the settlements which were made under the patronage of Sir Walter Raleigh. These settlements never rose to the dignity of a province, were finally abandoned, and it was many years later before the name of Carolina appeared on the map as a British possession in America. Hence, the first historian of our State, and sometime Colony, was a sturdy adventurer and writer of no mean order, who made his first appearance in America in the Summer of 1700.

John Lawson, or "John Lawson, Gentleman," as he preferred to style himself, tells us, in his narrative, how he reached the purpose of coming to America, in these words: "In the year 1700, when people flocked from all parts of the christian world to see the solemnity of the grand jubilee at Rome, my intention at that time being to travel, I accidentally met with a gentleman who had been abroad and was very well acquainted with the ways of living in both Indies; of whom, having made inquiry concerning them, he assured me that Carolina was the best country I could go to; and that there then lay a ship in the Thames in which I might have my passage. I laid hold on this opportunity, and was not long on board before we fell down the river and sailed to Cowes; where, having taken in some passengers, we proceeded on our voyage."

After springing a leak, the vessel on which Lawson sailed was forced to put into port on one of the islands of Scilly, where the voyagers were hospitably entertained by the inhabitants during a stay of ten days. Setting sail once more on the 1st of May, the ship was thrown out of its course by adverse winds, and it was not until the latter part of July that Sandy Hook, in the Colony of New York, was reached. After remaining a fortnight in New York, Lawson's journey by sea was resumed; and, fourteen days later, he found himself in Charleston (or Charles Town, as it was then called), the capital and chief city of South Carolina. This colonial metropolis he highly praises, adding that South Carolina was as prosperous in condition as any English colony in America; and was a source of more revenue to the Crown than any of the more northern "plantations," except Virginia and Maryland.

It was on the 28th of December 1700, that Lawson left Charleston and began his journey through the wilderness to North Carolina. In his party were six Englishmen, three male Indians and a squaw—the last mentioned being wife of one of the three Indians. To tell how this band of explorers beat through swamps, forded creeks, went by canoe up and down rivers, camped in the forest by mountain and stream, held intercourse with the natives, were alarmed by wild beasts, and feasted on by mosquitoes, would make a narrative but little shorter than the journal in which Lawson recorded his "thousand miles traveled through several nations of Indians."

From the time of his first arrival on American soil, in 1700, Lawson remained eight years, returning to Europe late in the Summer of 1708. In that year he was appointed Surveyor-General of the Colony. The first edition of his history made its appearance in 1709, being published in London. This was the only issue which came out during the lifetime of its author, though quite a number of posthumous editions have since been printed. Of the character and merits of this work later mention will be made.

During Mr. Lawson's stay in England he was engaged to assist Baron Christopher DeGraffenried in bringing his Swiss and German colonists to North Carolina. The place of their settlement was at the junction of the Neuse and Trent rivers. It was called New Bern, after Bern, in Switzerland, the Baron's native country. The site of New Bern had formerly been occupied by an Indian town known as Chatawka. From this town is said to be derived the name of the lake and settlement of Chatauqua in New York. To New York went a great majority of Tuscaroras under the leadership of Chief Hen-cock (or Hancock) a year or two later, thereby transferring to that colony many Indian names from North Carolina. It will be remembered that, prior to this migration northward of the Tuscaroras, the Indian confederacy in New York was known as the Five Nations—later becoming the Six Nations by the acquisition of the North Carolina tribe.

At a meeting held in London by the Lords Proprietors in August, 1709, Mr. Lawson was allowed the sum of twenty pounds for several maps made by him of the colonies of North Carolina and South Carolina. During the same year he was appointed, together with Edward Moseley, a commissioner to represent the Lords Proprietors in settling the uncertain boundary between North Carolina and the colony of Virginia. These commissioners entered upon their duties in 1710, but did not reach an agreement with the Commissioners of Virginia (Philip Ludwell and Nathaniel Harrison), and the line was not settled definitely until about twenty years later.

In September, 1711, being then at New Bern, Lawson proposed to Baron DeGraffenried to go on an exploring expedition up the Neuse River, to see how far that stream was navigable, and also to ascertain if a more direct overland road to Virginia could be laid out in that direction. Major Christopher Gale (afterwards Chief Justice) was to have accompanied this party; but, being advised of the illness of his wife and brother at the town of Bath, he abandoned his purpose in order to go to them. Lawson and DeGraffenried, however, set out on their journey, accompanied by two negroes to row the boats, and by two Indian guides. One of these Indians understood English and acted as interpreter for the party. After they had traveled some miles and were approaching the Indian village of Catechna, the voyagers were commanded by the natives to proceed no further. Fearing to disregard this order, the boats were pulled up at a spring on the river bank and preparations made to encamp for the night. DeGraffenried appreciated the danger of delay, and counseled immediate return without going into camp, when Lawson, who viewed the matter less seriously, laughed at his fears. But, to use the Baron's own words, "laughter, in a twinkle, expired on his lips" when they found themselves surrounded by scores of armed Indians, some springing from bush and thicket, while others swam from the opposite side of the river to join their tribesmen. For Lawson and his party to resist would mean instant death, so they at once yielded to the Indians, who started at a breakneck speed through the woods, compelling their prisoners to run with them. Toward morning they reached Catechna, the Indian town where King Hen-cock was in council with his warriors, who were even then, mayhap, planning the great massacre which was to be visited upon New Bern shortly thereafter. While the above council continued its session, forty other "kings" or chiefs came with their followers. Among these savage dignitaries was "Core Tom," chief of the village of Core. On being arraigned before the council of forty chiefs, or "Assembly of the Great," as it was called, Lawson and DeGraffenried explained that they were on a friendly excursion, wishing to gather grapes, explore the river, and open up better trade relations with their Indian neighbors. By dint of much persuasion the captives seem to have succeeded in justifying themselves, and it was promised by the Indians that they should be set free the next day. But, unfortunately for the prisoners, two more chiefs arrived and desired to know the reasons for the prospective liberation of the explorers. This brought on another examination, when Lawson lost control of his temper and entered into a violent quarrel with Core Tom, the above-mentioned chief of the village of Core. After this, it was decided that all the party should be put to death. Lawson and DeGraffenried were first pounced upon by the Indians, who robbed them of all their belongings and dashed their hats and periwigs into the fire. Then they were carried out for execution. DeGraffenried, who survived the tragedy, has left behind him a graphic account of preparations for the slaughter, with descriptions of the wild caperings of the Indians, and the grave ceremonials of their High Priest, who was to officiate at the slaughter. "The priests," says DeGraffenried, "are generally magicians, and even conjure up the Devil." When the above gruesome ceremonies were drawing to an end, and the Indians seemed ready to proceed with their butchery, DeGraffenried gained the ear of one of the savages who understood English and gave him to understand that the great and powerful Queen of England, by whose orders he had brought his Swiss colonists to Carolina, would be sure to avenge his blood; furthermore, he made promises of advantages which would accrue to the Indians should he be liberated. At length it was decided that the Baron's life should be spared, but that Lawson should be put to death. In telling of the separation of himself from his fellow-prisoner, it is said by DeGraffenried in his narrative: "Poor Lawson, being always left in the same place, I could understand that all was over with him, and that he would not be pardoned. He accordingly took leave from me, and told me to say farewell, in his name, to his friends. Alas! it grieved me much to see him in such danger, not being able to speak with him, nor to give him any consolation; so I tried to show him my compassion by a few signs." DeGraffenried states that nothing certain was ever known as to the manner of Lawson's execution, for the Indians would not tell how it was brought about. Some accounts said that he was burned alive, some that he was hanged, and others that his throat was cut with a razor taken from his own pocket. Another version, as mentioned in a letter from Major Christopher Gale, was to the effect that the Indians "stuck him full of fine small splinters of torchwood, like hogs' bristles, and so set them gradually on fire."

From the last mentioned version of how Lawson was killed it would appear that he met his death in a manner similar to that described by himself at an earlier period, when his history was written. In that work, while treating of the conduct of Indians toward their prisoners, he says: "They strive to invent the most inhuman butcheries for them that the devils themselves could invent or hammer out of hell; they esteeming death no punishment, but rather an advantage to him that is exported out of this into another world. Therefore they inflict on them torments wherein they prolong life in that miserable state as long as they can, and never miss skulping [scalping] of them, as they call it, which is to cut off the skin from the temples, and taking the whole head of hair with it, as if it was a night-cap. Sometimes they take the top of the skull along with it; all which they preserve and carefully keep by them for a trophy of their conquest over their enemies. Others keep their enemies' teeth, which are taken in war, whilst others split the pitch-pine into splinters and stick them into the prisoner's body yet alive. Thus they light them, which burn like so many torches; and in this manner they make him dance round a great fire, every one buffeting and deriding him till he expires, when every one strives to get a bone or some relic of this unfortunate captive."

It was some days after the death of Lawson before DeGraffenried was set at liberty. During his captivity a proclamation (dated October 8, 1711), was dispatched to the Indians by Governor Alexander Spotswood, of Virginia, stating that upon advices received that they held captive the Baron DeGraffenried, he had thought proper to warn them that should any harm come to their prisoner the forces of Virginia would be called out to lay waste their towns, and no quarter would be given to man, woman or child.

When, at length, DeGraffenried did get back to New Bern, a woeful sight met his eyes. He was greeted by the survivors of his colony, who for many days had mourned him as dead; and from them he learned of the awful tragedy which had been enacted in his absence. On September 22, 1711, one hundred and thirty men, women and children had been inhumanly butchered by the red men; and those colonists who had escaped the tomahawk and scalping-knife were anxiously awaiting the military forces which were soon to come from South Carolina under Colonel John Barnwell. Major Gale, who went to solicit aid from Charleston, reported there that the Baron DeGraffenried had also been murdered, for it was not then known that he had escaped.

In the second volume of the Biographical History of North Carolina is a sketch of Lawson, by Dr. Stephen B. Weeks, in which are recounted the various editions through which Lawson's History has gone. Dr. Weeks says: "His historical and descriptive work was possibly compiled for John Stevens' 'Collections of Voyages and Travels,' which was begun in 1708 and finished in 1710-'11. The second of the series, printed in 1709, is Lawson's 'New Voyage to Carolina.' It appeared in 1711 as a part of the edition of Stevens published that year, with the same title page. In 1714 and 1718 it was re-published under the title 'The History of Carolina' (London). There was a German edition in 1712, 'Alleneuster Beschreibung der Provintz Carolina' (Hamburg), and another in 1722. These were doubtless issued to encourage immigration, and perhaps in the interests of DeGraffenried's Palatine colony. The 1714 edition was re-printed in Raleigh in 1860, and again at Charlotte in 1903 by Colonel F. A. Olds. Both of the North Carolina editions are very poorly done."

To the above comments by Dr. Weeks it may be added that the volume published at Charlotte contains matter which Lawson did not write, including some of the papers of Colonel William Byrd, of Westover, in Virginia. This edition is also relieved of some plain language which would hardly pass for polite literature in our generation. Some language found in Lawson's work (the unexpurgated editions at least) is not gauged by the modern standards of chaste expression. To tell, in delicate terms of the various things which passed under his observation while sojourning among the Indians, might have been considered by the old historian too difficult a task. He was an observant traveler, who saw and heard much; and, what he did see and hear, was told in words which would be highly embarrassing if read aloud in a drawing-room of the present day.

When Lawson deals with natural history and animal life, the terms he employs are quite amusing. Under the head of insects he includes alligators, rattlesnakes and about twenty other kinds of snakes, terrapins, frogs, etc. Among the snakes he mentions "brimstone snakes." As to what a "brimstone snake" is, the present writer must confess ignorance, but it is evidently a pretty hot insect. In referring to frogs, he says: "The most famous is the bullfrog, so called because he lows exactly like that beast, which makes strangers wonder (when by the side of a marsh) what is the matter, for they hear the frogs low and can see no cattle." Lawson also tells of a disease which can be easily cured by baking a toad and grinding up his ashes with orris root, this to be taken internally. I am afraid this remedy would hardly find much favor in the present day.

It is not generally known that a trial for witchcraft once took place in North Carolina, which resulted in the conviction and execution (probably by burning) of the accused. Lawson states that, though North Carolina had been settled for upwards of sixty years, the only executions which had ever occurred were those where a Turk had been convicted of murder, and an old woman had been condemned for witchcraft. Alluding to the witchcraft trial, Lawson adds that it took place many years before he came to the colony, but adds: "I wish it had been undone to this day, although they give a great many arguments to justify the deed which I had rather they should have had a hand in than myself; seeing I could never approve of taking life away upon such accusations, the justice whereof I could never yet understand."

In 1737, some years after Lawson's death, Dr. John

Brickell published a Natural History of North Carolina. It has often been charged that this was a plagiarism, almost verbatim, from Lawson; and Brickell did get much of his material from the earlier historian. In the above quoted sketch by Dr. Weeks, however, it is intelligently argued that Brickell was not a mere copyist. Referring to the charges of plagiarism, Dr. Weeks observes: "These statements do a grave injustice to Brickell. He tells us that his work is a 'compendious collection.' He took the work of Lawson, reworked it in his own fashion, extended or curtailed and brought it down to his own time. His work is more than twice as large as that of Lawson's; his professional training is everywhere patent, and there is much in it relating to the social condition of the colony. Brickell's work is fuller, more systematic and more like the work of a professional student; Lawson's seems more like that of a traveler and observer."

In 1705 Mr. Lawson joined Joel Martin in securing a charter to incorporate the town of Bath. This historic borough, or what at present remains of it, is the oldest incorporated town in the State. The land on which it was built belonged to Lawson and Martin; and the former, being a surveyor by profession, was doubtless the one who laid out its streets. As Lawson aided Baron DeGraffenried in founding New Bern, he probably laid out the streets of that place also, and possibly of Edenton.

Since the days of John Lawson no writer has ever attempted to treat of the history of North Carolina without building in some measure upon the literary labors of others, or upon the records of former generations. The book of nature was the only volume to which Lawson could turn for information. Amid the wilds of a new continent he lived, labored, wrote, explored, blazed paths through the trackless wilderness, made measurements of our seacoasts, laid out villages and promoted colonization. To wrest the soil from a fierce and warlike race of savages required men of supreme courage—men who could be killed but never cowed—and who would fearlessly bear privations and face death when so doing would advance the great purposes they sought to accomplish.

Forceful is the figure of speech voiced by some writer who says that the pyramids of Egypt, doting with age, have forgotten the names of their founders. Immeasurably more mighty than the pyramids, and not doting with age either, is the great American continent, whose settlement was begun by our colonial progenitors; and succeeding generations should see to it that the names and deeds of these "founders" are held in grateful and everlasting remembrance.

SOME OVERLOOKED NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY.

BY J. T. ALDERMAN.

Old books are sometimes quite interesting. For a number of years Waln's Life of Lafayette, published in 1826, has been in my library unread. Recently my attention was attracted to it, and I found it very entertaining. Among other things I came across something which was news to me.

In his account of the siege of Yorktown, the fact comes out that Lord Cornwallis, when about to be hemmed in by the American and French troops, began to look about for some way to extricate himself from their toils. On the arrival of the French fleet in the Bay Cornwallis determined to leave Yorktown and by forced marches, cross North Carolina and join the British forces near Charleston, S. C.

Waln says: "The most positive intelligence was soon received by Lafayette that Lord Cornwallis intended to penetrate with his army from Yorktown to South Carolina by land. He was moving from York to James River, and was getting hits boats across from Queen's creek to College landing to go from thence to Jamestown, then cross the James River to Cobham's to proceed from thence to South Carolina."

"Upon the first intelligence of this movement of Cornwallis, the most animated measures were adopted by Governor Burke to cooperate with Muhlenburg. Every boat on the Roanoke, Neuse and Meherin rivers was secured under guard or destroyed; every crossing was placed under guard and crossed by abatis; and the militia were ordered out en masse. The whole State of North Carolina, from the Dan River to the sea-coast appears to have been set in motion by this active Governor.

"Cornwallis had prepared a number of light pontoons on wagons, and was ready for the march. The arrival of the French fleet under Count De Grasse had been the cause of this movement; the departure of the French fleet to engage the British under Admiral Greaves delayed it. Below him he saw the whole country in arms to oppose his retreat, while Green waited in the South to receive him on the point of the bayonette," etc.

After reading the above it occurred to me that the Colonial Records ought to throw some light upon this subject. Investigation brings out plenty of evidence of the proposed invasion, and of the determination of the people of North Carolina to dispute his passage through the State to South Carolina.

The following extracts are from the State Records, Vol. XV., and are interesting, especially as they throw light on this matter.

Page 626. The following is a letter from Lafayette to Gen. Allen Jones. Dated. Ruffins, August 27, 1781:

DEAR SIR:—From the intelligencies lately received I am almost satisfied that the enemy mean to attempt a retreat through North Carolina, and as it is of the highest importance every obstruction should be thrown in their way, I request you will be particular in having every boat on the Roanoke collected and destroyed. I would not wish it delayed as they may fall into the enemy's hands, and it would furnish them with the means of crossing and render your opposition more difficult. I wish you to collect, without loss of time, a sufficient number of militia to render these attempts ineffectual. * * * *

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

LAFAYETTE.

Page 629. Letter of Col. H. Murfree to Governor Burke:

MURFREE'S LANDING, September 1, 1781.

SIR:—I received your excellency's favor of the 31st August, and observed its contents. I will lose no time in securing the boats, etc. * *

I am yours, etc., H. MURFREE

Page 630. Letter from Col. J. S. Wells to General Jones.

CAMP COWPER'S MILLS, September 1, 1781.

DEAR GENERAL:—I have the pleasure to inform you that the long expected French fleet has at last arrived in our Bay. * * * * In consequence of the said fleet's arrival, Lord Cornwallis is about moving from York to Jamestown and is getting his boats across from Queen's Creek to the College Landing, from thence to Jamestown and there to cross James River to Cobham, from that place to South Carolina. General Wayne and General Muhlenberg are on this side James River and I expect some of the French Frigates will go up the river in order to prevent his Lordship's crossing. But should he cross you may expect to see us in your quarter of the country. His Lordship must never be suffered to cross Roanoke. * * * *

Your most obedient servant,

JOHN SCK. WELLS, Collo.

Gen. W. Caswell to Governor Burke.

Under dates of September 4th, again on 8th, again on September 14th, Caswell wrote to Governor Burke that every provision was being made to fortify the country and put a large army in the field to dispute the march of Cornwallis should he attempt to cross the State.

The records show that the Militia was being collected and equipped in the whole State east of the Piedmont section. The people at that time were encouraged; they had gained considerable confidence in their power to resist the invading armies. Many of them had seen service during the campaigns in South Carolina and with Greene in west North Carolina. The officers knew better how to collect and maintain an army.

THE NORTH CAROLINA MILITIA OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES.

Unjust criticisms have been heaped upon the North Carolina Militia during Revolutionary times. The youth of our country should know that historians were unjust to the men who served well their country at a time when valiant services were most needed. No doubt there were individuals in the ranks of the militia who were not brave soldiers.

An investigation of the services of the militia during those stormy years would give some idea of the valuable services rendered to the Cause of Liberty by the North Carolina Militia.

The first decided victory on the field of battle for Independence was gained by the North Carolina militia at Moore's Creek. Ramsour's Mill, Kings Mountain, Guilford Court House, and a hundred encounters with the Tories and British bore testimony to their bravery and courage. After the battle of Kings Mountain Cornwallis precipitately retreated from Charlotte to escape the North Carolina militia. A large number of the State Militia joined General Mogan's forces and helped to win the great victory at the Cowpens. The Tories were held in check through fear of the Militia in the disaffected sections of the State. A large number of the Militia went from the State to help the people of South Carolina.

At the battle of Camden Dixon's Brigade of North Carolina Militia was the last to leave the field. In the State Records, Vol. XV, page 384, is an interesting account of the bravery of this brigade of North Carolina Militia.

In that unfortunate battle General Gates had unadvisedly rushed his men into the battle unprepared for the conflict. Without proper precaution he had attempted to make a night attack on the British. The British were making the same kind of move during the night when they met in the darkness. The disastrous result is well known. The writer in the page named says:

"General Gates attempted to arrange the American troops in the darkness.

"At length the army was arranged in line of battle in the following order: General Gist's brigade on the right, the North Carolina Militia in close order, two deep, in the center, and the Virginia Militia in like order with another corps on the left; the other troops were arranged in other parts of the field. * * * The enemy attacked and drove in our light party in front, and after the first fire charged the Militia with bayonets, whereupon the whole gave way, except Colonel Dixon's regiment of North Carolina Militia; the British cavalry continuing to harass the rear such was the panic diffused through the whole that utmost and unremitting exertions of the Generals to rally them proved ineffectual. They ran like a torrent and bore all before them. This shameful desertion of the Militia gave the enemy an opportunity of bending their whole force against the Maryland troops and Dixon's North Carolina Militia. The conflict was obstinate and bloody, and lasted fifteen minutes. Dixon's Militia standing firm with the regulars of the Maryland line, and pushing bayonets to the last. They were then furiously charged by British horse whom they completely vanquished, allowing only two of the British to escape. These brave militiamen suffered greatly, having lost half of their number, and to their immortal honor made their retreat good. * * * After this defeat the yeomanry of North Carolina immediately turned out unsolicited. An army was collected which consisted of between 4,000 and 5,000 men."

With such experiences with the North Carolina Militia, it is not surprising that Cornwallis hesitated to make another attempt to pass through the State.

NOTE.—Biographical Sketch of Prof. J. T. Alderman appeared in No. 3 Vol. VI, January, 1907.

THE WHITE PICTURES.

BY W. J. PEELE.

The pictures of John White purport to have been painted on Roanoke Island, and if this did not appear from inspection, the execution of them there would have been presumed from their character and fidelity.

Any one who visits the Island now can still recognize the scenes, the ground plans, on which the pictures are laid. The Sounds, the Banks, the sand hills, the inlets and the Island itself with its outline and configuration, are unmistakable. Then, too, White was selected by Queen Elizabeth and sent there to paint what he saw, and had ample opportunity to do it, for he remained a year lacking five days. How well he executed his commission may be gathered from the fact that two years later he was sent over to our shores as the governor of "Virginia"—perhaps the only artist who ever held that office. The "lost colony" seems to have been a sufficient argument against the repetition of the experiment.

The originals are still in the British Museum, and fairly executed copies preserving the colors are in the Smithsonian Institute. These copies were made, I think, in 1845.

The copies before me are those reproduced in DeBry's edition of 1590, cut, as he says, in copper with great pains, and printed in Germany, with their descriptions subjoined, which appear to have been written by White himself. DeBry's book with the descriptions in four languages (or rather his four books, for he got out an English, Latin, French and German edition), was the joint product of several minds, among them Raleigh's, Hariot's, and Hakluyt's.

The title of DeBry's book (in modern spelling) is "The true pictures and fashions of the people of that part of America now called Virginia, discovered by Englishmen, sent thither in the year of our Lord 1585, at the special charge and direction of the Honorable Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, Lord Warden of the Slannaries in the Duchies of Cornwall and Oxford, who therein hath been favored and autorified by her Majesty and her letters patent, translated into English by Richard Hakluyt, diligently collected and drawn by John White, who was sent thither specially for the same purpose by the said Sir Walter Raleigh, the year 1585 and also the year 1588, now cut in copper and first published by Theodore de Bry at his own charges."

There is no other record that White came over here in 1588. The writer probably meant 1587. The other date mentioned, 1585, if it referred to the discovery by Amidas and Barlowe, should be 1584; Lane's exploration in 1585 and 1586 were much more extensive, but they were not the first made by the English in eastern North Carolina.

The matter is set in a clearer light by giving the most material parts of De Bry's preface: "To the Gentle Reader."

"* * * I was very willing to offer unto you the true pictures of those people which by the help of Master Richard Hakluyt, of Oxford, minister of God's Word, who first encouraged me to publish the work, I carved out of the very original matter of Master John White, an English painter who was sent into the country by the Queen's Majesty only to draw the topography of the place and to describe in a manner true to life the forms of the inhabitants, their apparel, manner of living and their fashions, at the special charges of the worthy Knight, Sir Walter Raleigh, who bestowed no small sum of money in the search and discovery of that country from the year 1584 to the end of the year 1588. * * * I carved them * * at London, and brought them hither to Frankfort, where I and my sons have taken earnest pains in graving the pictures thereof in copper, seeing it is a matter of no small importance. * * * I have caused it (the descriptions of the paintings) to be rendered into very good French and Latin by the aid of a very worshipful friend of mine. [Probably Hariot.]

"Finally, I heartily request thee [the reader] that if any seek to counterfeit them, my books, for in these days many are so malicious as that they seek to gain by other men's labors, thou would give no credit unto such counterfeited draught. For divers secret marks lie hidden in my pictures which will breed confusion unless they be well observed."

De Bry's book contains twenty-three engravings. The first is Hariot's map of Lane's explorations, showing the Albemarle and Pamlico and Currituck Sounds, with their tributaries and islands, the Banks and their inlets. This is omitted in the copy in the State Library.

The ground plan of the second engraving, which serves also as a map, though its title "the arrival of the Englishmen in Virginia" indicates what it was intended to portray, centers around a boat load of pioneers approaching the village of Roanoke near the north end of the Island; or perhaps, the village itself is intended to be the central point. Behind the approaching pioneers is the inlet, Trinity Harbor, through which they have sailed, on either side of which two ships are riding at anchor in the ocean. Toward the village in front of them, one sitting in the prow of the boat is holding out a cross to indicate the pious purpose of their coming. Beyond what is now called Croatan Sound, some four or five miles from the Island, appears the village of Dassamonguepuek. On the north bank of what is now the Albemarle Sound, appears the village of Pasquenoke, of which the name Pasquotank may be a corruption. The entire view is less than thirty miles in any direction, and could be covered with a field glass on a fair day from a tower in Manteo. The miniature villages are surrounded by corn patches, and, when magnified show the surprising degree of skill with which they were sketched on so small a scale.

The description of the landing contains very suggestive material for the artist who will one day immortalize himself by working it into a great painting of the scene.

* * * "Sailing further we came to a good big Island, the inhabitants thereof as soon as they saw us, began to make a great and horrible cry as people which had never before seen men apparelled like us, and ran away making outcries like wild beasts or men out of their wits. But being gently called back we offered them our wares, such as glass beads, knives, dolls, and other trifles which we thought they delighted in. So they stood still and perceiving our good will and courtesy came fawning upon us and bade us welcome. Then they brought us to their village in the Island called Roanoke and unto their Weroance or Prince, who entertained us with reasonable courtesy, although they were amazed at the first sight of us.

"Such was our arrival into the part of the world which we call Virginia, the statue of body of which people, their attire and manner of living, their feasts and banquets, I will particularly declare unto you."

I should add in conclusion that the White paintings should be elaborately discussed by one capable of judging them from an artist's standpoint. Recently Mr. Albert Sterner, under the auspices of the Historical Commission, visited Roanoke Island after first examining De Bry. How he was impressed is told in an article recently published in the News and Observer, which it may not be improper here to reproduce.

THE SCENE OF A GREAT PAINTING—THE HISTORICAL COMMISSION SENDS MR. ALBERT STERNER TO ROANOKE ISLAND.

I had long thought it ought to be painted. It looked like a picture when I saw it in 1902—I mean the place where Amidas and Barlowe landed in 1584.

The little island was sleeping the sleep of centuries embowered in evergreens very much as it was when the English knelt there to thank God for the new possession. The long yellow banks glistened in the sunlight. The blue Atlantic rolled beyond. Some two or three hundred yards from Fort Raleigh is a little cove on the island shore filled in by the waters of Roanoke Sound. It is almost opposite the fort, and with the water a little deeper, as it may well have been then, it was almost an ideal place for the landing. North Carolina has made no memorial of this first great step in the transcontinental march of the Anglo-Saxon race. Centuries have gone by and the spread of the all-conquering race is arrested only by the Pacific. Monuments and memorials have been erected along the lines of its progress, but it has forgotten its cradle on the shores of the Old North State.

In a few months many tens of thousands of Americans will return to a spot in Virginia a little more than a hundred miles away to do honor to the memories which rightly cluster about it, and North Carolina has stretched to her sister across her border a generous hand of congratulation. Shall she do any thing for herself?

Framed by the banks of "Hatorask" on the east and the land of Dassamonguepuek on the west, and set an emerald in the golden waters of its four sounds, the island is as perfect a picture as it was when Queen Elizabeth sent John White to paint it. And he did paint it in a little picture nine by six inches which escaped the great London fire of 1666 and is still preserved in the British Museum. The reproduction of this picture "The Coming of the English into Virginia"—North Carolina—on a great canvas by an artist of national and international fame is one of the debts which the State owes to herself—owes to her sister States—to the race which begun its new home here—its last and greatest home—owes to posterity—owes to the world whose representative peoples are about to assemble near our shores.

In December Mr. Albert Sterner, of New York, who illustrates for the great Northern periodicals, visited the island at the request of the Historical Commission. The people did not know he was coming and the regular boat was out of repair so there was nothing but a gas freight boat to take him from Elizabeth City to Manteo.

Nothing daunted, however, he went accompanied by his wife, herself an artist in temperament and enthusiasm. There was some natural hesitation at the acommodations or rather the lack of them, but the London historian, Mr. Withington, whom he had along with him and who had been everywhere and seen everything was delighted at the prospect of a terra incognita. Soon the little freight boat was gliding down the chocolate colored waters of the Pasquotank River. The sun, near its setting, struggled hard with the mists up the sound until finally, no bigger than a bull's eye, it was snuffed out. Light breezes were behind us and I suppose they bore pleasant odors with them, but we were sitting over an oil stove and fumes of this emphasized by those of the gasoline in front of us were quite sufficient to swallow up any faint aromas from the woods. In six hours we were at Manteo. Thawed out we chartered a boat for our return—the freight boat was to start back at five o'clock a. m.

A noise like that of a dozen freight trains loaded with bass drums was echoing up into the sky. It was the Atlantic growling down the banks toward Hatteras in token of wind the next day. This we got in due season according to promise and some of our much traveled party got sea-sick on the Albemarle Sound.

The sun rose fine the next morning for those of us who got up with it. Our historian and his wife rose considerably before it, and he escaped from his exploration wet to his knees. This did not disturb him at all, however, for in a few minutes he was whizzing along through the frosty air on the road to Fort Raleigh. The sub-tropical evergreens—live oak, the yupon and the holly—brightened our way. We had sent the boat round to meet us toward the north end of the island near where the colonists landed. Out of the vehicles we made our way from the fort some two or three hundred yards to the shore of Roanoke Sound, and this was the place we had brought the great artist all the way from New York to see. Up the shore a few straggling pines, relics of the primeval forests, sentinelled the outskirts of the woods and marked the undulations of the shore. The little cove where probably the first boat load of colonists drew ashore curved gracefully inland. The quick eye of the artist caught the scene, and his bosom swelled with enthusiasm as he saw for the first time how well nature had framed "the cradle of the Anglo-American race." Behind him were the woods bedecked with evergreen. In front of him the yellow waters of Roanoke Sound brightened in the sunshine. Beyond stretched the banks, down which a flock of wild geese were proceeding in their orderly flight.

"The picture is worthy of the event," were almost the first words that escaped him. And this was always what I expected. He spoke little, but his enthusiasm was contagious as he strode up and down the sands of that historic spot. The scene which White painted on the island in his "true pictures" of more than three centuries ago arose before him. He saw the coming boat freighted with the pioneers of the nation which is called "time's noblest off-spring and the last." He saw the Indians who first fled with "horrible cries" and then came fawning back upon their conquerors. He saw the village of Roanoke with its rude houses of bark. "They have robbed you of your birthright," exclaimed his wife—and she never knew it till she saw the paintings and the picture before her which verified them. But have they done it? We shall see.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF CONTRIBUTORS.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

RICHARD BENBURY CREECY.

The subject of this sketch was one of the first contributors to the BOOKLET. In volume 1st, No. 5, he wrote a sketch of that heroic maiden, Betsy Dowdy, of Currituck Beach, who made the famous midnight ride to carry news of the probable invasion of the Albemarle section by the British troops under Lord Dunmore. Col. Creecy has given a graphic account of this incident introduced by these memorable lines:

> " Oh woman timid as a child
> When skies are bright, serene and mild:
> Let evil come with angry brow,
> A lion-hearted hero thou."

This is but another recorded instance that North Carolina had her heroines as well as her heroes; tho' history has usually been silent concerning them.

Col. Creecy, one of the ablest editors in our State, was born December 19, 1813, on Drummond's Point, the oldest settlement in North Carolina on Albemarle Sound.

He is descended from Job Creecy, a Huguenot emigrant from France, a representative of that branch of Christians noted in general for their austere virtues and the singular purity of their lives.

He is also descended from General Thomas Benbury, one of the leading statesmen of the Revolution, a member of the Provincial Congress of August 25, 1774, also member of the Edenton District Committee of Safety; paymaster of the 5th Regiment, who fought at the battle of Great Bridge, which engagement was so successful for the Americans that the British troops were forced to retreat.

Col. Creecy is also descended from William Skinner, who was Brigadier-General of State troops; Treasurer of the Eastern District under Governor Caswell, and rendered in other ways important service during the Revolutionary War. With such sturdy and patriotic ancestors it is no wonder that the subject of this sketch holds on so tenaciously to life—a life filled with service for his State and country.

Col. Creecy was educated in the best schools that the State afforded, was graduated from the State University in 1835, studied law and obtained his license in 1842. After three years he abandoned the practice of law and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits. In 1870, finding that his tastes were inclined to journalism and other lines of literary work, he founded the "Elizabeth City Economist," a paper which he has continued to publish to the present time, and which has a large circulation in Eastern North Carolina. His productions are considered of such literary merit, wit and humor and philosophy combined, as to enlist the attention of a reader from start to finish.

His article on the history of the Albemarle section has made the characters of the Revolution such living actors that their names have become household words with later generations. Would that every section of our beloved State had a historian like he—one to write a "Grandfather's Tales" for the children from the mountains to the sea.

Col. Creecy has never sought political preferment, which in many instances "blunts the edge of husbandry;" his line of work has been in the path of duty. Imbued with a generous ambition and a passionate love for his State and its honorable history, he has rescued from oblivion many facts that substantiate the claim that North Carolina stands foremost in the great struggle for liberty.

Col. Creecy has written many reminiscences that are keys to the book of history, opening the way to diligent research. His productions embrace a diversity of subjects, including history, biography, legends and poetry. One of his books, called "Grandfather's Tales of North Carolina History," is widely read and highly recommended. The dedication, is its keynote. "To the youth of North Carolina I dedicate this volume, with the earnest hope that they will learn from its pages some lessons of patriotism, and will be strengthened in their love for their native State by these memorials of the past that I have sought to perpetuate for their benefit."

In November, 1844, Col. Creecy was married to Miss Mary B. Perkins, whose ancestors figured conspicuously in the Revolutionary War in defense of their country. Numerous descendants live to do him honor.

Capt. Ashe, in his biographical sketch, says: "Being asked for some suggestion that might be helpful to young people Col. Creecy suggests 'honesty, integrity, friendliness, timeliness, godliness, benevolence, cheerfulness, firmness in the right, modest assurance, and a careful study of great speeches by great men.' "

In conclusion we quote the following from a recent issue of Leslie's Weekly:

"One of the most interesting characters in the country, especially in the view of newspaper men, is Colonel R. B. Creecy, editor of the Economist, published at Elizabeth City, N. C., who bears the distinction of being the oldest editor in active work in the United States. Colonel Creecy is in his ninety-second year and still wields the editorial pen. He claims four longevities, being also the oldest living graduate of the University of North Carolina, and according to a leading Boston publication, an authority on the subject, the oldest long-seine fisherman in the world, having in early life established the Greenfield fishery on Albemarle Sound, which is still in existence. He studied and mastered stenography at the age of seventeen, and thus holds that there can be no older stenographer living than he."

WILLIAM JOSEPH PEELE.

William J. Peele, the subject of this sketch, was born in Northampton County, North Carolina. Was graduated from the University of North Carolina in 1879. Settled in Raleigh. In 1880 he studied law under Hon. George V. Strong, in which year he was granted license to practice.

In entering on his career as a citizen of his native State he made its advancement a matter of study. The needs of an Agricultural and Mechanical College for the State was among the first things that claimed his attention, and was pressed by Mr. Peele and others to a successful realization, and, to-day, with its fine equipment and its long roll of students, attests its growing influence and stands as a monument to the promoters of the scheme. When the corner-stone of this great State institution was laid, on August the 22d, 1888, Mr. Peele delivered the historical address, which was a masterly effort, breathing such love of State as to inspire his hearers to greater individual effort to advance its interests. When the college was re-organized and Dr. George T. Winston was elected President, Mr. Peele was a member of the board of trustees, and took a most active interest in the plans for its enlargement.

Mr. Peele, with his keen sense of observation, foreseeing the possibilities that lay in waiting for active workers, was instrumental in the establishment of the State Literary and Historical Association, and was for several years chairman of its executive committee. Its chief purposes were:

First. To promote the reading habit among the people of North Carolina.

Second. To stimulate the production of literature in our State.

Third. To collect and preserve historical material.

In carrying out these purposes the Association had in mind "the improvement of the public schools, in the establishment of public libraries, in the formation of literary clubs, in the collection and re-publication of North Carolina literature worthy to be preserved and now rapidly passing away, in the publication of an annual record or biography of North Carolina literary productions, in the collection of historical material and the foundation of an historical museum, and in the correction of slanders, misrepresentations and other injustice done the State."

Mr. Peele was one of the prime factors in this movement, the results of which are apparent, one of the most important being the establishment of libraries in the public schools.

Mr. Peele has written much on the settlement of Roanoke Island, emphasizing the fact that Sir Walter Raleigh is the central figure in the English colonization of America; that on North Carolina shores was the first landing and settlement of Sir Walter Raleigh's colonies on Roanoke Island, the birthplace of Virginia Dare, the first Anglo-American and the cradle of American civilization. Through this apparent failure of Raleigh to colonize America, by his repeated efforts he became the inspiration of the Jamestown expedition, and now, while the great exposition at Jamestown is attracting the attention of the world, North Carolina is coming forward to do her part to make the celebration worthy of the man and of the events he inspired.

Mr. Peele compiled a chronological compendium of the principal events in the life of Sir Walter Raleigh, from 1552 to 1618, which shows beyond controversy that Sir Walter Raleigh was the statesman who wrested our continent from Spain, the pioneer who first planted the seeds of law and liberty and Anglo-Saxon civilization in America.

In the year 1898 Mr. Peele published in permanent form a work entitled "Lives of Distinguished North Carolinians," a handsome volume of 605 pages, printed in excellent taste—an ornament to the men whose virtues it illustrates. This introduction is intended to embrace that period in which were cast the lives and labors of the subjects of the book, and showing how history is being miswritten to the prejudice of the South, and has been for a century. This book is the product of twenty-four minds, and among them the brightest the State has afforded. The lives and the best labors of these men are brought together and edited by Mr. Peele—had he done no other literary work than this, sufficient to say, he is entitled to the plaudits of the whole citizenship of the State.

Mr. Peele is now chairman of the Historical Commission, which was established by the Legislature in 1903. This Commission consists of five members, who are appointed by the Governor of the State. It is hoped that he may assist in adding other publications to the permanent history and literature of the State.

THE BOOKLET is indebted to Mr. Peele for an article published two years ago, entitled "The First English Settlement in America," a study in location, he showed that Amedas and Barlow came through an inlet north of Roanoke Island, and fixed their landing place at the north end of the island, thus preserving the historical value of John White's pictures and laying the foundation for a great painting, which will ultimately be made by an artist worthy of the undertaking.

GENERAL SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

THE SOCIETY AND ITS OBJECTS.

The Society Daughters of the Revolution was organized August 20, 1891, and was incorporated the following September as a society national in its character and purposes. The terms of membership of this Society are based upon direct descent from Revolutionary ancestors.

The objects of the Society as stated in the Constitution are:—"to perpetuate the patriotic spirit of the men and women who achieved American Independence; to commemorate prominent events connected with the War of the Revolution; to collect, publish and preserve the rolls, records and historic documents relating to that period; to encourage the study of the country's history, and to promote sentiments of friendship and common interest among the members of the Society."

ELIGIBILITY TO MEMBERSHIP.

Any woman shall be eligible to membership in the Daughters of the Revolution who is above the age of 18 years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who—

(1) was signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, or a member of the Congress, Legislature, or General Court of any of the Colonies or States; or—

(2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or—

(3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain:—

provided that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP.

Every application for membership in this Society must be made in duplicate upon a form furnished by the Board of Managers, must be signed by the applicant and acknowledged before a notary. The endorsement of two members of the Society, or of two persons of acknowledged standing in the community in which the applicant resides, is also required. Such applications should be presented to the Secretary of the Society of the State in which the applicant resides; where no State Society exists, applications may be addressed to the Recording Secretary-General. The names and addresses of State secretaries will be furnished upon application to the Corresponding Secretary-General.

In filling out application blanks candidates are kindly requested to observe the following directions:

1. See that the line of descent is clearly stated, give the maiden names of all female ancestors, and also furnish dates of birth and death where possible. It is not necessary to show the pedigree any farther back than the ancestor from whom eligibility is derived.

2. If the applicant is married, give own maiden name and also full name, title and address of husband.

3. Write all proper names legibly; this is especially necessary with family name since there are often differences in old-time and modern spelling of such.

4. The record of the ancestors' service should be given fully but concisely. Give exact title of all books of reference, naming page and paragraph; where possible send a certified copy of State or pension records. This will be returned after the application has been accepted.

The Society does not accept Encyclopedias, Genealogical Works, or Town and County Histories, except such as contain Rosters, as authorities for proofs of service.

Reference to authorities in manuscript must be accompanied by certified copies, and authentic family records must be submitted, if required.

5. Send the initiation fee of $2.00 and the first year's dues with the application paper. Should the application not be accepted both will be returned.

When an applicant claims descent from more than one Revolutionary ancestor, then "Supplemental" applications must be made in duplicate for each ancestor; these are treated in form and procedure precisely as original applications. A fee of one dollar is charged for each supplemental paper filed.

PROOFS OF SERVICE.

In seeking proofs of service, the applicant must first know from which of the Thirteen Original States the ancestor served; and, if possible, the town and county. When writing officials simply ask for "the military service of ..... of ....., said to have been a soldier in the Revolutionary War," and they will inform you precisely what rank, length of service, etc., the records show. If the applicant has reason to believe an ancestor drew a pension under the acts of Congress of 1818 or 1832 the record of military service may be obtained by writing to Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, D. C.

Heitman's Historical Register contains the names, rank and service of the Officers of the Continental Army, and is accepted as an official record.

Applicants are referred to the following officials and records for certificates of military service:

MASSACHUSETTS.—The State has published nine volumes of the names of Revolutionary soldiers. These volumes are in the Library of the General Society, and may be found in all large reference libraries throughout the country. For names not contained in these volumes, applications may be made to the Secretary of State, Boston, Mass. A fee is charged for this service.

VERMONT.—Gen. T. S. Peck, Adjutant-General, Montpelier.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Secretary of State, Concord.

RHODE ISLAND.—Secretary of State, Providence.

NORTH CAROLINA.—Mrs. Helen deB. Wills, Raleigh.

A fee of one to three dollars is charged by State officials for looking up records and furnishing a certificate of service.

INITIATION FEES AND DUES.

The initiation fee is two dollars and the annual dues for members at large are three dollars, payable to the Treasurer-General on or before the first day of April in each year. Applicants who enter through State Societies pay their annual dues to the State Society in which their names are enrolled. The fiscal year for all members begins on the first day of April and closes on the thirty-first day of March in each calendar year.

INSIGNIA, ETC.

The insignia of the Society is a badge of gold and blue enamel suspended from a gold bar by a ribbon of buff edged with blue. This may be obtained on receipt of check or money order for ten dollars, payable to Miss Mary A. Kent, Treasurer-General. Miniature badge, one dollar; stationery stamped with the seal of the Society, sixty and seventy-five cents per box, may be obtained at the office of the Society. Engrossed certificate of membership, three dollars.

The office of the General Society is Room 901, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, and is open daily except Sunday, from 10 to 4 o'clock.

Communications concerning the Society and inquiries may be addressed to Mrs. John A. Heath, Corresponding Secretary-General.

ABSTRACTS OF WILLS.

From Secretary of State's Office, North Carolina. (Historical and Geneological Register.)

Samuel Scolley, Bertie county, Feb. 18th, 1752, Mrs. Mary Fullington, alias Davis, spouse of Robert Davis, deceased; brother, Jerman, Robert Scolley of Lerwick, friend Dr. William Cathcart; Robert Todd, of Norfolk, Va., beloved sons-in-law Cullen and Thomas Pollock. I give unto Tully Williams his father's sword.

Elizabeth Scolley,* Bertie; Dec. 1st, 1766, sons, Thomas and Cullen Pollock; children of Richard Sanderson, children of Tully Williams, Frances Lenox, wife of Dr. Robert Lenox, John Scolley, of Boston, Peggy and Fanny Cathcart; Sarah Black, daughter of Joseph, Thomas Black, son of Joseph, Sophia Rasor, daughter of Edward; former husband Thomas Pollock; Thomas Pollock, Dr. Robert Lexon, Richard Sanderson and Joseph Blount, Executors. Test. Henry Hardison, Fred'k Hardison, ...

Thomas Sprott; Anson, January 5th, 1757—Son John Clark, daughters Mary Barnett; Ann Barnett, Susannah Polk and Martha Sprott; son Thomas, wife, Andrew Sprott and Thomas Polk, executors. Test. William Barnett, James Sprott, James Campbell.

Isaac Hunter, of Chowan, April 17th, 1752. April Court, 1753; sons Elisha, Jesse, Isaac and Daniel, daughter Allee Perry daughter Elizabeth Perry, daughter Hannah Riddick, daughter Rachel Walton, daughter Sarah Hunter; grandchildren, son and daughter of my daughter Jane, namely, Jesse Phillips, and Mary Perry and Sarah Fields. Zilpha Parker, daughter of Jonathan Parker.

MRS. H. DEB. WILLS,
Genealogist.

*First husband was John Crisp; second, Thomas Pollock; third, Samuel Scolley, formerly of Boston. Tully Williams' wife was sister of Mrs. Scolley. Frances Lennox was daughter of Cullen Pollock. Peggy and Frances Cathcart were daughters of Dr William Cathcart, and second wife Prudence West.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

VOLUME VI.

PAGE.

The Indian Tribes of Eastern Carolina..... 3–26
By Richard Dillard, M. D.

Glimpses of History in the Names of Our Counties..... 26–48
By Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.

A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear 49–75
By James Sprunt, British Vice-Consul at Wilmington, N. C.

Biographical Sketches: Major Graham Daves, A. B..... 76–79
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Illustrations:
Indian Gallows, Bertie County.
Virginia Dare.
The Dance of the Carolina Indians as represented by John White in 1585.
Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland.

The Borough Towns of North Carolina..... 83–102
By Mr. Francis Nash.

Governor Thomas Burke 103–122
By J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History..... 123–145

The N. C. Society D. R. and its Objects 146–150

Biographical and Genealogical Sketches: Dr. Dillard, Mr. Francis Nash, Dr. Hamilton, Colonel Olds.....151–156
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Illustrations:
Ruins of St. Philip's Church, Brunswick, N. C.
Richard Dillard, M. D.

A State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records 159–176
By Mr. R. D. W. Connor.

The Battle of Rockfish Creek.....177–184
By Mr. J. O. Carr.

Governor Jesse Franklin 185–203
By Prof. J. T. Alderman.

PAGE.

North Carolina Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition 204–205
By Mrs. Lindsay Patterson.

Biographical Sketches: Mr. R. D. W. Connor, Mr. James O. Carr, Prof. J. T. Alderman, Mrs. Sara Beaumont Kennedy.....206–213
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Illustrations:
La Fayette Examining Canova's Statue of Washington in the Rotunda of the State House, 1825.
The Ruins of Canova's Statue of Washington, now in Hall of History at Raleigh.
Home of Alexander Lillington.
Rockfish Creek Bridge.
Autograph of General Lillington.
Map of Battle of Rockfish.
Autograph of Colonel James Kenan.

North Carolina's Attitude to the Revolution..... 217–226
By Mr. Robert C. Strong.

John Lawson.....227–237
By Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

Some Overlooked North Carolina History.....238–242
By Prof. J. T. Alderman.

The White Pictures 243–250
By Mr. W. J. Peele.

Biographical Sketches: Colonel R. B. Creecy, Mr. W. J. Peele...

General Society Daughters of the Revolution.....257–260
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Abstracts of Wills..... 261
By Mrs. Helen DeB. Wells.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Sixth Volume began in July, 1906.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second-class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kennedy.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury."
"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays," Rodman, Blount Dillard.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow." Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder." Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs. L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman, and E. Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740." Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M. D.

"N. C Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700–1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett." Mr. R. D. W. Connor, "Edward Moseley," Prof. D. H. Hill.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley," by Prof. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok." Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev Joseph Blount Cheshire, D. D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

"The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"History Involved in the Names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina." Kemp P. Battle. LL. D

"A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear" (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), Hon. James Sprunt.

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina" Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred. A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

"Biographical Sketches of Dr. Richard Dillard, Francis Nash, J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred. A. Olds," Mrs. E. E Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

"Biographical Sketches of Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr, and Prof. J. T Alderman," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"Lock's Fundamental Constitution," Junius Davis.

"The White Pictures," W. J. Peele

"North Carolina's Attitude towards the Revolution," Robert Strong.

"Biographical Sketches," Mrs E. E. Moffitt.

"Genealogical Sketches." Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Index to Vol. VI will be mailed with No 1 of Vol. VII

Vols. I, II, III, IV, 25 Cents Each. Vols. V and VI, 35 Cents Each.

NOW IS THE TIME TO
SUBSCRIBE TO THE

NORTH CAROLINA JOURNAL OF EDUCATION

Published twice each month at Durham, North Carolina. under the editorial supervision of Mr. E. C. Brooks, assisted by associate editors and numerous contributors.

SUBSCRIPTION, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR

Address all communications and make all remittances to H. E. SEEMAN, Publisher, Durham, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, Records of different States and Counties, family papers, State histories and biographies will be diligently examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced.

Fee for Such Researches, $5.20 for each Line Traced.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE WILLS,
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R. and Raleigh Circle Colonial Dames.)
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12.00
Same style and size, but unframed	10.00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arm , including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

JOHN C. DREWRY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

Mechanics and Investors Union

A Home Investment Company for Monthly Savings
A Home Loan Company, to Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money. It promotes economy, thrift and punctuality in business and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 will mature a $100 Certificate. One hundred payments will secure a home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, Secretary, 22 Pullen Building.

Allen's Forty Lessons in Bookkeeping. Over 7,000 copies have been used in schools and colleges. Commended by teachers and business men. Price $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, Manager.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery

Aside from a large line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc., we will take care of your orders for RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS.

All orders given our personal attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.
RALEIGH, N. C.

SOUTHERN BOOK EXCHANGE

RALEIGH, N. C.

LARGEST STOCK, BEST SELECTED, LOWEST PRICES OF ANY BOOK STORE IN THE SOUTH.

Headquarters for North Carolina History and all classes of North Carolina Publications, including North Carolina Laws, Journals, Reports, of the Supreme Court and of all other State Departments; also Briefs, Documents, Records, and Catalogues of all Colleges since their foundations; Relics, Autographs, Letters, Plates, Coat of Arms, Stamps, Confederate Money, Coin, etc., 'Found no where else.' ¶ History of other States, Americana and all kinds of Rare Books out of print and valuable. All enquiries answered promptly. All orders given personal. careful attention. guaranteeing satisfaction, before remittance, ¶ Libraries handled on commission and best prices guaranteed. All kinds of books bought, sold and exchanged; best bargains ever offered Missing Nos. in files of all North Carolina Magazines and newspapers supplied at publishers prices; all other Magazines at a very low rate.

King-Crowell Drug Co.

THE MODERN DRUG STORE

Fayettevi le and Hargett Sts. Raleigh, N. C.

BROWN

Funeral Directors and Embalmers

HARGETT AND SALISBURY STREETS

MISSES REESE & CO.,

10 W. Hargett St.

Fine Millinery

Correct Styles and Prices to suit

—ALL—

Trading Stamps given.

STORE CLOSES 6 O'CLOCK

Dr. ERNEST H. BROUGHTON

DENTIST

Associated with
DR. J. H. CRAWFORD

116 Fayetteville Street
RALEIGH, N. C.

The Mecklenburg Hotel

Chase City, Virginia,

IS AN IDEAL PLACE FOR

Health, Pleasure, Rest and Comfort All the Year Round

Because of What Nature, Science and Art

Have Done For It

ART has beautified and adorned it.

SCIENCE has equipped it with the famous Baruch Baths and the most approved Sanitarium Appointments. And

NATURE has done her best in the now famous Mineral Springs of Chloride Calcium, the only known water of its kind in this country or Europe; and of Lithia, containing many fine medicinal properties besides the amount of Lithia equal to any in existence, the combined use of which splendid waters effects wonderful cures in cases of Rheumatism, Eczema, Malarial Poison, Nervous Troubles and conditions showing presence of Uric Acid.

Voluntary Testimonials Received Constantly from our Guests.

These Waters for Sale by the Leading Druggists Everywhere

ESTABLISHED IN 1891

THE COMMERCIAL AND FARMERS BANK

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, . .	$100,000.00
Surplus, . . .	60,000.00
Deposits, . . .	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian.

Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent.

Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.

A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSON, Asst. Cashier.

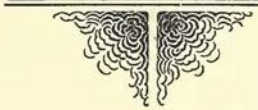
THE

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.



Published at the Capital City
It reaches the whole State
Largest circulation in North Carolina
The State's Representative Newspaper

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
Editor

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1900,	5,700 subscribers
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1901,	6,500 subscribers
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1902,	7,054 subscribers
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1903,	8,201 subscribers
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1904,	9,111 subscribers
1899,	5,200 subscribers	1905,	10,000 subscribers

North Carolina Historical Commission

ESTABLISHED BY LAWS OF 1903

MEMBERS

W. J. PEELE, CHAIRMAN, ...	RALEIGH, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNOR, SECRETARY, . .	RALEIGH, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES, ...	RALEIGH, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER, ...	CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT, ...	ROPER, N. C.

THE Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured, arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners. The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in their efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State.

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30,000

A personal investigation will convince anyone that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

The Citizens National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

CORRESPONDENCE AND PERSONAL CALLS INVITED

Any Business Entrusted to our Care Will Receive Prompt and Courteous Attention

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier.

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
Editor N. C. Booklet,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh. C, N.

FOR

North Carolina Schools

White's Beginner's History of the United States

By Henry Alexander White, of Columbia, S. C.

In this interesting narrative, which is written on the biographical plan, special attention is paid to the acts of heroism and devotion of the men of the South.

Lee Readers

The best literature and the best thought of the South, prepared by an experinced Southern teacher.

The Rose Primer

Contains a small vocabulary, with carefully selected and graded matter and frequent reviews.

Spencer's Practical Writing

Teaches a plain practical hand, moderate in slant, and free from ornamental curves, shade, and meaningless lines.

Steps in English

Meet modern conditions in every respect, and teach the child how to express his thoughts in speaking and writing.

Milne's Arithmetics

Give the pupil an unusually thorough and practical knowledge of arithmetic and a readiness in applying this knowledge.

Natural Geographies

The most widely used series extant. This subject is developed naturally and logically, with Man and his environment as the main theme.

Bruce's United States History

Written by a Southern author for Southern schools; interesting, attractive, and profusely illustrated.

New Century Physiologies

Represents the latest scientific research and study, with the best methods of instruction in right living.

Peterman's Civil Government

Gives a good knowledge of political institutions, commencing with the family government. Special edition for North Carolina.

Webster's Dictionaries

The standard authority followed in all leading school books. Thoroughly revised and up-to date.

Progressive Speller

Based on the lines which govern the growth of a child's intelligence and the acquisition of his vocabulary.

American Book Company

New York Cincinnati Chicago

RAND, McNALLY & CO.

New York. Chicago, London

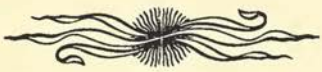
"The Standard Map Makers of the World"



Send for Catalogue of our Educational Publications

THOS. H. BRIGGS & SONS

Raleigh, N. C.

HARDWARE

Buck's Stoves and Ranges

JAP-A-LAC
FLOOR-LAC

S. W. P. the great Paint

Best Goods, Lowest Prices, Square Dealing

DESIRABLE BOOKS

That Should be on the Shelves of the Libraries of Every North Carolina Home

Lutie Andrews McCorkle's Old-Time Stories of the Old North State.

Warren's Stories from English History.

Pratt's America's Story for America's Children. Five Vols.

Katherine B. Massey's Story of Georgia.

Stone & Fickitt's Every Day Life in the Colonies.

Bass' Stories of Pioneer Life.

Horton's The Frozen North.

Kuffer's Stories of Long Ago.

Hyde's Favorite Greek Myths.

Firth's Stories of Old Greece.

Brown's Alice and Tom.

Stone & Fickett's Days and Deeds of a Hundred Years Ago.

Starr's Strange Peoples.

Starr's American Indians.

Fairbank's The Western U. S.

Heath's Home and School Classics (39 Vols. of the finest literature for young people in the world).

Eckstorms' Bird Book (a natural history of birds).

These or any other publications from our large and valuable list may be secured from your local book seller or from

D. C. HEATH & COMPANY

225 Fourth Avenue
NEW YORK

Biographical History of North Carolina

From Colonial Times to the Present

SAM'L A. ASHE, Editor-in-Chief CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher

GREENSBORO, N. C.

The publisher desires to say without fear of contradiction that there has never been anywhere in the United States any other State Biographical venture equalling the Biographical History of North Carolina in scope, selectness of subjects, excellence of literary and historical matter and general mechanical and artistic book-making.

The Biographical History will cover the entire history of the State and will contain sketches signed by authoritative writers of

All the Governors.

All the Chief-Justices.

All the United States Senators.

All the Federal Judges.

All those who have held Cabinet and Diplomatic positions.

Nearly all those distinguished in the Confederate service.

Nearly all the Supreme Court Justices.

Many of the Superior Court Judges.

Distinguished Generals, Military Men and Naval officers.

All the more prominent Editors, Educators, Ministers, Authors, Doctors, Lawyers, Agriculturists and Politicians.

All the more prominent Industrial and Commercial workers.

The most distinguished women.

In a word, as complete a publication as possible of all those who have adorned the annals of North Carolina.

Write for Booklet of Reviews and Testimonials.

CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher,

GREENSBORO, North Carolina

TRENT'S SOUTHERN WRITERS

Extensively used in Women's Clubs.

Should be on the shelves of every public and private library.

THE McMILLAN COMPANY

4th National Bank Building, ATLANTA, GA.

Send for descriptive circular or call and examine the books at our Summer School text-book exhibit in Raleigh.

Miss Dixie Washington Leach

MINIATURES ON IVORY OR PORCELAIN

Access to State Library where copies can be made on Miniature from old portraits.

STUDIO 405 TRUST BUILDING

RALEIGH, North Carolina

FOR

PIANOS, ORGANS

AND EVERYTHING MUSICAL
AT REASONABLE PRICES

SEE

DARNELL & THOMAS

RALEIGH, N. C.

B. F. Johnson Publishing Comp'y

EDUCATIONAL
PUBLICATIONS

ATLANTA RICHMOND DALLAS

Modern Books for Modern Schools

Vol. VI. JANUARY, 1907 No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLINA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

Page

A State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records - - - - - - - - - 159
By R. D. W. Connor

The Battle of Rockfish Creek - - - - - - 177
By J. O. Carr

Governor Jesse Franklin - - - - - - - - 185
By J. T. Alderman

North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition 204

Biographical Sketches - - - - - - - - 206
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt
(ILLUSTRATED)

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

VOLUME VI.

Glimpses of History in the Names of our Counties,
Kemp. P. Battle, LL. D.

A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), ... Mr. James Sprunt.

The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina, Richard Dillard, M. D.

Gov. Thomas Burke, . . . Mr. J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton.

Some North Carolina Histories and their Authors,
Professor Edward P. Moses.

The Borough Towns of North Carolina, . . Mr. Francis Nash.

The John White Pictures, ... Mr. W. J. Peele.

Gov. Jesse Franklin, ... Professor J. T. Alderman.

Industrial Life in Early North Carolina, . . Mr. T. M. Pittman.

Colonial and Revolutionary Costumes in North Carolina,
Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

North Carolina's Attitude to the Revolution, Mr. Robert Cowan Strong.

The Fundamental Constitutions and the Effects on the Colony,
Mr. Junius Davis.

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1906. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VI, are requested to notify at once.

Address,
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, North Carolina.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

LaFayette Examining Canova's Statue of Washington in the Rotunda of the State House, 1825.

Vol. VI. JANUARY, 1907. No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
(Nee Hooper.)

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VI JANUARY, 1907 No. 3

A STATE LIBRARY BUILDING AND DEPARTMENT OF ARCHIVES AND RECORDS.

BY R. D. W. CONNOR.

"The roots of the Present lie deep in the Past, and the Past is not dead to him who would understand how the Present came to be what it is."

A people who will constantly bear this great truth in mind will come to regard their history as something more than a fascinating story with which to beguile a winter's evening; they will think of their Past as something better than merely a subject for Fourth-of-July orations; they will study the careers of their great men with higher and nobler purposes than as stepping stones for membership into the "Sons" of this or the "Daughters" of that patriotic organization. Not that the romance of history, or the eloquence of the orator, or the formation of patriotic societies, are to be put aside as unworthy of serious consideration. But the study of history does have another and more important side to it, and a side too that often escapes the notice of those most in need of a knowledge of their Past. It is this: no men can safely be entrusted with the control of the Present who are ignorant of the Past; and no people who are indifferent to their Past need hope to make their Future great.

This is a lesson which those states of the Union that enjoy the greatest historical and literary reputation learned many years ago; it is a lesson which our own state needs to take seriously to heart. I am happy in thinking that our people are learning it and that they realize to-day more than ever before the value of the steadying ballast which an accurate knowledge of the Past gives to the Present. But it is a lesson which, though fully appreciated, will be of little value unless the material is preserved which is necessary to make the Past intelligent to the Present and the Future. To this feature of the lesson I desire your closest attention.

We North Carolinians are very proud of our history and indulge ourselves in the pleasure of a great deal of boasting about it. But frequently when this indulgence, like an opiate, begins to soothe our spirits and we doze away in blissful contemplation of the greatness of our Past, it comes like a cold-water shock to find that the World, instead of gazing in admiring astonishment, is either whirling along in densest ignorance, or vigorously disputing our most cherished claims. Then we wake up, begin to say harsh things about our traducers, and clamor loudly about envy and jealousy. But the critical World, searching the pages of the great historians of our country and finding no mention of those "cherished claims," naturally asks for proof; and lo! we look, and the proof, which we believe would settle our claims beyond all dispute, has been lost, destroyed, burned, or stolen by envious partisans. Whom can we blame but ourselves, for who else should take care to preserve this proof? Surely it is an anomaly in our character as a people and as a state that we should be so proud of our history and so careless in the preservation of the records that would establish our claims forever. It may be doubted if any other of the thirteen original states has suffered more in this respect than North Carolina, or is now taking so little care for the preservation of the evidences of her greatness. Surely this is modesty run in the ground!

Even this very carelessness illustrates the influence of the Past upon the Present, and the value of a study of the Past if for no other purpose than to avoid its blunders. Our carelessness in the preservation of our historical sources seems to have come down to us as an unwelcomed legacy from the Past. As long ago as 1748 Governor Gabriel Johnston in a letter to the Lords of the Board of Trade wrote:

"The Publick Records lye in a miserable condition, one part of them at Edenton near the Virginia Line in a place without Lock or Key; a great part of them in the Secretarys House at Cape Fear above Two Hundred Miles Distance from the other; Some few of 'em at the Clerk of the Council's House at Newbern, so that in whatever part of the Colony a man happens to be, if he wants to consult any paper or record he must send some Hundred of Miles before he can come at it."*

It seems that our ancestors had no more regard for their valuable documents than their posterity have.

No better illustration of the effect of this almost criminal negligence in caring for our historical sources can be found than the history of the documents relating to the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence. The people of North Carolina are so firmly convinced that their story of this interesting event is correct that they swear by it spite of lost documents; they have placed on the flag of their state the date, "May 20th, 1775," in the face of all Thomas Jefferson's disbelieving sarcasm; they even lose patience with anybody who hints that the event might have taken place on May 31. And yet not one of the leading historians of the United States, from Bancroft to Woodrow Wilson, has accepted our version. Why? Whose the fault? The following facts will answer these very natural questions. Dr. George Graham, whose work on the "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence" is the fullest and best treatment in existence, quotes the following paragraph from Martin's History of North Carolina:

*Colonial Records of North Carolina, Vol. IV., p. 1165.

"These resolutions [of May 20, 1775] were unanimously adopted and subscribed by the delegates. James Jack, then of Charlotte, but now residing in the State of Georgia, was engaged to be the bearer of the resolutions to the President of Congress, and directed to deliver copies of them to the delegates in Congress from North Carolina. The President returned a polite answer to the address which accompanied the resolutions, in which he highly approved of the measures adopted by the delegates of Mecklenburg, but deemed the subject of the resolutions premature to be laid before Congress. Messrs. Caswell, Hooper and Hewes forwarded a joint letter, in which they complimented the people of Mecklenburg for their zeal in the common cause."

What has become of these two letters—these very important letters, either of which would settle the dispute forever? In all the years of controversy over the Mecklenburg Declaration, no one has produced them, or copies of them. Is it not strange that documents so valuable should not have been carefully preserved? But even this is not all. Dr. Graham continues:

"At the meeting of the delegates in Charlotte, John McKnitt Alexander was chosen secretary, and thus became custodian of the records. In April, 1800, twenty-five years after this meeting, these records, including the Mecklenburg Declaration, were burned in Alexander's house. In the meantime, however, the old secretary, as he is called, had transcribed not less than five copies of the original resolutions. . . . . There is abundant evidence to prove that at least seven authentic copies of these resolutions were in existence before the proceedings of the convention were burned in 1800. Of these seven transcripts, four, at the direction of the delegates, were transmitted to Congress at Philadelphia by John McKnitt Alexander, shortly after the meeting at Charlotte adjourned. One to the President, and one copy each to the three members from North Carolina. A fifth copy appeared in the Cape Fear Mercury in June, 1775, within thirty days after the declaration was adopted. A sixth copy was presented by Alexander to Dr. Hugh Williamson, who was then writing a history of the State. . . . And a seventh copy of the declaration, which the author says was obtained before 1800, the year the records were burned, is preserved in Martin's History of North Carolina."

These facts show that at one time there certainly was plenty of evidence in existence to settle beyond controversy what took place in Charlotte in May, 1775. What became of it? This was an event generally regarded as the proudest in a proud history. Is it possible that a people proud of their history and proud that they are proud of it, would complacently permit every one of these valuable documents to be destroyed without making one single effort to preserve them? And yet read the story as told in Tompkins' History of Mecklenburg County. He says:

"The official papers [of the 20th of May meeting] were burned in the fire which destroyed John McKnitt Alexander's house in 1800."

"A copy of the original was sent before the burning of the house to the historian, Williamson, in New York, and it, together with the other sources of his history, were (sic) destroyed by a fire in that city."

"The Martin copy is so called from its publication in Martin's History of North Carolina. . . . As to this particular document of the Mecklenburg Declaration, Martin . . . obtained it in the western part of the State prior to the year 1800. . . . The papers from which Martin compiled his history were sent to France and have disappeared."

"A third copy, called the Garden copy, was published in 1828 by Alexander Garden of Lee's Legion, and this is almost exactly identical with the Martin copy, which is regarded as the authentic copy." After showing that Garden could not have obtained his copy from Martin, Tompkins says: "The data for Garden's anecdotes has (sic) been lost."

But what about the Cape Fear Mercury of June, 1775? "No copy of the Cape Fear Mercury of June, 1775," says Tompkins, "has ever come to light except the copy which Gov. Martin sent to London and which Mr. Stevenson, of Virginia, borrowed and did not return."

The letter of the President of Congress gone; the joint letter of the delegates gone; Alexander's copy burned; Williamson's copy burned; Martin's copy lost; Garden's copy lost; the Cape Fear Mercury stolen—is it any wonder that Jefferson characterized the Declaration as "a very unjustifiable quiz," saying that for proof it appeals to "an original book, which is burnt, to Mr. Alexander, who is dead, to a joint letter from Caswell, Hughes (sic), and Hooper, all dead, to a copy sent to the dead Caswell, and another sent to Doctor Williamson, now probably dead."

These facts tell us why the historians do not accept our story, and they place the responsibility on our shoulders, where it belongs.

Another illustration of this point is found in the burning of the State-house at Raleigh in the morning of June 21, 1831. The Raleigh Register of June 23 contained the following account:

"It is our painful and melancholy duty to announce to the public another appalling instance of loss by fire, which will be deeply felt and lamented by every individual in the State. It is nothing less than the total destruction of the capitol of our State located in this city. . . . The State Library is also consumed, and the statue of Washington, that proud monument of national gratitude, which was our pride and glory, is so mutilated and defaced, that none can behold it but with mournful feelings, and the conviction involuntarily forces itself upon their (sic) minds, that the loss is one that cannot be repaired. The most active exertions were made to rescue this chef d'oeuvre of Canova from the ravages of the devouring element, nor were they desisted from until the danger became imminent."

THE RUINS OF CANOVA'S STATUE OF WASHINGTON,
NOW IN THE HALL OF HISTORY AT RALEIGH

The same paper of June 30 adds this information:

"Nothing was saved from the Library, nor could any attempt for that purpose be made by reason of the suffocating smoke which filled the room. It was in its infancy and the loss can easily be repaired with one or two exceptions. We allude to the collection of our old Legislative Journals, brought down in almost unbroken succession from 1715 to the present day. Lawson's history of the State, valuable only however for its antiquity, was also burnt."

The Raleigh Star of June 23 tells the story in the following words:

"Great concern was manifested for the preservation of the statue of Washington, which stood in the center of the rotunda, and an effort was made to save it; but it was vain and fruitless; and this monument, reared by the grateful and patriotic citizens of North Carolina, in honor of the father of our country, at an expense of about $30,000, and which was said to be the finest piece of sculpture in the world, was abandoned in despair to share the fate of the superstructure which it had so long graced."

Unfortunate as was the destruction of this splendid work, its loss was not the worst feature of the incident; the very worst feature was the fact that the statue could have been saved but for the short-sightedness and parsimony of the legislature. A noble statue of the greatest of Americans, costing $30,000, a monument no less to the wisdom, patriotism and liberality of our forefathers than to the genius of the great Italian sculptor, was destroyed because a few politicians, without courage, without the generous fire of patriotic impulse, thinking to incur the favor of the populace, refused to appropriate the sum of $1,200 to secure its safety. The wretched story is told in the following paragraph from the Cape Fear Recorder, which, after lamenting the loss of the statue, says:

"Alfred Moore, Esq., one of the members from Brunswick County, made a motion in the first session of the General Assembly, after the statue was conveyed to Raleigh, that it should be placed on rollers, and that the doors of the capitol should be enlarged, so as to render it practicable to move it from the edifice in the event of a fire. The expense was estimated at $1,200. The motion of Mr. Moore was renewed at the following session and was grounded on his observation of the carelessness and negligence of the menials and workmen employed about the capitol, and on these facts he predicted the event which now affects so extensively and so deeply the inhabitants of the State; and he rung and rerung this prediction in the ears of his colleagues—that the capitol would be burned! The warning was unheeded; and we naturally enquire, on what defensible ground was it? Is it not to be imputed to those narrow views of economy, which are not only opposed to the counsels of liberal patriotism, in instances such as this, but also too often shed a blighting influence on the lasting interests and prosperity of the public?"*

* Of this great work of Canova, the Countess Albrizzi in "The Works of Antonio Canova," illustrated by Henry Moses the great English engraver, says:

"In this fine composition Canova has not only maintained the dignity of his subject, but (warmed by admiration of the amiable qualities of

A third illustration of our carelessness with our records occurring in our own time was related to me recently by Colonel Fred A. Olds, the enthusiastic and zealous director of the Hall of History. In the basement of the court-house in Cumberland County a few years ago, as he was informed, were stored hundreds of records and other documents running back to the first settlement of Cross Creek. Dust and cobwebs of course covered them, and this fact, which rather added value to them in the eyes of the historian and the antiquary, led the county board of health to condemn the lot as breeders of germs. At their orders these precious documents were dumped in the street and reduced to ashes!

---

this illustrious man) has also infused into the statue an expression of the gentleness and benevolence which attempered his severer virtues.

"The hero is sitting with an air of elegant simplicity on an elegant seat, raised on a double square base. Nothing can surpass the dignity of the attitude or the living air of meditation which it breathes; and the grandeur of the style, the force and freedom of the execution, the close and animated resemblance to the original, all conspire to place the statue in the highest rank of art. The fine tunic which he wears is seen only at the knee, being covered by an ample ornamental cuirass; above which is a magnificent mantle fastened by a clasp on the right shoulder, and flowing down behind in majestic folds. Beneath his right foot, which is extended forward, is a parazonium sheathed, and a sceptre, signifying that the successful termination of the war, had rendered them now useless.

"The hero is in the act of writing on a tablet held in his left hand, and resting on the thigh, which is slightly raised for its support. From the following words already inscribed on it, we learn the subject which occupies his mind—'George Washington to the people of the United States—Friends and Fellow-citizens.' In his right hand he holds the pen with a suspended air, as if anxiously meditating on the laws fitted to promote the happiness of his countrymen; a border of the mantle, raised to the tablet by the hand which supports it, gives a fine effect to this graceful and decorous action. In his noble countenance the sculptor has finely portrayed all his great and amiable qualities, inspiring the beholder with mingled sensations of affection and veneration. This statue is only in a slight degree larger than life; his robust form corresponding with his active and vigorous mind.

"If to this great man a worthy cause was not wanting, or the means of acquiring the truest and most lasting glory, neither has he been less fortunate after death, when, by the genius of so sublime an artist, he appears again among his admiring countrymen in this dear and venerable form; not as a soldier, though not inferior to the greatest generals, but in his loftier and more benevolent character of the virtuous citizen and enlightened lawgiver."

With the ascending smoke vanished forever a mine of historical sources which, had it been opened, would have told the story of one of the most inspiring events in the history of North Carolina.

Many other instances of the destruction of valuable historical sources through carelessness, negligence, indifference and ignorance might easily be cited, but they would add no new force to those already given. The important question is, What shall we learn from these facts?

First of all, we ought to learn that "those narrow views of economy, which are not only opposed to the counsels of liberal patriotism, . . . but also too often shed a blighting influence on the lasting interests and prosperity of the public," can be defended on the ground neither of economy nor of patriotism. Was it economy to refuse the appropriation of $1,200 to insure the safety of a work which cost $30,000? Putting it merely on a material basis, how many times $1,200 would the state have made during all these years from the visitors who would have come to our capital city to see this noble work of art! Who can estimate the thousands spent annually by visitors to Dresden who go from the four corners of the earth to see the great Sistine Madonna? Was it patriotic—that is to say, was it a faithful fulfilment of the trust imposed in them by their constituents, for the members of the legislature to refuse the appropriation of $1,200 for the preservation of an object that would have been a source of inspiration to generations of their sons and daughters? It was neither economical nor patriotic; nor did the refusal to make the appropriation come from an honest desire to be either; it sprang from a want of trust in the good sense and patriotism of the people.

So it is neither economical nor patriotic to permit our present State Library, Supreme Court Library and the collection in the Hall of History to remain day after day in constant danger of destruction by fire for the lack of a suitable building. We have a State Library creditable to North Carolina. It contains 40,000 volumes exclusive of the pamphlets and bound newspapers in which the history of the state is written. The destruction of this library would be a calamity to North Carolina from which there would be no recovery—thousands of books that could never be replaced; hundreds of newspapers nowhere else to be found; hundreds of pamphlets that could not be bought with gold. A very conservative estimate of the money-value of this library would place it from $150,000 to $200,000. In addition to the State Library, the same unprotected building holds the Supreme Court Library, one of the best state law libraries in our country, containing 17,000 volumes, worth at the lowest estimate $75,000. Adjoining this building is the Hall of History, a large hall at one end of the State Museum. Through the enthusiastic efforts of Colonel Fred A. Olds, who deserves the thanks of all patriotic citizens for his unselfish labors, more than 4,000 historic relics, documents, papers and pictures have been collected there illustrating every period and almost every phase of the life of the state. It is doubtful if any other state in the Union has a more valuable or more instructive collection of historic relics. In an interesting story of the Hall of History, Colonel Olds says:*

"North Carolina is yet rich in such objects, notably of the Colonial and Revolutionary periods; but until this collection began, a little over three years ago, nothing had been done, except in what may be termed very justly a local way, to gather together such objects. By such failure the State has suffered enormous loss, due to the burning of court-houses, public buildings, and, most of all, private homes, in some of which there were extensive groups of objects, the loss of which is irreparable. But at last the gathering together at Raleigh, where by all manner of means the collection ought to be, has been begun, and the fact that the number of objects now exceeds the 4,000 mark shows not only zeal in collecting, but also an awakened public interest. . . . It is felt that the present Hall of History is what may truly be termed a stepping-stone to higher things; in other words, that it is but the forerunner of a far more noble one, generous as to space, and built on the most modern lines as regards the elimination of risk by fire. Given such a building, and the writer can undertake to secure almost anything in North Carolina."

*North Carolina Booklet, October, 1906.

It is impossible to place anything like a money-value on these three collections—the State Library, the Supreme Court Library, and the Hall of History. They represent thousands of dollars and years of patriotic labor. They are beyond all price, and yet year after year they are left in buildings inadequate in size and arrangement, hardly creditable to a great state in appearance, and totally unprotected from fire. A fire once started in either would sweep like a hurricane through both and reduce the whole to smoke and ashes in spite of all human effort. Is it economy to leave these public treasures thus exposed to destruction? Is it patriotic? Does not the destruction of the Mecklenburg Declaration papers teach us a useful lesson? Has the burning of the capitol no warning for us, the loss of the library, the destruction of the great statue of Washington? And shall we let these warnings go unheeded? Is it possible that the people of North Carolina care so little for their great Past, for the development of an interest in their history, for the cultivation of literature and art among their children, that they would frown down an appropriation from their public money for the erection of a fire-proof building in which these treasures would be safe? The very question is almost a slander on the good name of the state.

The state is amply able to erect such a building—a building absolutely fire-proof, stately in architectural design, and ample for the purposes to which it shall be devoted. It would be much more than a library building. Patriotic societies would have rooms there for their meetings and records; the State Literary and Historical Association would have offices and record rooms set apart for its work; there too would be offices and archive rooms for a State Commissioner of Records and Archives; a spacious hall would be dedicated as a Hall of History which would be the instructor of thousands in the history of North Carolina:—in a word it would be the headquarters for all the historical and literary activities of future generations of North Carolinians. The hallways would be lined with statues, the walls with portraits, preserving the forms and features of the great men and women who have served the state and nation. On the walls, too, would hang paintings executed by native artists of the great events in our history—the landing of the first Englishmen on Roanoke; the famous May-day scene of '75 at Charlotte; the greater event at Halifax in April of '76; the mad charges up the sides of King's Mountain; the steady resistance at Guilford Court House; Davie and his fellows resting under the old poplar on a balmy October day dreaming of a great university; James C. Dobbin in the halls of legislation pleading with a power surpassing eloquence for those who could not plead for themselves; the long gray line sweeping up the slopes of Gettysburg—all these and many more such historic scenes would be there to inspire hundreds of North Carolina boys and girls with a desire to "serve so good a state and so great a people." And there, too, would come students to search its treasures who would do for North Carolina and the South all that Bryant and Lowell and Longfellow and Holmes and Emerson and Bancroft and Fiske and a host of other great names have done for Massachusetts and New England. Visited every year by thousands, such a building, like a great beacon-light on a hill, would shed an inspiring light on the historical, literary and educational life of the state that would be worth a hundred times over all the money expended in its construction. It is not possible that the people of North Carolina would regard with disfavor an appropriation for such a purpose; sensible and patriotic people will applaud the legislature that takes this great forward step.

A second lesson equally valuable and equally necessary which the illustrations I have given ought to impress on us is the importance of collecting, copying, editing and publishing the historical sources now in existence while they are yet in existence. I have shown how hundreds of invaluable documents and other sources have been lost or destroyed through the carelessness, indifference and ignorance of their owners. Those are hopelessly gone, and with them a mass of historical wealth that can never be regained. But thousands of others remain which should be preserved. I have in mind now a collection of the papers of one of North Carolina's greatest sons containing dozens of most valuable letters, never published, from nearly all of his great contemporaries in the state and many in the nation: letters from Swain, Badger, Graham, Ruffin; from John Randolph of Roanoke, Webster, Marshall, Story, Hamilton, Kent and many more. There is no more valuable collection of private papers in the state and yet for the lack of such a building as I have described and the absence of a means of making use of them, they will doubtless soon be lost to North Carolina.

The owner, who lives in a distant state, has already expressed her intention of presenting them to the Library of Congress at Washington, and I must reluctantly confess that under present conditions I could not urge her to present them to North Carolina, although I know they properly belong here.

There are many other such collections in and out of the state, stuffed away in dark corners, and dusty archives, in pigeon holes, vaults, desks, attics and cellars, containing thousands of records, public and private letters, and other manuscripts of great value. Yet as matters now stand they are as absolutely useless to their owners or to the state as the miser's gold to the miser; but if collected, edited and published, would be a source of mental and moral wealth to North Carolina beyond that which the gold of all the misers could buy. Many of the owners of these collections would willingly part with them if the state had a safe place for their preservation and would provide for their publication.

What then can the state do? The state can follow the example of Alabama, Mississippi, New York, Wisconsin, Iowa, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and all the New England states, and make appropriations for their preservation and publication. The states of Alabama and Mississippi are doing more than any other Southern states for the elucidation of their history and present the best examples for our own state to follow. Each of these states has created a State Department of Archives and Records with a commissioner in charge whose duty it is to care for their historical sources. Let us follow their examples. Such a department, with a commissioner appointed by the Historical Commission, would not cost over $4,000 or $5,000 a year—a trifling sum in comparison with its value to the state. The Alabama act recites the duty of the Alabama commissioner as follows:

"He shall have control and direction of the work and operations of the department, he shall preserve its collections, care for the official archives that may come into its custody, collect as far as possible all materials bearing on the history of the state and of the territory included therein from the earliest times, prepare the biennial register hereinafter provided, diffuse knowledge in reference to the history and resources of the state; and he is charged with the particular duty of gathering data concerning Alabama soldiers in the war between the states."

The biennial register mentioned must contain: "(1) Brief sketches of the several state officials, the members of Congress from Alabama, the supreme court judges, the members of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Alabama; (2) rosters of all state and county officials; (3) lists of all state institutions, with officials; (4) state and county population and election statistics, and (5) miscellaneous statistics."

We cannot do better in North Carolina than follow the example of the state of Alabama. All patriotic citizens would aid the commissioner in his work. Those who possess documents of historical value would gladly place them at his disposal. Thousands of originals or certified copies of church and court records, letters, maps, old newspapers, portraits, manuscripts of all kinds, and other material of value to the student of history, would be entrusted to him for the benefit of the public and a safe repository would be provided for their preservation. All material which cannot be parted with permanently would be returned to the owners after copies were made; and provision would be made for copying such documents as the owners are unwilling to part with at all. The expenses of the work would of course be met by the department. The material after being carefully edited would be published at the expense of the state and due acknowledgment would be made to all who aided in the work. The great value of such work to the state is splendidly illustrated by the monumental work of Colonel William L. Saunders and Chief Justice Walter Clark in the editing and publication of the Colonial and State Records prior to the year 1790. Until these volumes revealed the true story of the first century and a half of the state's history, it was fashionable among historians to pass it over with slurs and sneers or to ignore it altogether. But such an attitude now would very justly condemn any author to deserved oblivion. What citizen of North Carolina is there who is not gratified and proud of the rescue by these two loyal sons of the good name of their mother?

But as great as this work is, the complete history of North Carolina can never be written until a similar work is done for every decade subsequent to 1790. It is a work that cannot be accomplished except through the medium of the state. It is a work that cannot be accomplished within a year, nor within two years, but is rather the work of a generation. Let us earnestly hope that the intelligent patriotism of the state will demand that it shall be done and thoroughly done at the public expense through a State Department of Records and Archives.

Need any one urge upon intelligent men the necessity for such work? Says Judge Johnson in his "Life of Nathanael Greene": "There is and perhaps ought to be a clannish spirit in the states of the Union, which will ever dispose the writers they produce to blazon with peculiar zeal the virtues and talents of the eminent men of their respective states. . . . It will probably happen in future times, that the states that have produced the ablest writers will enjoy the reputation of having produced the ablest statesmen, generals and orators." Just so it happens that the World knows by heart the story of Samuel Adams, but even his own people have forgotten the equally great services of Cornelius Harnett; the praise of Richard Henry Lee is on every tongue, but no tongue speaks the name of William R. Davie; the services of John Jay have been justly commemorated, but the more brilliant judicial career of James Iredell is unknown among his own people. Had the story of Virginia Dare occurred in Massachusetts, can it be supposed that no Longfellow would have been found to wrap it up in immortal verse? Consider for a moment how barren is the story of Evangeline when compared to that of the little heroine of the Lost Colony; yet the pen of the poet has brought tears to the eyes of the royal descendant of him in whose name the cruel deed was done. The friendship of an Indian chief probably saved our colony from annihilation, while the hostility of King Phillip came near to destroying the settlement of the Puritan; but no Irving has told the story of Tom Blunt. All the World knows by heart the story of the midnight ride of Paul Revere because a great poet commanded,

> "Listen, my children, and you shall hear
> Of the midnight ride of Paul Revere."

But no poet has commanded the World to harken to the thrilling midnight ride of Mary Slocum.

And there will be no Bancroft, no Fiske, no McMaster to tell our story; no Longfellow and no Irving to write our literature until the work of preserving and preparing for use the sources of our history has been done. So long as we neglect it we need not be surprised, nor will it be manly to complain, if the "scorner shall snear at and the witling defame us."

THE BATTLE OF ROCKFISH CREEK IN DUPLIN COUNTY.

BY J. O. CARR.

A period of one hundred and twenty-five years has elapsed since the battle of Rockfish Creek was fought in Duplin County on the 2d of August, 1781; but not one line has ever been written to commemorate this event, and few historians know of its occurrence.

In order that the reader may better understand the subject of this sketch, it is well to give an account of the relative movements of the American and British armies in North Carolina at that time.

About the first of February, 1781, Maj. James H. Craig, a British military officer of repute, entered the Cape Fear River with several hundred soldiers prepared to take and hold Wilmington. He had been sent from Charleston by Lord Cornwallis with instructions to seize the town and make it a place of refuge for the Tories and a place of retreat for the British army in case of any disaster, while Cornwallis himself proceeded to the Piedmont section of the state with the hope of completing the conquest of North Carolina.

On the very day that Craig entered Wilmington the battle of Cowan's Ford was fought, in which the brilliant and gallant William L. Davidson was killed, and Cornwallis and Gen. Nathaniel Greene were engaged in the famous campaign of 1781. Craig immediately issued a proclamation urging the people of North Carolina to renew their allegiance to the royal government, and the Tories throughout the State were rallying around the standard of the enemy—some because of their loyalty to the English government, and others because they saw no hope in further resistance; but there were yet many who were willing to die in the cause they had espoused. It is said that twelve out of fifteen companies of militia in Bladen County were at heart favorably disposed to the Crown, though still enlisted in the American cause. To some extent a similar condition existed in Duplin and New Hanover Counties, and in June, 1781, out of a draft of 70 in Duplin for the Continental army only 24 appeared (1).

HOME OF ALEXANDER LILLINGTON.

Immediately after arriving in Wilmington, Maj. Craig began depredations in the county and sent a party up the North East River to the "great bridge," which spanned the river about twelve miles north of Wilmington, where it was crossed by the Duplin road. The bridge was demolished and some American store-ships, which lay concealed there for safety, were burned. It was not easy to understand why the bridge was destroyed unless it be that Craig feared an attack from the Militia of the adjoining counties. This was the main crossing into the northern part of New Hanover and Duplin, and continual vigilance was kept at this post by the opposing forces. The Militia of New Hanover, Bladen and Duplin, consisting of about seven hundred men, took position here to prevent incursions into the country. Temporary fortifications were made and after some skirmishing across the river Craig's men returned to Wilmington, and the Militia under command of Gen. Alexander Lillington continued to hold the post until the army of Cornwallis entered Wilmington in April, 1781. Realizing the impossibility of holding the place longer, Gen. Lillington ordered a hasty retreat to Kinston, where he disbanded the Militia, except one company, on the 28th of April, 1781, at which time Cornwallis had proceeded to the center of Duplin, where he was carrying consternation to the hearts of the people. Checkmated and outgeneraled by Greene in his marvelous retreat through the State, Cornwallis was wreaking vengeance on the inhabitants and was leaving behind him desolation and ruin. He left Craig still in charge at Wilmington for the purpose of rallying the Tories and keeping the Whigs subdued in the surrounding country, and there did not remain a semblance of an American army in North Carolina. However, Craig's repeated expeditions into New Hanover, Duplin and Onslow made it necessary to reorganize the Militia, and four hundred men were collected in Duplin under Col. Kenan, and quite a number in Bladen under Col. Brown.

(1) Colonial Records, vol. XV, p. 490.

After the departure of Cornwallis, Craig's forces first proceeded toward New Berne with the purpose of subduing all the country east of the North East River, and on June 28th, 1781, Gen. Lillington sent a dispatch from Richlands, Onslow County, to Major Abraham Molton in Duplin, informing him that the British with about eight hundred Tories and regulars were advancing from Rutherfords Mill (1) towards

(1) Rutherford's Mill was east of the Northeast River, between Wilmington and Richlands.

Richlands, and instructing him to muster all the forces he could without delay (1). Molton immediately informed Gov. Burke of the situation and proceeded to raise a levy of troops in Duplin. It seems that Col. Kenan was otherwise engaged at this time, probably guarding the crossing at Rockfish Creek. On July 6th, Col. Kenan wrote Gov. Burke that one hundred Duplin men had marched to join Gen. Lillington at Richlands Chapel and fifty others were ready to go. Again on July 9th, he wrote the Governor that the enemy, which was moving toward Richlands, had returned to Rutherford's Mill, and that he had ordered a draft of two hundred men to be made from Duplin immediately, but that he had no powder nor lead—not one round—and urged the Governor to supply them with ammunition, as they could not take the field until supplied. And again on July 15th, he wrote the Governor that the enemy had moved out of Wilmington and were rebuilding the "long bridge"; that it was their intention to give no more paroles, but would sell every man's property who would not join them; that they had one hundred light horse, well equipped, and four hundred and seventy foot; and that he was informed that they were determined to be at Duplin County House the next Monday. (2) He further stated that they had no ammunition and could get none, and renewed his request to be supplied. On July 24th, Gen. Alexander Lillington wrote the Governor that a part of Caswell's army had reached Rockfish, in Duplin County, which was then held by Col. Kenan, and that Col. Kenan had informed him by letter that he had no ammunition. (3) It is apparent from all these communications that Kenan, Caswell and Lillington regarded the situation as serious, and thought

(1) Colonial Records, vol. XV, pp. 496 and 499.
(2) Colonial Records, vol. XV, p. 535.
(3) Colonial Records, vol. XV, p. 567.

ROCKFISH CREEK BRIDGE.

it very important that Craig's army should be checked in its march through the State. The importance of this resistance is readily seen when we consider the fact that Cornwallis had traversed the State and had just passed into Virginia without serious damage to his own army; for, while he had won no decisive victory, yet he had, in effect, subdued the State and had left it with no organized army; and Craig's expeditions were intended to give courage to the Tories, who were ready to support the enemy at any time.

THE BATTLE GROUND.

Rockfish Creek, now the dividing line between Duplin and Pender Counties, was then the boundary between Duplin and New Hanover. The old Duplin road leading from Wilmington, along which Cornwallis had marched, crossed the creek about a half mile east of the Wilmington and Weldon Rail Road, and passed a few yards west of where the present county bridge now stands. This was the most convenient place for an army to make its passage, but it was hoped, and without much reason, that the Militia would be able to entrap the British here and win a signal victory, and likely such would have been the result had our troops been supplied with ammunition. Col. Kenan, who was chief in command at this time, and who had planned the attack, fortified himself on Rockfish Creek, at the crossing above described, by throwing up dirt-works just north of the ford, slight traces of which can now be seen, and waited the approach of the enemy. The fortifications were well planned so as to give the Militia every possible advantage as the enemy was crossing the creek, for their only hope was to make an attack while a crossing was being attempted. Craig had light artillery, some cavalry and over four hundred footmen, all well equipped, and was more than prepared to resist any force that the Whigs could put in the field. On the 2d of August, 1781, he attempted to cross the creek and was vigorously attacked by the brave Militiamen under Col. Kenan, though without ammunition sufficient to even give hope of success. Craig used his entire force, including his artillery, and the inevitable result was the defeat of our troops, outnumbered and unequipped as they were. There is now in existence an old cannon ball, about three inches in diameter, which was left at the place of battle by the British army; and while it is insignificant as compared with modern instruments of warfare, yet it was much superior to anything used by the Duplin Militia.

The accounts of this battle have only been preserved by two eye-witnesses, and these are not as complete as we would like to have them; however, they throw some light on the matter, and without them we would have nothing reliable.

Col. Kenan on the same day wrote the Governor as follows:(1)

DUPLIN, August 2d, 1781.

SIR:—I imbodied all the Militia I Could in this County to the Amount of about 150 men and was reinforced by Gen'l Caswell with about 180 and took post at a place Called rockfish. The British this day Came against me and the Militia again after a few rounds Broak and it was out of my power and all my Officers to rally them. They have all Dispersed. Before the men Broak we lost none, But the light horse pursued and I am afraid have taken 20 or 30 men. I Cannot Give You a full acct., but the Bearer, Capt. James, who was in the Action, Can inform your Excellency of any Particular. He acted with Becoming Bravery during the whole action. I am now Convinced this County with Several others will be Overrun by the British and Tories. Your Excellency will Excuse as I cannot Give a more full accot.

I am Sir Your very humbl St.

On the 30th of November, 1784, William Dickson, who participated in the fight, wrote a letter to his cousin in Ireland, which contained the following reference to the battle:

"Col. Kenan's Militia had not made a stand more than ten days when Maj. Craig marched his main force, with field pieces, defeated and drove us out of our works, and made some of our men prisoners (here I narrowly escaped being taken or cut down by the dragoons). The enemy stayed several days in Duplin County (this being the first week in August, 1781). The Royalists gathered together very fast, and we were now reduced again to the uttermost extremity.

(1) Colonial Records, vol. XV, p. 593.

The enemy were now more cruel to the distressed inhabitants than Cornwallis' army had been before. Some men collected and formed a little flying camp and moved near the enemy's lines and made frequent sallies on their rear flanks, while others fled from their homes and kept out of the enemy's reach. Maj. Craig marched from Duplin to Newbern, plundered the town, destroyed the public stores, and then immediately marched back to Wilmington to secure the garrison."(1)

The battle of Rockfish is not one of the important battles of the Revolution, and its result, whatever it might have been, could in no way have affected the ultimate issue of the war. However, it throws some light on the history of the times and shows us what the brave home guard of the Revolution had to contend with, and how important a part of the great army it was. Without the "Militia," life would have been intolerable in Duplin during the great struggle, and Toryism would have deterred the people from giving support and aid to the far-away soldier, who was doing battle for our freedom. After the defeat of the "Duplin Militia" at Rockfish, Craig laid his cruel hand upon the inhabitants of Duplin, robbed them of their property, and inflicted upon them every indignity and outrage known to merciless warfare.

NOTE.—Sir James Henry Craig was born in Gibralter in the year 1749. He entered the English Army at the age of fourteen and was well trained in the art of soldiery. He came to America in the year 1774 and was in service here from the battle of Bunker Hill until the evacuation of Charleston in 1781. He was thirty-two years of age when he took possession of Wilmington and began his work of devastation in the surrounding counties. In 1807 he was made Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada. He was a soldier of fair ability, but as a civil officer was a petty tyrant and oppressor. His administration as Governor of Canada was a failure, and he returned to England in 1811, where he died the following year.

(1) Dickson Letters, p. 17.

GOVERNOR JESSE FRANKLIN.

BY J. T. ALDERMAN.

The name Franklin suggests an ancestry worthy of noble sons. The name may have come down from an illustrious family of Norman nobles which established itself in Britain after the Norman Conquest. It may have originated from an expression signifying "free-man." We leave a discussion of this to the antiquarian and the philologist.

True nobility will assert itself even among the hills and forests of frontier life. When home and country call for men to face the oppressor and break away the tyrant's yoke, noble spirits and brave hearts lead the way. He who valiantly wields his sword in a cause that is just, yielding to neither difficulties nor discouragements, reveals a spirit that is noble born.

It was during the dark period of the Revolution, when home and liberty were in jeopardy from foreign foe and internecine strife that Jesse Franklin appeared in the full strength of young manhood. He was born on March 24th, 1760. His parents were Bernard and Mary Franklin, who at the beginning of the Revolutionary war lived in Orange County, Virginia. He was the third of seven sons. Owing to the turbulence of the times his educational opportunities were very limited. He, however, acquired the rudiments of a practical education.

When he was about seventeen years old, during the year 1777, he volunteered in the Continental service and held a lieutenant's commission in Washington's army. It is not known how long he remained with the army or where his service took him. When his term of enlistment had expired he returned to his father's home.

Attracted by the excellent range and fertile valleys of Piedmont North Carolina, a large number of good people had, before the Revolution, left their Virginia homes and moved to occupy the unbroken forests. Among them was Col. Benjamin Cleveland, a brother of Jesse Franklin's mother. Before the breaking out of the Revolution, Bernard Franklin had determined to go to North Carolina, as so many of his neighbors and friends had done. In the summer of 1778 he sent Jesse, who was then at home from the army, to select lands suitable for the settlement and to erect buildings for the accommodation of the family when they should arrive in the fall. The fact that the father trusted such responsibilities to his eighteen-year-old son is an earnest of the confidence he placed in him. The young shoulders which were destined to bear in after years the burdens of state and nation were thus early put in training by duties and cares in sharing the responsibilities of his father's family. His father was not disappointed. Jesse selected for their future home a beautiful valley near the head-waters of Mitchell's River, and provided for the coming of the family. The two older brothers, Bernard and Jeremiah, remained in Virginia. In the fall of 1778 Jesse's parents, with four sons and two daughters, the oldest of the children being under fifteen years of age, moved to their new home in Surry County, North Carolina. This homestead was to become the seat of patriotism and honor, culture and refinement.

The American people were not united in the desire for separation from the mother country. The division of sentiment was sharp and in many communities was a source of extreme bitterness and strife. Loyalists and Tories were found in all the colonies. Virginia, Maryland, and New England were perhaps less infested than any other sections of the continent. John Adams said: "New York, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina were about evenly divided between Whig and Tory sentiment; in South Carolina there were more Tories than Whigs, and Georgia virtually swung back at one time to the crown as a royal province." As to the number of Tories in the Carolinas, the estimate of Mr. Adams is no doubt too large.

While all who were opposed to the American cause were classed as Tories, there was a difference between the Loyalist and the characteristic Tory. Many of those who adhered to the crown were people of excellent character and most valuable citizens—men who were above the piratical practices of the ordinary Tory. Many of the Scotch Highlanders in the Cape Fear section were Loyalists, but were men of high moral worth. They had but recently, after the battle of Culloden, sworn allegiance to the crown and were unwilling to violate that oath. There were other notable exceptions. But what excuse can be made for the predatory bands of plundering Tories roving the country, burning houses, murdering the best men in the communities, and creating consternation and misery among helpless women and children! They destroyed the growing crops of defenseless citizens and appropriated to their own use the farm supplies and whatever valuables could be found in the dwellings.

They were mainly irresponsible men, in whose breasts there existed no thrill of patriotism, whose only ambition was to gratify some personal grudge, and to satisfy their necessities by plundering and robbing. Their heredity has come down through the decades of our national history. When our southland was in arms for the defense of home and liberty, the sons of these men were "bush-whackers" and deserters. They now run illicit distilleries and debauch their communities; they object to civic and educational advancement. Tap their veins and you find Tory blood. During the war the Tories in some sections became so aggressive and bold in their depradations that the Whig families were forced to build forts for protection. One of these was near the present town of Mocksville;[1] another was near Wilkesboro.

Fortunately there were men in most sections of the State whose names struck terror to the hearts of the Tories. Among them was Col. Benjamin Cleveland. As a partisan leader he had but few equals. He knew no fear and seemed ubiquitous to friend and foe. Colonel Cleveland's services in checking organized Toryism in that part of the State have never been fully recognized.

When about eighteen years of age Jesse Franklin joined his uncle's forces and for two years assisted in maintaining order in Piedmont North Carolina. He served with him in many skirmishes with the Tories and gained the confidence of his uncle as a bold and fearless patriot.

At the close of the summer of 1780, the British had overrun the whole of South Carolina. Cornwallis had for months been arranging to invade North Carolina and take vengeance upon the men of Mecklenburg and other Whigs of the State. He sent Major Ferguson with a large body of British troops to overawe the Whigs and enroll the Tories in the western counties. The appearance of the British among the hills of North Carolina had an unexpected effect. Those dauntless patriots who knew no fear rallied to the standard of Liberty with a determination which had never seized them before. Led by the brave Colonels Shelby, Sevier, Campbell, and General McDowell, they rushed down the mountain

[1] Some of the timbers of which this fort was constructed were moved to Mocksville about forty years ago by Col. A. M. Booe and used by him in building a tobacco factory, which is still standing. Colonel Booe ornamented this factory with a brass weather vane brought from Heidleburg by some German Lutherans who settled on the banks of Dutchman's Creek and placed it upon a church, which they built in 1765.

like a torrent maddened by the opposing elements. They were joined by the men from Surry and Wilkes under the intrepid Colonel Cleveland, with Jesse Franklin as his aid. Nowhere in Revolutionary times could be found a more heroic band. With incredible swiftness this little army of militia and volunteers rushed over creeks and rivers, ridges and forests, covering a distance of about seventy miles in twenty-four hours. Halting for a council of war, they selected nine hundred of the best equipped men and rushed forward to meet the foe. Ferguson had selected the top of the ridge known as King's Mountain for the encounter, from which, he said, "God Himself could not drive him." The patriots surrounded the mountain before Ferguson was aware of their presence and attacked him from all sides at once. As the British and Tories charged from one side of the mountain the American lines wavered, only to rush forward with redoubled fury. The British were hurled back, only to be met by the rifles and shouts of the men on the opposite side of the hill. A cloud of smoke encompassed the mountain shutting off the British army from sight. Jesse Franklin rode forward through the smoke, and finding the British in confusion and shooting above the heads of the Patriots, he called to his men to charge, assuring them of victory. They advanced till within range and fired. Colonel Ferguson fell and confusion overwhelmed the enemy. Captain Depeyster, the ranking officer, assumed command but was unable to restore order. Captain Ryarson's efforts were alike futile. He surrendered, and handed his sword to Jesse Franklin, saying to him: "Take it, you deserve it, sir." [2] The sword was in the Franklin family many years, but a party of gentlemen on one occasion, in testing the temper of the mettle, broke it into fragments. The hilt was in possession of Mr. Ambrose Johnson, of Wilkes County, in 1854.

[2] Accounts of the battle of King's Mountain vary. This sketch follows the statement of Judge J. F. Graves, who received it from John Boyd, a soldier of the Revolution, and an eye-witness to this incident.

The victory at King's Mountain was complete. Nine hundred inexperienced militia had vanquished a superior force of regular British and Tory troops, consisting of 1125 men. With the loss of twenty-eight killed and sixty wounded, they had killed, wounded, or captured the entire British force. The effect was electrical. The Tory spirit was crushed, and hope stirred the hearts of the patriots. The prisoners were hurried to a place of safety. Cornwallis immediately left Charlotte and retired to his protected camps in South Carolina.

A record of the many daring adventures and marvelous escapes of Jesse Franklin during those years of ceaseless vigilance would make a thrilling narrative. A few only have been rescued from oblivion. The plundering Tories feared him and trembled for their lives when it was known that Franklin was in the community. They well knew that swift vengeance would be dealt to those guilty of murder and that all if taken would be punished according to their crimes. They determined to destroy him, but they realized that he was more than a match for them in any bold movement on their part. Bands were often in hiding along the approaches to his father's house. One evening he was attempting to reach his home by a circuitous route when suddenly he was surrounded by a strong band of Tories. Resistance in the face of a dozen rifles was futile. They tied his hands behind his back, and using his bridle as a halter, they made ready to hang him to an overhanging limb. When all was ready they commanded him to take the oath of allegiance. He refused and they swung him up. One of the men struck the horse to make him move from under Franklin; just as he did so the halter broke and Franklin fell into his saddle as the horse dashed away. The rifle balls whizzed by his head. His escape was miraculous and Franklin in after life often referred to it as an intervention of a Kind Providence.

Three months after the battle of King's Mountain, Morgan gained another glorious victory over the British at the Cowpens. Cornwallis was stung by his defeat and the loss of so large a part of his army and hastened to carry the war into North Carolina. General Morgan knew that Cornwallis would endeavor to recapture the prisoners and immediately hurried them off toward Virginia. Thus began the race of Cornwallis and the Americans across the state of North Carolina. General Green joined Morgan near Salisbury and assumed command of the army. The details of this retreat across the State are facts common in all our histories.

Cornwallis reluctantly gave up the chase of Greene and turned aside to Hillsboro. Greene, having received reinforcements from Virginia and some militia from the eastern portion of North Carolina, recrossed the Dan River, thus showing a determination to meet the British in battle. Cornwallis said that he was greatly disappointed at the failure of the Tories in not rallying to the British standard and enlisting as soldiers in his army. The most of the Tories who did attempt to reach him were cut off and destroyed by scouting parties of Whigs sent out by General Greene to intercept their movements. The most notable of these encounters was perhaps the destruction of Colonel Pyle and his band of Tories near the present town of Graham. Cornwallis immediately moved west across the Haw River to succor those who should come.

Greene sent William Washington, Lee, and Williams to intercept the marauding parties of British and Tories. Capt.

Jesse Franklin was at the head of one of these skirmish lines near Hillsboro on February 25th.

General Greene was near the state line about 25 miles north of Hillsboro and began a westerly movement toward the little town of Martinsville, then the county seat of Guilford, which he had before selected as a suitable ground for the inevitable battle. He arranged his forces with skill and awaited the approach of the enemy. Cornwallis accepted the challenge and on the evening of March 15th the battle took place. Greene withdrew and Cornwallis held the ground, but his doubtful victory was the final undoing of the British in North Carolina.

In this battle Jesse Franklin was a conspicuous actor. He led a band of mountaineers who did good service, and was among the last to leave the grounds when General Greene ordered a retreat. The horses of his men had been tied in the woods and as they were mounting to retire some British cavalrymen killed a part of his men before they could mount and get away. Franklin escaped, but soon returned and secured the horse and arms of one of his neighbors, a Mr. Taliafero, and carried them to the family of his friend. Cornwallis retreated to Wilmington and soon left the State, to be captured at Yorktown. Greene was now on the aggressive, but gave up the pursuit and went to South Carolina.

While history has not been lavish in recounting the movements of Jesse Franklin, enough has been recorded to give us an idea of the military career of the youthful hero. Franklin was at this time under 21 years of age. America had gained its independence.

Hostilities had ceased, but the relationship of the former Whig and Tory elements were extremely trying in many sections. Bitter animosities and recollections rendered almost impossible the return of friendly intercourse. Tories had committed outrages and murder. The Whigs had found it necessary to retaliate in order to check their unbridled ravages. Some sections had been almost depopulated; in others a spirit of lawlessness was prevalent. It was a task perhaps greater than the Revolution itself to bring order out of chaos and construct a nation, and people grew restless under suspense and delay. The Whigs had been under a supreme tension from the beginning of the war, and when that tension was removed it was natural for a reaction to follow. Lethargy and untimely contentment might lose for them the vantage ground which had been secured at so dear a price. Schools and churches were in many places still closed and the moral senses seemed blunted. Under such conditions as these there was need of the best and most patriotic men to guide in public affairs. The experienced and wary, like Caswell; the vigorous and hopeful, like Franklin, were immediately summoned to the councils of the legislative halls.

After the close of the war, Jesse Franklin settled in Wilkes County. In 1784, at the age of 24, he was elected to the Legislature from Wilkes County, and, with the exception of 1788, he was re-elected successively every year until 1793, when he changed his place of residence to Surry County. The people of Surry knowing his value as a public citizen immediately elected him to the Legislature for the year 1793, and returned him in 1794. In 1795 he was elected member of Congress and served two years. In 1797 and 1798 we again find him in the Legislature. The Legislature of 1799 elected him United States Senator for the full term ending in 1805. In 1806 and 1807 he was a member of the State Senate and was, at the close of his term, again elected United States Senator for the term to expire in 1813.

As a legislator Jesse Franklin was universally trusted.

Although he was one of the youngest of the members of the Legislature, he was placed at the head of important committees. He made but few speeches; these were mainly short, pointed and forceful. In February, 1795, one Jeremiah Early petitioned the Legislature for a premium or bounty to help and protect him in the manufacture of steel. Franklin was chairman of a committee appointed to investigate the merits of the petition and made the following report: "After due consideration it is our opinion that it is not expedient for the State to grant premiums or bounties for the manufacture of steel, being well assured that any person manufacturing that article will be amply compensated by the sale thereof."

As early as 1785 we find Franklin publicly advocating more opportunities for educating the people. He was a close student and acquired a broad fund of general information. He married Miss Meeky Perkins, of Rockbridge County, Virginia. The date of his marriage has not come to the writer, but it was some time before 1790, as collateral circumstances indicate. His home life was beautiful and inspiring, shedding a wholesome influence for culture and refinement in the circle of his friends and associates.

In 1784 he received grants of land in Wilkes County. The Federal census of 1790 shows that he was then a citizen of Wilkes County. As has been stated, he moved to Surry County in 1793.

Franklin was a Democrat in his feelings and mode of life. He was one of the people and on all occasions manifested his devotion to them in whatever might appeal to their sensibilities or prejudices.

While the Legislature was in session in Hillsboro he was in need of some shirts. The seamstress had made them with ruffles, according to the fashion of the times. "When he came to put them on, he thought the frills did not become the representative of so plain a people as his constituents, and so he cut them all off with his pen knife before wearing the shirts."

In personal appearance Franklin was erect and commanding, somewhat above medium height, and, in his latter years, weighed over two hundred pounds. He was a man of strong personality, of few words, of unusual discretion and sound judgment. He was easily provoked to deeds of charity and unselfish service to those less fortunate than himself. His sympathy for the distressed widow and orphan was easily touched; even in his younger years his strong, manly courage brought comfort and hope to those in distress around him. Moore, the historian, says of him: "Jesse Franklin, like Nathaniel Macon, was dear to the people because he typified their best qualities. He did not shine in debate like Davie, or out-wit his competitors like Alexander Martin, but he was strong in the simplicity and directness of his character. He loved truth, peace and justice, and they shone in his life and made him a beacon and an assurance to all who knew him." His uniform and well recognized integrity, the soundness of his judgment on the great questions which so deeply agitated the public mind, his purity of life and exalted patriotism made him a trusted leader of men.

In 1795, when Jesse Franklin was elected to the National Congress, the young Republic was feeling its way toward a safe adjustment of internal organizations and at the same time striving to avoid external complications until it should realize a firm place in the hearts and confidence of the American people and gain respectability among the great family of nations. It had so recently set up business for itself that there was much and most important legislation to be made. Consequent upon the devastations of a long war, there was a spirit of unrest in every quarter. Families were breaking up and moving to the western frontiers; resistance to taxation embarrassed the local authorities, and there were those who seemed to prefer the flesh-pots of their former conditions to the uncertain experiment as an independent nation. Sections were jealous of supposed encroachments upon their local interests. New England was ready at the slightest provocation to withdraw from the Union. The South was guarding suspiciously against any attempt to meddle in her affairs. Many of those who had been Loyalists and Tories, having lost their standing in their communities, were forced to seek other places to make their homes; some went to the West Indies, some to the British possessions, but the greater number went west and settled among the mountains of East Tennessee and Kentucky, where generations later their descendants arrayed themselves against the armies of the South. Many of the brave Continental soldiers received the pay for their long services in grants of land beyond the Ohio, and the states were poorer by the loss of these brave men. State and national debts were hanging ominous over the treasuries, for the magic hand of Hamilton had not yet given stability to the country's finances, converting a national debt into a national blessing.

Internal traffic was hampered for want of an acceptable circulating medium. Commerce on the high seas was at the mercy of the piratical practices of every nation. The same conditions which existed in North Carolina prevailed throughout the country. French customs and vices had permeated the social and moral fabric. French skepticism, reenforced by Tom Payne's "Age of Reason," was undermining the church and the sanctity of religion. Harvard, William and Mary, Princeton, and Yale colleges were sending out a limited number of scholars, but for two decades and more the halls of learning had been almost deserted. There were no public schools, and the parochial and private schools had been forgotten in the common struggle for material existence. Conditions afforded but little time for social intercourse or intellectual development except among the more favored few. The masses were illiterate and appeared satisfied to remain so. There were but few newspapers or publications of any kind. There were but few who aspired to become authors. Books were rare. It was a period of relaxation and intellectual depression. North Carolina was the first to break the spell and establish a State University; others followed.

Jesse Franklin was a product of the times, but like others who were born to co-operate in shaping the destinies of the nation his horizon was broad, his conception of a government for the masses was clear and his good judgment gave him power in the State and national assemblies. His astute statesmanship won the admiration of his peers. For thirty consecutive years he represented his people and was a conspicuous figure in the State and national capitals.

It has been the custom of the historian to pass rapidly over this period. The records were meager and many of them are not accessible to the reading public. In our times it is difficult to discover what questions were of paramount interest to the men who served in the National Congress or how they disposed of them. There were great problems with which our representatives must grapple. England and France had continuously shown indignities to the American flag. It was a matter of great concern to protect our merchant marine; foreign emissaries were endeavoring to engender strife among the states and weaken the national unity. It required the patriotism and statesmanship of great men to save the young nation from universal disaster. Jefferson and Adams and their adherents were alike patriotic; they had staked all for American institutions. Adams was a devout Federalist and espoused the policy of a strong centralized government. Jesse Franklin, like Jefferson, the great leader of popular rights, was as thoroughly convinced that the ideal form of government was that in which all national authority should originate with the people who were to be governed, and that those in authority were amenable directly to the people. While in Congress he served on a large number of important committees.

During his first term as United States Senator, Congress held its last session in the Quaker City. In 1800 the public offices and records were transferred from Philadelphia to the new Federal capital on the Potomac.

In 1801 Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr received the same number of votes for president. In accord with the provision of the constitution, it devolved upon the Lower House of Congress to name the President. Jefferson was chosen and Burr became Vice-President. In 1805 Jefferson was re-elected President, with George Clinton as Vice-President. Burr allowed the sting of defeat to lead him astray. He entered into schemes for dismembering the western settlements and organizing a new republic. The story of his trial in Richmond is an old one. In 1807 John Smith, an accomplice of Burr in his adventure, was Senator from the state of Ohio. Jesse Franklin had been appointed chairman of a committee to investigate the matter, and on November 13, 1807, made the following report: "It is the opinion of the committee that it is not compatible with the dignity of the Senate of the United States for John Smith to occupy a seat in the Senate." The trial before the Senate was a long and memorable one. The greatest orators of the times were engaged on one side or the other. The speeches were reported in full and are models of eloquence and power. Smith was acquitted by one vote, but Franklin's masterly management of the trial had convinced the public that Smith was guilty. Smith immediately resigned and left Washington.

Another important historic fact is brought out by the services of Franklin. After the Declaration of Independence the Articles of Confederation were adopted as the supreme law of the land and were in force till the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789. The old Congress under the Articles of Confederation was in session on July 11, 1787, in New York, and adopted a form of government for the territory north and west of the Ohio River. The sixth article of this ordinance provided for the exclusion of slavery and involuntary servitude except as punishment for crime. At the same time this Congress was in session a great convention was in session in Philadelphia framing the Constitution which soon superseded the "Articles of Confederation." The ordinance of the Congress of 1787 was disregarded by the Constitution. In 1805 a number of exiled Cubans desired to settle with their slaves in the rich plains north of the Ohio. A conflict was about to arise and the Congress at Washington appointed a committee to report on the matter. Franklin as chairman of the committee reported: "Resolved, That it is not expedient at this time to suspend the sixth Article of the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of the said territory."

Franklin was a strong advocate of the war of 1812 and urged Congress to grant permission to individuals to fit out vessels for privateering and destroying British commerce.

It is an interesting coincidence that while Jesse Franklin was presiding as president pro tempore in the Senate, Nathaniel Macon was Speaker of the House of Representatives. It was a red-letter day for North Carolina.

These references will serve to show the confidence the nation placed in Jesse Franklin during his term of service at the national capital.

He declined a re-election to the Senate in 1813 and retired to his home. In 1816 President Monroe appointed Franklin, Andrew Jackson and General Meriwether commissioners to treat with the Chickasaw Indians. The treaty was made near the bluffs of the Mississippi where the city of Memphis now stands.

In 1820 he was elected governor of North Carolina. After serving one term he declined a re-election. His message to the Legislature is dated November 20, 1821. It is still preserved in the files of the old Raleigh Register. It shows that he was a strong writer and a statesman of no ordinary powers.

He calls attention to the necessity of reforming the State court system; more efficiency in the militia. He says: "All nations have military force of some kind; the militia is the one preferred by our State. It behooves us then to encourage its efficiency and make it strong in order to render a standing army unneccessary; for precisely in the same degree that the one is neglected you create the necessity for the other." He encourages internal improvements. He mentions the surveying of the lines between North Carolina and Georgia; also the line between North Carolina and Tennessee, and a number of other matters for the consideration of the Legislature.

When his term of office was out he again returned to the quiet of his beautiful mountain section. He was not permitted to enjoy the pleasures of his home long, for death came to him September 29, 1823.

The following letter from Miss Isabel Graves, a great grand-daughter of Governor Franklin, will be found full of interest, and is inserted by her permission:

Nov. 28, 1906.

DEAR SIR:—I cannot add much to the sketch written by my father for Caruthers' Old North State Series. Governor Franklin would not have any portrait made of himself. He said he preferred to be remembered by what he had done and not by how he looked.

In looking over the old records I find that Meeky Perkins was born in 1765, and died February 20, 1834. I have not been able to find the date of her marriage to Jesse Franklin, but from other dates given it was probably sometime before 1790. He had been prominent as a brave soldier during the Revolution, and it is quite probable that he was sent on missions of importance to Philadelphia before the adoption of the Constitution in 1789.

Notwithstanding Jesse Franklin was a Democrat and took great pride in the wearing apparel made at home, his daughters indulged in silk dresses made in Philadelphia on occasions requiring such dress. One of these dresses is preserved in the family.

Governor Franklin, while not a member, was inclined to the Baptist church. His wife was a member of the Methodist church. He did not care for hunting and other sports, but was a great student and reader, and his leisure from public duties and private business was devoted chiefly to reading. His correspondence was extensive for that time, and one of his daughters usually assisted as his secretary.

He was noted for his kindness to his neighbors and consideration for people less fortunate than he. He restrained his children from jokes at the expense of other people's feelings. The story of "Dicky Snow of Fish River Scenes" he never allowed a member of his family to tell, and it only became known when Dicky Snow told it on himself.

My father used to tell us stories of his grandparents which always interested us. He said that Hardin Perkins was a well-connected and influential farmer of Rockbridge County, Virginia. Jesse Franklin in passing to and from Philadelphia on horseback with his wardrobe in his saddle-bags, happened to stop over at Mr. Perkins' and saw the daughter, Miss Meeky, a tall, graceful, black-haired and black-eyed maid, very handsome and accomplished for that period. He fell in love with her, and after the usual courtship, married her. There were very limited modes of conveyance then, indeed much of the country did not have even so much as a wagon road. After the marriage, which was celebrated with a wedding feast, a Presbyterian minister officiating, Jesse Franklin and his bride rode on horseback by way of Lynchburg to his home in North Carolina. On the way they were given receptions at the residences of several of the relatives of the bride, the Redds and the Pannills, and the uncle of the groom. The baggage came later in a sort of two-horse wagon.

Mrs. Franklin was occasionally in Washington with her husband, but not often. The journey from her mountain home to Washington was a long and tiresome one, the meager pay of the members of Congress, at that time not more than five dollars per day, would not well support two in good style. She became a noted housekeeper. Her home-made cotton dresses for herself and daughters were always of the neatest make and finest shades of coloring. The home-made jeans and linsey were the best, her linen the finest and whitest made in the country from flax grown on the farm and spun with her own hand. My father had often seen his grandmother's old flax-wheel at the homestead of his Uncle Hardin Franklin on Fish River, where she died. She was a most elegant hostess and entertained her friends and her husband's friends in the best style possible. She had several daughters and sons, and they had much company.

Governor Franklin lived in an isolated neighborhood; about four families made up the community—Jesse Franklin, Micajah Oglesby, Meshack Franklin, and Mr. Edwards, and they were all intelligent and well to do. They kept up the most cordial social relations; they visited and had parties and dances, to which their friends from a distance were invited. From all the concurrent traditions there was never anywhere a happier community during the lifetime of Governor Frank lin. His wife was the leader and chief spirit among the ladies.

There are other traditions, but these will serve to give a picture of the times.

Yours truly,

ISABEL GRAVES.

Gov. Jesse Franklin was Surry County's greatest son. He reflected honor upon the whole State. It has not been the purpose of the writer to idealize him, but it is right that the noble heroes who risked their lives for American liberty, and whose long period of public service did so much to establish our national greatness, should have a proper setting in the records of the nation. It is a distinct loss to the State that so little is known of those men who so greatly honored our State in the early period of its history.

The remains of Governor Franklin have recently been removed to the National Park at the Guilford Battle Ground. This is right. To a great extent the lives of those great and strong men constitute our State's history. They served well the State and we should accord to their memory that honorable fame they so richly deserve.

NOTE.—The following authorities have been consulted:

Wheeler's History of North Carolina;
Wheeler's Reminiscences;
Caruthers' Old North State Series;
Lossing's Field Book of the Revolution;
King's Mountain and Its Heroes;
Judge Schenck's Guilford Battle Ground;
Moore's History of North Carolina;
Constitution and Rules of United States Senate;
Journals of U. S. House and Senate;
Journals of Legislature of North Carolina;
Files of Raleigh Register;
Colonial Records of North Carolina.

NORTH CAROLINA'S HISTORICAL EXHIBIT AT JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

The Jamestown Exposition in 1907 is to be pre-eminently an historical exposition. All the states, and especially the original thirteen, are concentrating their energies on a display that will show to the world what share each has had in the settlement and development of the country, and later in that momentous struggle with England which transformed weak colonies into a great nation. That each claims the lion's share in that transformation, goes without saying. What is of more consequence, each state is planning to prove its faith by its works, and prove its works by its exhibit at Jamestown. Pennsylvania has already spent thousands of dollars, and will spend thousands more; Virginia says that she can't compete with North Carolina, either agriculturally or in manufactures, but in her historical collection she will lead the country. So the story goes, with but one exception—"the good old North State, heaven's blessings attend her," and she is sitting down peacefully with her knitting, wondering plaintively why other states know so little of her past and that little to her discredit. For the first time in her existence an opportunity has come to her to set right once and for all time the mistakes and sneers of ignorance. Her state pride as well as "a decent regard to the opinions of mankind," should make her send such a display that her brave, faithful, modest past, shall be the glory of her future, and that hereafter men shall not come to North Carolina to teach, but to learn. The Daughters of the American Revolution and the Daughters of the Revolution are making an effort to gather together a great historic exhibit, but it is not for their organizations they are working; it is for their state, and they ask all patriotic orders—the Colonial Dames, the Cincinnati, the Sons of the Revolution, all patriotic men and women—to join with them in this labor of love. They cannot do the work alone; they would be ashamed to do it if they could, for it would be an admission that patriotism was sleeping or dead. That they are leading in the matter is a mere happening, and they would be just as proud to follow, for they are North Carolinians first and Daughters afterwards.

The ladies ask the loan of anything that will illustrate the history of the State—and particularly the life of Colonial and Revolutionary days—letters, manuscripts, school books, furniture, portraits, clothing, maps, silver, china, etc. All articles will be sent to Raleigh and placed in the care of an experienced person, who will see to their packing and shipping; their arrangements is locked cases at Jamestown; be with them during the exposition and then repack them afterwards. They will, of course, while there be in a fireproof building. The amount allowed the ladies for getting up this exhibit is so small that they fear the success of their efforts will be hampered by the necessity for strict economy, but they will try to make the wisest possible expenditure of the funds at their disposal. Their plans are not yet fully matured. When they are, all details will be given in the State papers. The ladies in charge feel that an appeal to the patriotism of the State cannot be in vain.

MRS. LINDSAY PATTERSON,
Chairman Jamestown Historical Committee.
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
Chairman Committee for Eastern North Carolina.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF CONTRIBUTORS.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

ROBERT DIGGS WIMBERLY CONNOR

Mr. R. D. W. Connor, whose address on the urgent need of a fire-proof state library building, delivered before the State Literary and Historical Association at its last session, and published in this number of "The Booklet," was born in the town of Wilson, September 26, 1878. He is the fourth child and the third son of Judge Henry G., and Kate Whitfield, Connor.

Mr. Connor was prepared for college in the public schools of his native town and entered the University of North Carolina in the fall of 1895. At the University he was a member of the Philanthropic Literary Society, the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity, and The Gorgon's Head, a junior class organization. He was one of the representative speakers of his society at the commencement of 1898, and in 1899 was the winner of the debater's medal in his society. At the commencement of 1899 he was selected as one of the senior speakers. He was editor, and then editor-in-chief of The Tar Heel, the college weekly, editor and business manager of the Hellenian, the college annual, and editor of the Magazine. In his senior year he won the John Sprunt Hill History Prize, offered for the best original essay dealing with North Carolina history. His subject was a study of the Ku Klux Klan in North Carolina. Mr. Connor was graduated in 1899.

After leaving the University Mr. Connor was elected a teacher in the Public High School of the city of Winston. In February, 1902, he resigned his work there to become superintendent of the Public Schools of Oxford, but remained there only a few months, resigning in the summer of 1902 to accept the principalship of the Public High School of the city of Wilmington. After two years' work there he accepted work in the office of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, where he has charge of the Loan Fund for building school houses, and is secretary of the Education Campaign Committee, composed of the late Dr. Charles D. McIver, Hon. J. Y. Joyner, Hon. Charles B. Aycock and Governor R. B. Glenn. He is also secretary of the North Carolina Teachers' Assembly, and is now serving his second term.

When the General Assembly of 1903 created the North Carolina Historical Commission, Governor Aycock appointed Mr. Connor one of the commissioners. He was elected secretary of the Commission. He was reappointed by Governor Glenn in 1905. Mr. Connor has done a little work in the history of North Carolina. To The Booklet he has contributed a sketch of Cornelius Harnett; to the Biographical History of North Carolina he has contributed sketches of Cornelius Harnett, John Harvey, Calvin H. Wiley, James C. Dobbin, Thomas J. Hadley, Richard H. Speight and John F. Bruton. More elaborate sketches of Harnett and Harvey by Mr. Connor have appeared in the Sunday editions of the Charlotte Observer. Mr. Connor is a member of the North Carolina Literary and Historical Association and of the Southern History Association.

On December 23, 1902, he was married to Miss Sadie Hanes, of Mocksville, N. C.

Mr. Connor is gifted with the energy to explore through the by-paths of our State's history and his researches, should he live to continue them, will prove of great value to future historians. North Carolina has a history to be proud of and at the present time more general interest is being shown than in any former period. In the mass of authentic material that has been collected in the past twenty-five years, and especially in the last decade, and with the impetus that is being given to the youth of our state by the Captains of Education—by the strong, decisive stand taken by the Press—by the efforts of the Literary and Historical Society, the Sons of the Revolution, the Daughters of the Revolution and other like organizations, there is hope that a great historian will develop who will secure for North Carolina the place that rightfully belongs to her in the galaxy of States, showing that she had not lagged behind the other colonies in the assertion of her rights.

JAMES OWEN CARR.

J. O. Carr was born in Duplin County, North Carolina, near Kenansville. He was prepared for college by S. W. Clement at Wallace, N. C., and entered the University of North Carolina in September, 1891, graduating cum laude in the class of 1895 with the degree of Ph. B. In 1896 returned to the University where he studied law under the late Dr. John Manning and Judge James E. Shepherd. He received his license before the Supreme Court in September, 1896, and returned to his native county, Duplin, and began the practice of law at Kenansville. In 1898 he was elected as a member of the lower house of the General Assembly from Duplin County and served in this capacity in the Legislature of 1899. In the following April he moved to Wilmington, where he continued his practice as a member of the law firm of Rountree and Carr, which relation still exists. He has taken considerable interest in historical matters pertaining to the State. Inheriting the spirit of his forefathers, who were true to the principles of liberty, he is a descendant of the Dicksons and Carrs who played a distinguished part before and during the Revolutionary war and one of whom was a signer to the Oath of Allegiance and Abjurgation passed at New Bern the 15th of November, 1777. The original document is now on file in the clerk's office of Duplin County, thus preserving the names of those patriots who were true to their country, their homes and their God. Mr. Carr is a writer of ability and thus early in his career has made an enviable reputation as a literateur. He is the author of the "Dickson" letters, consisting of a series of letters written immediately after the Revolution and of much historical value. He is a member of the Sons of the Revolution and his descent is contained in the manuscript archives of the North Carolina Society.

PROF. J. T. ALDERMAN.

The BOOKLET for this month is enriched by an admirable sketch of Governor Franklin. The paper is from the pen of Prof. J. T. Alderman, the able and successful superintendent of graded schools in Henderson, N. C. Writing of Professor Alderman and his work, Rev. J. D. Hufham, D.D., long a leading minister of the Baptist church, says: "Professor Alderman has devoted his life and all his splendid powers to the cause of education, mainly in North Carolina, and has no small share in the educational restoration of the commonwealth. Some particulars of his life and work seem to be called for as a contribution to the history of the period.

"The Aldermans, as their name indicates, are of Anglo-Saxon stock; of property and social standing in England. Members of the family were among the early settlers in this country. John Camden Hotten, of London, in his "original list of Persons of Qualitie emigrated to America," includes "Grace Alderman," who came "in the ship Paula, July, 1635." In 1715, Daniel Alderman, son of John, was born in London. In 1740 he married Abigail Harris and in 1750 removed to New Jersey, whither others of the Aldermans had preceded them. In 1755 Daniel and his wife came to North Carolina and settled on Black River in Pender County. Three sons, John, Daniel and David, were born to them. Of these sons, Daniel was the ancestor of the eminent head of the University of Virginia. From David have come the Aldermans of Greensboro. John married Mary Cashwell. They had among other children a son, John, who married Anna Newton, and among their children was Amariah Biggs, father of the subject of this sketch. He was a student at Wake Forest College 1845-'46-'47, and afterwards devoted his life to the Baptist ministry. He married Penelope Howard. Among her ancestors was Fleete Cooper, a prominent and active patriot during the Revolution and afterwards a preacher of renown among the Baptists. Another ancestor was Minson Howard, a soldier of the Revolution. Still another was Capt. John Williams, an officer in the American army during the Revolution; a fearless and active soldier and a terror to the Tories. These facts indicate with sufficient clearness the sort of people through whom the life has come down to Professor Alderman. In the old world and the new, they have been quiet, thoughtful, brave and earnest men, commanding the confidence of the public and achieving success. In North Carolina five of them have been preachers, many of them have been teachers and all of them advocates and supporters of education.

"Professor Alderman was born June 26th, 1853. His father's home lay in the line of Sherman's march, not far from the battlefield of Bentonville, and after that struggle the family had to begin life anew. To educate themselves without neglecting the labor needful to the home was not easy, but the boys all achieved it. Professor Alderman graduated at Wake Forest College 1880, and at once gave himself with singleness of heart to the business of teaching, from which he has never turned aside. In his native county, Sampson, and in Davie County, he taught with singular success. He was superintendent of the schools at Reidsville, 1891-'94. He was assistant superintendent of city schools of Columbus, Ga., the finest system of schools in the South, and also principal of the high school in that city. In all these positions he had given entire satisfaction and had shown his capacity for even greater things. In 1899 the call came which brought him back to his native State and to the largest work of his life—to lay the foundations and construct a system of graded schools for the town of Henderson. It was a great undertaking, but success has crowned every step of it and it may be doubted whether there is in any part of the State a system of schools superior to this, whether we consider buildings and equipment, spirit or management. It is Professor Alderman's greatest work, but he is still in the fulness of manly vigor and there may be even greater things for him to do in the years to come. He is profoundly interested in the history of North Carolina, and the teaching of it holds an important place in his schools. He also keeps in touch with the work of education in the State. He is an enthusiastic Mason and is held in high honor by the members of the Fraternity of every degree.

"In 1894 he married Miss Lillian Watson, of Warrenton, N. C., a gifted and accomplished woman, who is interested in every department of his labor and finds her chief joy in his success."

SARAH BEAUMONT KENNEDY.

COLLECTED AND COMPILED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

The Booklet is indebted to Mrs. Kennedy for that very interesting monograph on "Colonial New Berne," which was published in No. 2 of volume first, which edition was so popular that it is now out of print. She wrote a beautiful story of that heroic and long-suffering people, the Palatinates,* who inhabited that picturesque portion of Germany situated on both sides of the Rhine. These Protestants who were no longer able to endure the persecutions which followed the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, fled from their country, a large proportion joining De Graffienried's colony of Swiss in 1710, to America, and founded New Berne; calling their new settlement after the Swiss capital in the far-away Alps.

Sara Beaumont Kennedy's parents were both North Carolinians, her father having been Dr. Robert H. Cannon, of Raleigh, and her mother Nora Devereux, daughter of Thomas Pollok Devereux, so widely known through the South. Through her maternal grandfather she is a direct descendant of Jonathan Edwards, whose daughter Eunice married Gov. Thomas Pollok, and was the grandmother of Thomas Pollok Devereux. (Gov. Thomas Pollok was twice appointed governor.) Through her maternal grandmother, who was Catherine Johnson, of Stratford, Conn., she is a lineal descendant of William Samuel Johnson, who, as one of the most talented and forceful members of the Constitutional Convention, helped to frame the National Constitution. On this same line Mrs. Kennedy is descended from the Livingstons, one member of which family was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and another played a star part in the purchase of Louisiana. The line goes back, without a break, to the Bruces, of Scotland. On her father's side Mrs. Kennedy inherits French Huguenot blood, an early ancestor of that faith and nationality having settled in North Carolina, where his three daughters married respectively a Hill, a Cannon and a Battle.

*A further account of this settlement is given in the "Booklet," of April, 1905, by Judge Oliver P. Allen.

Mrs. Kennedy was born in Somerville, Tenn., but her father having died, her mother returned to the Devereux homestead in Carolina. There and at St. Mary's, Raleigh, most of her childhood was spent, she having graduated from the above named school at the age of sixteen. Mrs. Cannon again removed to Tennessee and Sara, after teaching awhile, was married, in 1888, to Mr. Walker Kennedy, editor and novelist. Almost all of their married life has been spent in Memphis, Tenn., where Mr. Kennedy is editor-in-chief of the leading newspaper. Mrs. Kennedy began her literary career with "A Jamestown Romance," the first story that had as a heroine one of the tobacco-bought wives of the early colony. This ran as a serial in a magazine. Then shifting her scene, she wrote a series of short Colonial stories, with New Berne and Hillsboro, N. C., as the backgrounds. Her two novels are "Jocelyn Cheshire" and "The Wooing of Judith," both of which have won high praise from the critics. She writes a great deal of verse, but has never collected this class of her work into book form. As a reader she is ranked with the best on the professional stage, although she appears only as an amateur, reading her own stories and poems. During the past year she has done very little with her pen because of serious trouble with her eyes.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Sixth Volume began in July, 1906.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second-class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kennedy.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury."
"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow." Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs. L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden." Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina." Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman, and E. Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

,'Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Carolina," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M. D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700–1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets," Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett," Mr. R. D. W. Connor, "Edward Moseley," Prof. D. H. Hill.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

No. 4.

,'Governor Thomas Pollok." Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev, Joseph Blount Cheshire, D. D.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, Single Booklets, 25 Cents Each.

Vols. V and VI, Single Booklets, 35 Cents Each.

NOW IS THE TIME TO
SUBSCRIBE TO THE

NORTH CAROLINA JOURNAL OF EDUCATION

Published twice each month at Durham, North Carolina, under the editorial supervision of Mr. E. C. Brooks, assisted by associate editors and numerous contributors.

SUBSCRIPTION, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR

Address all communications and make all remittances to H. E. SEEMAN, Publisher, Durham, N. C.

Genealogical Department

North Carolina Society

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

YOUR ANCESTRY CAN BE CAREFULLY TRACED

The Colonial Records of North Carolina, Records of different States and Counties, family papers, State histories and biographies will be diligently examined for parties desiring to have their ancestry traced.

Fee for Such Researches, $5.20 for each Line Traced.

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp for reply, to

MRS. HELEN DEBERNIÈRE WILLS,
(Genealogist for N. C. D. R. and Raleigh Circle Colonial Dames.)
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

COATS-OF-ARMS
PAINTED

Coats-of-Arms painted, decorated with helmet, lambrequin, etc., and enclosed in passe partout	$12.00
Same style and size, but unframed	10.00
A painted Coat-of-Arms, without helmet, lambrequin, etc., unframed	5.00
India Ink Drawing of Arms	5.00
Searches for Coats-of-Arms, including (if found) a small sketch of the arms	8.00
Arms burned on wood	5.00

Write for particulars, enclosing stamp.

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"Midway Plantation,"
RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.

JOHN C. DREWRY, Prest. B. S. JERMAN, Treas. GEORGE ALLEN, Sec'y.

Mechanics and Investors Union

A Home Investment Company for Monthly Savings
A Home Loan Company, to Aid in Building or Purchasing a Home.

Monthly investments encourage the habit of saving money. It promotes economy, thrift and punctuality in business, and aids in making you feel prosperous.

Eighty Payments of $1.00 will mature a $100 Certificate. One hundred payments will secure a home for Life.

GEORGE ALLEN, Secretary, 22 Pullen Building.

Allen's Forty Lessons in Bookkeeping. Over 7,000 copies have been used in schools and colleges. Commended by teachers and business men. Price $1.00. GEORGE ALLEN, Manager.

THE OLD RELIABLE

Headquarters in North Carolina for

Books and Stationery

Aside from a large line of School Books and Supplies, Stationery, Fiction, etc., we will take care of your orders for RARE OUT-OF-PRINT BOOKS.

All orders given our personal attention.

ALFRED WILLIAMS & CO.
RALEIGH, N. C.

SOUTHERN BOOK EXCHANGE

RALEIGH, N. C.

LARGEST STOCK, BEST SELECTED, LOWEST PRICES OF ANY BOOK STORE IN THE SOUTH.

Headquarters for North Carolina History and all classes of North Carolina Publications, including North Carolina Laws, Journals, Reports, of the Supreme Court and of all other State Departments; also Briefs, Documents, Records, and Catalogues of all Colleges since their foundations; Relics, Autographs, Letters, Plates, Coat of Arms, Stamps, Confederate Money, Coin, etc., 'Found no where else.' ¶ History of other States, Americana and all kinds of Rare Books out of print and valuable. All enquiries answered promptly. All orders given personal. careful attention, guaranteeing satisfaction, before remittance, ¶ Libraries handled on commission and best prices guaranteed. All kinds of books bought, sold and exchanged; best bargains ever offered Missing Nos. in files of all North Carolina Magazines and newspapers supplied at publishers prices; all other Magazines at a very low rate.

King-Crowell Drug Co.

THE MODERN DRUG STORE

Fayetteville and Hargett Sts. Raleigh, N. C.

BROWN

Funeral Directors and Embalmers

HARGETT AND SALISBURY STREETS

PLUMBING, HOT WATER HEATING, STEAM FITTING
SANITARY PLUMBING A SPECIALTY

W. A. Stunkel & Company

No. 13 West Hargett Street
RALEIGH, N. C.

Phones: Interstate, 576
Bell, 1502

Personal Attention Given
to All Work

Dr. ERNEST H. BROUGHTON

DENTIST

Associated with
DR. J. H. CRAWFORD

116 Fayetteville Street
RALEIGH, N. C.

The Mecklenburg Hotel

Chase City, Virginia,

IS AN IDEAL PLACE FOR

Health, Pleasure, Rest and Comfort All the Year Round

Because of What Nature, Science and Art

Have Done For It

ART has beautified and adorned it.

SCIENCE has equipped it with the famous Baruch Baths and the most approved Sanitarium Appointments And

NATURE has done her best in the now famous Mineral Springs of Chloride Calcium, the only known water of its kind in this country or Europe; and of Lithia, containing many fine medicinal properties besides the amount of Lithia equal to any in existence, the combined use of which splendid waters effects wonderful cures in cases of Rheumatism, Eczema, Malarial Poison, Nervous Troubles and conditions showing presence of Uric Acid.

Voluntary Testimonials Received Constantly from our Guests.

These Waters for Sale by the Leading Druggists Everywhere

ESTABLISHED IN 1891

THE COMMERCIAL AND FARMERS BANK

OF RALEIGH, N. C.

Capital Stock, . .	$100,000.00
Surplus, . . .	60,000.00
Deposits, . . .	500,000.00

Under its charter acts as Executor, Administrator and Guardian.

Safe Deposit Boxes for Rent.

Respectfully solicits business from responsible individuals and corporations.

J. J. THOMAS, President. B. S. JERMAN, Cashier.

A. A. THOMPSON, Vice-President. H. W. JACKSON, Asst. Cashier.

THE

News and Observer

RALEIGH, N. C.

Published at the Capital City
It reaches the whole State
Largest circulation in North Carolina
The State's Representative Newspaper

JOSEPHUS DANIELS
Editor

GROWTH OF CIRCULATION

1894,	1,800 subscribers	1900,	5,700 subscribers
1895,	2,400 subscribers	1901,	6,500 subscribers
1896,	3,100 subscribers	1902,	7,054 subscribers
1897,	4,200 subscribers	1903,	8,201 subscribers
1898,	4,880 subscribers	1904,	9,111 subscribers
1899,	5,200 subscribers	1905,	10,000 subscribers

North Carolina Historical Commission

ESTABLISHED BY LAWS OF 1903

MEMBERS

W. J. PEELE, CHAIRMAN,	RALEIGH, N. C.
R. D. W. CONNOR, SECRETARY,	RALEIGH, N. C.
J. BRYAN GRIMES,	RALEIGH, N. C.
CHARLES L. RAPER,	CHAPEL HILL, N. C.
THOMAS W. BLOUNT,	ROPER, N. C.

THE Commission wishes to be informed of the location of any unpublished manuscripts, letters, documents or records, public and private, relating to the history of North Carolina. The Commission is authorized to collect and publish such material. The original documents are preferred, but if these cannot be secured, arrangements will be made to have certified copies made without cost to the owners. The possessors of such documents are urged to co-operate with the Commission in their efforts to preserve and render available the sources of the history of our State.

All communications should be addressed to the Secretary.

King's Business College
(INCORPORATED)

CAPITAL STOCK
$30,000

A personal investigation will convince anyone that KING'S is absolutely the Largest, Best Equipped and Most Successful College of Business, Shorthand, Typewriting, Penmanship and English in the Carolinas, regardless of any claims the small fry are making. Strong financial backing.

Reference: Every Bank and Leading Business Concern in Raleigh or Charlotte.
College Journal and Special Offers FREE.
We also teach Book-keeping, Shorthand and Penmanship by mail.

Address King's Business College, Raleigh, N. C. or Charlotte, N. C.

The Citizens National Bank

RALEIGH, N. C.

CORRESPONDENCE AND PERSONAL CALLS INVITED

Any Business Entrusted to our Care Will Receive Prompt and Courteous Attention

JOS. G. BROWN, President. HENRY E. LITCHFORD, Cashier.

THE KEYSTONE

A Southern Woman's Journal, Published Monthly by Southern Women. Now in its 7th year.

Official Organ for the Clubwomen and Daughters of the Confederacy in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida and Mississippi.

SUBSCRIPTION, 50c. PER YEAR

North Carolina Booklet, $1.00 per year—The Keystone and the North Carolina Booklet for $1.10 per year.

Address

Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
Editor N. C. Booklet,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

FOR

North Carolina Schools

White's Beginner's History of the United States

By Henry Alexander White, of Columbia, S. C.

In this interesting narrative, which is written on the biographical plan, special attention is paid to the acts of heroism and devotion of the men of the South.

Lee Readers

The best literature and the best thought of the South, prepared by an experinced Southern teacher.

The Rose Primer

Contains a small vocabulary, with carefully selected and graded matter and frequent reviews.

Spencer's Practical Writing

Teaches a plain practical hand, moderate in slant, and free from ornamental curves, shade, and meaningless lines.

Steps in English

Meet modern conditions in every respect, and teach the child how to express his thoughts in speaking and writing.

Milne's Arithmetics

Give the pupil an unusually thorough and practical knowledge of arithmetic and a readiness in applying this knowledge.

Natural Geographies

The most widely used series extant. This subject is developed naturally and logically, with Man and his environment as the main theme.

Bruce's United States History

Written by a Southern author for Southern schools; interesting, attractive, and profusely illustrated.

New Century Physiologies

Represents the latest scientific research and study, with the best methods of instruction in right living.

Peterman's Civil Government

Gives a good knowledge of political institutions, commencing with the family government. Special edition for North Carolina.

Webster's Dictionaries

The standard authority followed in all leading school books. Thoroughly revised and up-to date.

Progressive Speller

Based on the lines which govern the growth of a child's intelligence and the acquisition of his vocabulary.

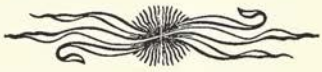
American Book Company

New York Cincinnati Chicago

RAND, McNALLY & CO.

New York, Chicago, London

"The Standard Map Makers of the World"



Send for Catalogue of our Educational Publications

THOS. H. BRIGGS & SONS

Raleigh, N. C.

HARDWARE

Buck's Stoves and Ranges

JAP-A-LAC

FLOOR-LAC

S. W. P. the great Paint

Best Goods, Lowest Prices, Square Dealing

DESIRABLE BOOKS

That Should be on the Shelves of the Libraries of Every North Carolina Home

Lutie Andrews McCorkle's Old-Time Stories of the Old North State.

Warren's Stories from English History.

Pratt's America's Story for America's Children. Five Vols.

Katherine B. Massey's Story of Georgia.

Stone & Fickitt's Every Day Life in the Colonies.

Bass' Stories of Pioneer Life.

Horton's The Frozen North.

Kuffer's Stories of Long Ago.

Hyde's Favorite Greek Myths.

Firth's Stories of Old Greece.

Brown's Alice and Tom.

Stone & Fickett's Days and Deeds of a Hundred Years Ago.

Starr's Strange Peoples.

Starr's American Indians.

Fairbank's The Western U. S.

Heath's Home and School Classics (39 Vols. of the finest literature for young people in the world).

Eckstorms' Bird Book (a natural history of birds).

These or any other publications from our large and valuable list may be secured from your local book seller or from

D. C. HEATH & COMPANY

225 Fourth Avenue
NEW YORK

Biographical History of North Carolina

From Colonial Times to the Present

SAM'L A. ASHE, Editor-in-Chief CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher

GREENSBORO, N. C.

The publisher desires to say without fear of contradiction that there has never been anywhere in the United States any other State Biographical venture equalling the Biographical History of North Carolina in scope, selectness of subjects, excellence of literary and historical matter and general mechanical and artistic book-making.

The Biographical History will cover the entire history of the State and will contain sketches signed by authoritative writers of

All the Governors.

All the Chief-Justices.

All the United States Senators.

All the Federal Judges.

All those who have held Cabinet and Diplomatic positions.

Nearly all those distinguished in the Confederate service.

Nearly all the Supreme Court Justices.

Many of the Superior Court Judges.

Distinguished Generals, Military Men and Naval officers.

All the more prominent Editors, Educators, Ministers, Authors, Doctors, Lawyers, Agriculturists and Politicians.

All the more prominent Industrial and Commercial workers.

The most distinguished women.

In a word, as complete a publication as possible of all those who have adorned the annals of North Carolina.

Write for Booklet of Reviews and Testimonials.

CHAS. L. VAN NOPPEN, Publisher,

GREENSBORO, North Carolina

North Carolina State Library
Raleigh

TRENT'S SOUTHERN WRITERS

Extensively used in Women's Clubs.

Should be on the shelves of every public and private library.

THE McMILLAN COMPANY

4th National Bank Building, ATLANTA, GA.

Send for descriptive circular or call and examine the books at our Summer School text-book exhibit in Raleigh.

Miss Dixie Washington Leach

MINIATURES ON IVORY OR PORCELAIN

Access to State Library where copies can be made on Miniature from old portraits.

STUDIO 405 TRUST BUILDING

RALEIGH, North Carolina

FOR

PIANOS, ORGANS

AND EVERYTHING MUSICAL
AT REASONABLE PRICES

SEE

DARNELL & THOMAS

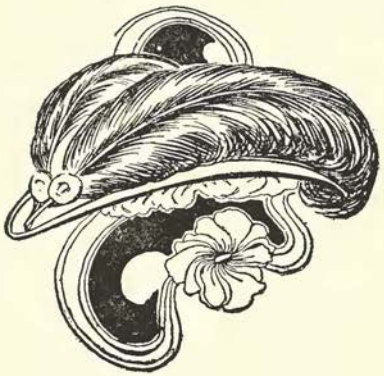
RALEIGH, N. C.

B. F. Johnson Publishing Comp'y

EDUCATIONAL
PUBLICATIONS

ATLANTA RICHMOND DALLAS

Modern Books for Modern Schools



MISSES REESE & CO.,

10 W. Hargett St.

Fine Millinery

Correct Styles and Prices to suit

—ALL—

Trading Stamps given.

STORE CLOSES 6 O'CLOCK

North Carolina State Library

JOSEPH RUZICKA
BOOKBINDERS
BALTIMORE, MD.
GREENSBORO, N.C.
WASHINGTON, D.C.

North Carolina
State Library.

Vol. VII JULY, 1907 No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLINA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

	Page
North Carolina in the French and Indian War By Col. Alfred M. Waddell	3
Locke's Fundamental Constitution By Junius Davis	13
Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina By Thomas M. Pittman	50
An Address: Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State By Hon. James A. Cabell	59
Biographical Sketches By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt and Miss Mary H. Hinton	65

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1907. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME VII.

1. North Carolina in the French and Indian War, Colonel Alfred Moore Waddell
2. Colonial Newspapers, ... Dr. Charles Lee Smith
3. Finances of the North Carolina Colonists, Dr. Charles Lee Raper
4. Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry, Judge James C. MacRae
5. Schools and Education in Colonial Times, . Mr. Charles L. Coon
6. Joseph Gales, ... Mr. Willis G. Briggs
7. General Robert Howe, ... Hon. John D. Bellamy
8. The Resolution of April 12, 1776, . Prof. R. D. W. Connor
9. Our First State Constitution . . . . Dr. E. W. Sikes
10. Permanent Settlement of the Lower Cape Fear, (1725-1735) Mr. W. B. McKoy
11. Colonial Edenton, . . . Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D.
12. The Quakers of Perquimans, . . Miss Rebecca Albertson

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VII, are requested to give notice at once.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,

"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"

Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VII. JULY, 1907. No. 1

State Library

The NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
(Nee Hooper.)

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MISS LOUISE PITTINGER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VII JULY, 1907 No. I

NORTH CAROLINA IN THE FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR.

BY COLONEL ALFRED MOORE WADDELL.

"The French and Indian War," as it is designated in our history, was the American part of the great Seven Years' War in Europe in which Frederick the Great made his fame. It was the struggle between France and England for supremacy on this continent, or, more accurately speaking, between the genius of William Pitt and the enemies of England, for the possession and control of what is now recognized to be the greatest empire on earth. The years through which it continued were from 1754 to 1763, when the final treaty of peace was made. Nothing in the career of Mr. Pitt so wonderfully demonstrates his stupendous and all-embracing genius as his management of this war. It established his supremacy as a statesman and administrator over every English-speaking prime minister that has ever lived. His correspondence with the Governors and military authorities in the colonies, which has recently been published in two volumes by the Colonial Dames of America, is so astonishing in its comprehensive grasp of the whole field of operations, civil and military, and so minute in its detailed knowledge of every feature of the situation—from the financial needs of each colony and its geographical position and means of defense, the forces at its command, the most desirable routes for military movements, the methods of remedying defective quartermaster, commissary and transportation facilities, and indeed every other general or detailed matter connected with the conduct of a war conducted three thousand miles from his office, down to instructions as to how certain boats and wagons should be built and hauled, and the like—as to justify the assertion that it is without parallel.

The greater part of the French and Indian War was carried on far from the borders of North Carolina, the principal theatre of it being from the Canada border down to Fort DuQuesne (now Pittsburg, Pa.), and the northwestern frontier of Virginia, but before it ended it was extended along the settlements southwardly to Georgia. The French were very enterprising in conciliating and making treaties with the Indians all the way down to Louisiana. Their first act of aggression was as early as 1753, but matters did not become serious in the way of fighting until 1754. In the latter year Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, made an appeal to the other Colonies for help to repel French aggression. To that appeal North Carolina made characteristic answer by voting twelve thousand pounds, and mustering a regiment for the service. In regard to this contribution, Governor Dinwiddie, writing to Mr. Hanbury in London, May 10th, 1754, said, "Except North Carolina, not one of the other colonies has granted any supplies," and it appears from a letter of Governor Dobbs to Pitt, 22d December, 1758, that out of 66,000 pounds raised in the Province, 38,000 had been given to assist the other provinces.

This expedition of 1754, about which he wrote, was the first one in which North Carolina had an opportunity to participate in that war. Fourteen years before that, however, she had sent a company (in 1740) on the expedition to Carthagena in the war with Spain, which was commanded by Capt. James Innes; and the same officer, as Colonel, was assigned to the command of the regiment raised for the expedition of 1754. He was a native of Cannisbay, in Scotland, and a resident of New Hanover County, living on his plantation, Point Pleasant, about nine miles from Wilmington, on the northeast branch of the Cape Fear River.

He was an experienced soldier, having served "in the old country," as he expressed it, as well as in the Carthagena expedition. In the latter he was associated with General Washington's brother Lawrence, and upon his appointment to the command of the North Carolina regiment and all the forces in 1754, Washington wrote to Governor Dinwiddie: "I rejoice that I am likely to be happy under the command of an experienced officer, and man of sense. It is what I have ardently wished for." Governor Dinwiddie himself wrote to Sir Thomas Robinson in regard to him that he "has been in his Majesty's Army, and is of an unblemished character, of great reputation for his bravery and conduct."

And yet when Innes arrived in Virginia with his regiment he found a state of things so discouraging, and indeed so desperate, that he was compelled to inform the Governor that unless some relief was offered he would have to disband the North Carolina regiment, and let them go home, as they were in actual danger of starvation. Washington had been continually complaining of the miserable mismanagement of the expedition and of the want of necessary supplies, and when to this management was added a spirit of insurbordination among some of the officers who refused to recognize the superior rank of Washington and Innes, and among others who were offended at the putting of Innes at the head of the expedition, the climax was reached. Washington, at the beginning of the expedition, was Lieutenant-Colonel and had gone forward with the first detachment of one hundred and fifty men from Alexandria, on the 10th of May, and had arrived within seventy-five miles of the place selected for the erection of the fort at the forks of the Monongahela when he learned that a French force had come down on the company engaged in building it and had captured them, whereupon he went into camp and awaited reinforcements. Col. Joshua Fry had been made Commander-in-Chief of the expedition, but he died about the 1st of June, and Washington was promoted to the Colonelcy of the Virginia regiment in Fry's stead. It was at this juncture that Governor Dinwiddie wrote the letter to Washington, heretofore referred to, announcing the appointment of Innes as Commander-in-Chief, and referring to him as "an old experienced officer," which Washington acknowledged in the generous terms already quoted. Innes, who was as modest as he was brave, seemed to apprehend that his age would be against him, and moreover suspected that the Virginians would be dissatisfied with his assignment to the chief command—which proved to be correct, but Governor Dinwiddie wrote to him in these words: "Your age is nothing when you reflect on your regular mode of living," and "as for the expectations of the people here, I always have regard to merit, and I know yours and you need not mind or fear any reflections." After his arrival, however, and upon the discovery of the situation heretofore mentioned, viz, that he could get no supplies and no money to sustain his command, and after notifying the Governor of the facts, without receiving any assistance, he was compelled to disband his force of North Carolinians and let them go home to avoid starvation.

To aggravate the case, supplies were furnished to other troops, some of whom had gone on and joined Washington, and, with the command under him, had surrendered after a gallant fight against superior numbers at Great Meadows. Innes wanted and tried to resign, but was finally persuaded to remain on duty, and when Braddock's expedition was organized in 1755, to which North Carolina contributed about one hundred men under Major Dobbs, son of the Governor, although they were not in the disastrous defeat but were in the reserve corps under Dunbar—Braddock appointed Innes commander of Fort Cumberland, with a title never before or since heard of, to-wit, Governor of Fort Cumberland, and it was fortunate that he did so, for he rendered invaluable service to Braddock's ruined and fugitive army at that point, notwithstanding he was abandoned by Colonel Dunbar, who succeeded Braddock, and who "went into winter quarters" (in August) at Philadelphia, leaving Innes with 400 sick and wounded, and a handful of Provincials to defend the frontier. He felt the ill usage accorded to him keenly, and, tried again to resign, but was begged by Governor Dinwiddie to be patient, and, yielding patriotically to these solicitations, he continued to do his duty to his King and country faithfully until the spring of 1756, when he returned to North Carolina on leave of absence, and ended his career as a soldier. He died September 5th, 1759, at Wilmington. In 1756 North Carolina sent three companies under Major Dobbs to New York. While these military operations were being conducted on the Pennsylvania and Virginia frontiers, and later in the year, Governor Dobbs of North Carolina was endeavoring as best he could to provide for the defense of the frontier of that province, as the region west of Salisbury was called, and, in the prosecution of that purpose two forts were built, one of them between Third and Fourth Creeks near the present town of Statesville, and the other as is believed, in Caldwell County, in or near what is known as the Happy Valley. These forts were built under the direction and command of a youth of twenty-one years of age who had been a Lieutenant in Innes' expedition, and had been promoted to the rank of Captain in Virginia, and who afterwards became Major, Colonel, and Brigadier-General, and died in 1773 before reaching the age of 39. His name was Hugh Waddell. While erecting these defenses he was engaged in negotiating treaties with the Catawba and Cherokee Indians. During the year 1756, under the same officer, service was rendered at various points in restraining the Indians, and again in 1757, under the same officer, a long and wearisome march, in the face of hourly danger of ambuscade, was made over three of the highest mountain ranges east of the Rockies to the relief of Fort Loudon, which was about thirty miles from the present city of Knoxville, Tennessee.

In 1758 the final expedition against Fort Du Quesne was organized under the command of General Forbes, and to this expedition North Carolina contributed three companies under the command of the same officer, who had been promoted to the rank of Major. It is to be regretted that, so far as this writer knows, no roster of these companies was preserved, but tradition says that among their officers were Thomas Brown, afterwards known as General Thomas Brown, the hero of the battle of Elizabethtown and the "Tory Hole," and Caleb Grainger, of Wilmington.

The battalion was promptly organized, marched at once to Virginia, and went thence immediately to the front. They were placed in the advance corps of Forbes's Army and were employed in scouting, reconnoitering, clearing roads, building bridges and boats, and rendering other valuable service. They had been engaged in this work for some time before Colonel Washington was assigned to the advanced corps, and their Commander, according to the testimony of Governor Dobbs, "had great honor done him, being employed on all reconnoitering parties." There is now in the possession of the writer of these pages a field return made by him on the 25th of October, 1758, which is in a good state of preservation, and with it is also preserved a piece of wood from a table brought by General Forbes from Scotland to Nova Scotia in 1739, which was presented to this writer by a relative of General Forbes a few years ago, upon learning of the existence of the field-return. Forbes's expedition in a short while after it began operations, like its predecessors, began to be confronted by so many unexpected difficulties that Washington, who had already written to Speaker Robinson that "nothing now but a miracle can bring this campaign to a happy issue," united with the other officers in a council of war, at which the alternative was presented of going into winter quarters or abandoning the expedition. At this juncture, as Sparks, the biographer of Washington, says, "a mere accident occurred which brought hope out of despair." In reference to this occurrence the following passage is quoted from "A Colonial Officer and His Times," where it originally appeared: "This mere accident, which all the historians mention and to which Washington himself alludes as a providential occurrence, but without mentioning any names, was the capture of an Indian, from whom the true situation of affairs at Fort Du Quesne was learned. But although this mere accident, or in other words this event of absolutely vital importance to the success of this formidable expedition which established English supremacy in the South—is carefully recorded, the person who was so fortunate as to accomplish this mere accident is as carefully ignored, to-wit, Sergeant John Rogers, of the North Carolina forces. It was a little thing to do perhaps, but Forbes considered the importance of doing it so great that he offered a reward of fifty guineas and another officer offered a reward of four hundred guineas to any one who would take an Indian prisoner, so that they might get information of the enemy's movements. Rogers accomplished it at the hazard of his life, and from the prisoner captured by him it was ascertained that the garrison at Fort Du Quesne were only awaiting the appearance of the British, when they would withdraw, and thereupon the light troops made a forced march and the enemy burned and abandoned the fort."

Poor Rogers was entirely overlooked and never got either of the rewards that had been offered, but after he came back to North Carolina the Assembly voted him twenty pounds for his gallantry, as appears from the Colonial Records of North Carolina, Vol. VI, page 384.

Among the light troops who made the forced march on the fort were the North Carolina companies, and tradition says that a large dog belonging to their commander first entered the ruins. There were with these troops a number of Cherokee Indians, and perhaps a few Catawbas, and when the expedition ended those Indians started on their return home, and while passing through western Virginia discovered some horses running wild in the woods, and, as they afterwards alleged, supposing them to have escaped from the nearest settlements and been abandoned, as sometimes happened, they captured them and went on their homeward march, but they were pursued by the Virginians and a number of them were killed. The survivors on their arrival at home told their story, which infuriated their kinsmen, and the French, who learned of it, added to the flame by telling them that the English were only waiting for a good opportunity when they intended to kill their warriors and reduce their women and children to slavery. They also furnished the Indians with arms and ammunition, and promised them active support. The consequence was that the fall of Fort Du Quesne, so far from affording relief to the people of North Carolina, only served to transfer the war to their own western frontier, and a series of outbreaks followed, which lasted for more than two years, and kept the settlers insecure until the treaty of peace was made between France and England in 1763. The first outbreak was directed against Fort Loudon on the Tennessee river, where there was a garrison of two hundred men chiefly from South Carolina, and the fort was cut off from supplies and the garrison in danger of starvation. The news of this outbreak and of the murder and scalping of many inhabitants soon spread and the Governors of North and South Carolina organized a considerable force to attack the Indians, when the latter, fearing that they would be destroyed, begged for peace and made a new treaty; but, as was customary with them, they soon broke out again. Thereupon Waddell, now a Colonel, was ordered to re-garrison the fort between Third and Fourth creeks, (Fort Dobbs) and to put five hundred militia on duty to protect the frontiers. He was attacked at Fort Dobbs by the Cherokees on the night of the 27th February, 1760, the assault being made by two parties, but he repulsed them, killing ten or twelve and losing one killed and two wounded. He expected an attack the next night, but the Indians had enough of it, and did not make another attempt.

Colonel Montgomery and Major Grant invaded the Cherokee country and fought an indecisive battle in the Etchoe settlement near the present town of Franklin in Macon County, on the 27th June, but whether there were any North Carolina troops in the expedition or not is uncertain.

The retreat of Montgomery to Fort Prince George caused the surrender of Fort Loudon, which was followed by treachery and murder by the Indians. In the fall of that year (1760) Colonel Waddell was ordered to join Colonel Byrd, of Virginia, in striking the upper Cherokees, but the latter made peace and he discharged his troops.

And thus, strictly speaking, the part of North Carolina in the "French and Indian War" ended, although for years afterwards North Carolina pioneers had to fight the Indians until they were finally suppressed during and after the American Revolution.

This article embraces only the general outlines of the subject discussed, and omits much that might be said by way of comment upon individual conduct, and particular events in the several campaigns, as well as in the civil administrations in Virginia and the Carolinas during the war, which, if included, would exceed the limits prescribed for articles in this publication.

A portrait of General Hugh Waddell may be found in each of the following works:

"A Colonial Officer and His Times—1778," by Alfred Moore Waddell, 1890. Published by Edwards & Broughton, Raleigh, N. C.

"Wilmington," by Rt Rev. Joseph B. Cheshire, in "Historic Towns of the Southern States." Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, 3 New York City.

"The Story of the Old North State," by R. D. W. Connor. J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia.

LOCKE'S FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTIONS.

BY MR. JUNIUS DAVIS.

He who attempts to write of the earliest events in the history of North Carolina with a single aim to the truthfulness of his narrative, will find himself painfully embarrassed by a want of accurate information. And this is notably true as to the story of the first settlers, and the early political history of the Province. Where was the first permanent white settlement in North Carolina—the date of it—the names of the settlers—who knows? Saunders says (1 Col. Rec., Pref. IX): "The first permanent white settlement in North Carolina was made, it may be safely said, somewhere to the eastward of the Chowan River, extending in time down to and along Albemarle Sound. Neither its date, nor its locality may now be fixed with absolute certainty, but it began, doubtless, before 1660, and probably as early as 1650." I believe the correct date to be after 1660, but I am unable to fix it accurately. It seems to be certain that the first stout hearts, who, pushing into the wilderness beyond the touch of civilization, brought their families and household goods into the new land, came from Virginia and probably from Nansemond County. In July, 1653, the General Assembly of Virginia (1 Col. Rec., 17), regarding North Carolina as a part of that province, granted Ten Thousand Acres of land to the 100 persons, who should first settle on the Roanoke River, and the lands lying south of the Chowan and its branches; and One Thousand Acres to one Roger Green, to be chosen by him, "Having regard to those persons having a former grant." This proviso, I take it, was merely a saving clause tacked on by some cautious representative of the Old Commonwealth, who held a righteous regard for the first rights.

And this grant seems to have been more of an inducement held out to prospective settlers, a tentative offer, than an actual evidence of an actual settlement. For it is certain that Yardley, when he sent out his first expedition into North Carolina in September, 1653, and his second early in 1654, found no white man in North Carolina, save one lone Spaniard, who had pitched his tent with a family of thirty, "seven whereof are negroes," among the Tuscarora Indians. (2 Hawks, 17.)

Yardley calls his explorations "an ample discovery of South Virginia or Carolina." His first expedition, in September, 1653, went through the sounds as far as Roanoke Island, where the Chief of the Indians "showed them the ruins of Sir Walter Raleigh's Fort." The second, early in 1654, penetrated into the interior, and during it Yardley bought and "paid for three great rivers" (supposed to be the Roanoke, Tar and Neuse) "with the surrounding lands, and took solemn possession of them, on behalf of the Commonwealth of England, by the delivery to them by the Indians of a turf of the earth with an arrow shot into it." His party neither heard of or met any white man save the Spaniard, and he certainly had lost himself, and claimed no allegiance to England. No after mention of Yardley, or his purchase, is to be found in any of the records. The grant from the King of Yeopin, dated March 1st, 1661, (1 Col. Rec., 19), to George Durant, was for land lying on Roanoke Sound and a river called by the name of "Pearquimans." It began at "a marked oak, which divides this land from the land I formerly sold to Samuel Pricklove," and is witnessed by two men of English names. George Durant probably came from Northumberland County, Virginia, for the record of his marriage to Ann Moorwood on January 4th, 1659, by Daniel Lindsey, a minister of the gospel in Northumberland County, is to be found in the court-house at Hertford, N. C. (Hathaway, Vol. 3, page 199.) Durant, who was certainly one of the first "seators," was a man of ability and substance, destined to become prominent in the affairs of the province, and to be abused and villified by Hawks, without the least reason or foundation, as a Quaker and a turbulent promoter of sedition and resistance to lawful authority. On September 25th, 1663, Governor Berkley, of Virginia, issued grants to various parties for land in the Albemarle section of North Carolina, Seven Hundred and Fifty (750) acres to Thomas Relfe, Three Hundred and Fifty (350) to Robert Peele, Six Hundred (600) and Two Hundred and Fifty (250) to John Harvey, Seven Hundred (700) to Captain John Jenkins, and to George Catchwood One Thousand Five Hundred (1500). Both Harvey and Jenkins were afterwards Governors of the Province. These grants all describe the lands by actual metes and bounds, and call for the bounds of other lands belonging to actual settlers at that date, notably John Battle, Roger Williams, Thomas Jervis and others, names well known in the history of the State. It may seem strange to some that Berkeley, one of the Proprietors, should, as Governor of Virginia, be issuing grants for land in the Albemarle section some five or six months after the Great Grant of Charles. But the answer is, that the first grant to the Proprietors did not include the lands on the Chowan or north of the Roanoke.

It is well to note right here one most egregious error into which the historians of the State, Williamson, Martin, Hawks, Wheeler and Moore, have fallen. They all with one voice declare that the first settlers were Quakers and "religious refugees" from the Northern colonies "seeking a haven of rest from religious persecution." The utter fallacy of this statement has been completely proven by Bishop Cheshire, and declared by Colonel Saunders. Indeed it is strange to the student of history of this day to see the many errors of these historians, notably Hawks, who had the least excuse of any.

I venture the opinion, that the first settlers acquired their lands by purchase or some like concession from the Indians, and that many of them afterwards "made good" by grants from the Governor of Virginia.

On March 24th, 1663, Charles Second, out of that careless generosity in which he was wont at times to indulge himself, granted to the Lords Proprietors the first Great Charter for Carolina. The inducement, or, as a lawyer would put it, "the consideration," for this truly princely gift, was the "laudable and pious zeal for the propagation of the Christian faith and the enlargement of our empire and dominions"—which were burning in the bosoms of these favored noblemen. But it was early ascertained that this grant did not include the settlements which had already been made in the Albemarle section; and so the Proprietors procured from Charles the second charter, dated June 30th, 1665, which extended their northern boundary to the line which now divides North Carolina and Virginia. It was truly a grand and noble estate, which Charles had so lightly and carelessly flung to his friends. It extended from Virginia on the north to the Spanish possessions in Florida on the south, and from the Atlantic Ocean on the east to the Pacific on the west; and included the present States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas, Indian Territory, New Mexico, Arizona and the lower part of California. Over it the Proprietors were made "the true and absolute Lords," with full and plenary powers, even of life and death. There were, however, in the charter two very pregnant and portentous provisions. One was the excepting and "saving also the right, title and interest of all and every one of our subjects of the

North Carolina State Library.

English nation, which are now planted within the limits and bounds aforesaid." The other was the restriction put upon the power of the Proprietors to enact and publish laws "for the good and happy government" of the province, which required these laws to have the assent and approbation of the freemen of the said province, or of the greater part of them, or of their delegates or deputies, whom for the enacting of the said laws, when and as often as need shall require, we will that "the Proprietors shall assemble," etc., etc.: "Provided, nevertheless, That the said laws be consonant to reason, and as near as may be conveniently agreeable to the laws and customs of our Kingdom of England." It is difficult to conceive why the Proprietors should have proposed such a restriction as this latter upon their otherwise plenary power. I say "proposed" advisedly. The grant cost Charles nothing, no expenditure of money, no loss of revenue. He was simply paying so-called debts of honor by giving something which had no value whatever in his eye. He had no love for Parliaments or Parliament law, and the judicial murder of his father at the command of the Parliament of England was then fresh and sore in his memory. He certainly would never have proposed such a limitation upon his bounty, and so I insist that the draft of the charter was left entirely in the hands of their Lordships, and this provision voluntarily inserted by them. It undoubtedly emanated from Ashley, who throughout his entire political career, was a strenuous supporter of the supremacy of the Parliament. If they had been endowed with the gift of prophecy, if they could have foreseen that rugged independence of their subjects, that sturdy resistance against any invasion of their chartered rights, which were so soon to follow, these restrictions would never have been written into their grant. But these Proprietors were great Nobles, in high favor with the King, arrogant and overbearing toward their inferiors, living in the midst of luxury and plenty, and daily accustomed to obsequious and servile deference from their tenants and retainers, and utterly ignorant of the conditions prevailing in the province. No dream of trouble from the chance inhabitants of their newly acquired possessions far across the wide waters arose for one moment to disturb their serene and complacent indifference. They simply gave no thought to the just rights and welfare of the inhabitants of the land, who had long since lost sight and sense of Kings and Nobles, and who had, with infinite labor and at vast risks, builded their homes in the great wilderness, among the savage Indians, where the King's writ ran not, where Sheriffs and Courts were unknown, and their own stout hearts and strong right arms their only protection. They considered the settlers as "feudal vassals," mere chattels which they had acquired with the fief. Not only was there an utter lack of any community or bond of common interest between these non-resident landlords and their tenants, but their striking and unnecessary parsimony and greed was to destroy all hope of it in the future. The form of government and laws promulgated by them in the very outset were grievously unsuitable, unjust, irritating and surely calculated to create discontent and ill feeling.

In September, 1663, the Proprietors assumed control and sent out their first instructions to Wm. Berkeley, one of their number and then Governor of Virginia. He was authorized to appoint a Governor, with a grand council of six, who were to appoint all civil and military officers, and with the consent of the freeholders or their delegates to make laws, which should be in force until vetoed by the Proprietors. This was not so bad, but the further instructions as to the parcelling out—not granting—of the lands was a striking exhibition of extreme stinginess and woeful lack of common sense and common justice. The Governor and Council were instructed to grant to each man "one chayne of land consisting of 66 foote in bredth and 100 chaynes from the River into the country in lenkth, and the remainder of his land to be noe nearer than at the end of 200 chaynes from the River * * * by means whereof there will be 200 men armed and lodged within each myle and quarter square * * * and 10 acres, which is the proportions above, will be as much as one man can well plant and keepe cleane in that growing country."

Not only this, but it was expressly enjoined that those settlers who had bought land from the Indians must "be pursuaded or compelled to surrender them" and take the small measure meted out by the Proprietors. And right here began trouble—that trouble, which ever after increasing and swelling even at times into revolt, resulted in the downfall of the rule of the Proprietors, and, having thus obtained sturdy root and Royal encouragement, flowed on in increasing volume until it burst into the Revolution and secured perpetual freedom from Royal rule. Ten acres indeed! what content, or joy, or happiness, did the promise of ten acres bring to those men, who had already acquired hundreds under titles expressly protected and secured to them by the great Charter! But this was not all. The settler, who had by great toil, with great peril, built him a house and cleared his lands for cultivation, who loved elbow room, and lived happy because his nearest neighbor was a mile away, who fairly revelled in the glorious possession of broad acres, was to be forced to abandon all these fruits of his labor and make a new home in a fortified village to serve the caprice of his overlords.

Land, the precious soil and the ownership of it, has ever been dear and close to the heart of the Anglo-Saxon from time immemorial even down to the present day. This ardent longing for a freehold was generated in the hearts of our ancestors in the days of the feudal system, when the rich and the noble and the Church owned all the lands of England, and the stout yeomen were only tenants, and came down to us by inheritance. Land was beyond their reach, and therefore they coveted it and yearned for it above all things. For land even though it was so poor as only to "feed a hog or aiblins twa in a good year," we have always been ready and willing to spend our precious dollars and our blood.

Drummond was the first Governor of Albemarle and he assumed authority in October, 1664. In June, 1665, Woodward, the surveyor for the Province, protested, but with appropriate servility, against the restrictions upon the granting of lands, that the people resented the small acreage allowed, and that new comers were discouraged because of the better terms granted in the other colonies. He concludes his letter with the statement: "Those that live upon a place are best able to judge of that place, therefore the Petition of the General Assembly that was here convened will deserve your Honor's serious consideration."

It is important here to note two things, that a General Assembly of the freeholders—the first in the history of the State—had been held under the provisions of the great Charter soon after the appointment of Drummond, and that at the very birth of the Province, the deputies of the people were at war with their overlords.

In October, 1667, Samuel Stephens was appointed Governor and a new set of instructions, that is Laws, issued to him. These were fuller in detail and in some respects more liberal; but still some of the provisions were in express violation of the reserved rights of the people under the charter. On May 1st, 1668, the Proprietors, in tardy response to the protest of Woodward and the petition of the General Assembly, sent out the "Great Deed of Grant," under which lands were to be granted upon the same terms and conditions as prevailed in Virginia. This document, of brief extent, was considered of such importance "that the original was preserved with the most scrupulous care, and sixty-three years after its date, was formally brought into the Assembly, and ordered into the special custody of its Speaker and its text spread upon its minutes." Nor does this great caution seem to have been in anywise unnecessary, for repeated attempts were afterwards made by the Proprietors and their Deputies, and even by Governor Johnston, under the Royal Government, to declare it revoked and annulled. But the colonists clung to it as a sheet anchor, and as late as 1856 it was invoked by our Supreme Court to sustain the validity of a grant issued in September, 1716, by the Governor and Council in accordance with its provisions. (See Archibald vs. Davis, 4 Jones, 133.)

This review of the birth and rise of the colony is necessary to a clear understanding of the political conditions existing at the time of the promulgation of the first set of the Fundamental Constitutions, and of the cause of the antagonism and opposition of the colonists to the Proprietors. Thus far the Proprietors had not attempted to establish any stable form of government, but had been content to dole out their laws in the form of changing instructions to each new Governor.

John Locke was a man of great learning and varied attainments, but an idealist, a profound philosopher and of broad religious and political views, but not a statesman, a fascinating conversationalist, an inimitable raconteur, a delightful companion, but not practical and utterly lacking in executive ability. He was born at Pensford, in Somersetshire, England, on August 29th, 1632. His father, who was a country attorney, was a Parliament man, and upon the breaking out of the rebellion against Charles I, entered the army as Captain of a troop of horse in the regiment commanded by Colonel Popham. Locke's early youth was spent in the midst of war and bloodshed, for the storm of battle raged fiercely around his home. However, in spite of the absence of his father in the army and the fierce strife which was sweeping over the country, his education was not neglected.

In 1646, through the influence of Colonel Popham, he was admitted to Westminster School, where he remained for six years. In November, 1652, he matriculated at Christ Church College, Oxford. In 1658 he took his degree as Master, but continued with his college as tutor and lecturer. It is curious in this age of action and progress to note the range and variety of his studies—logic, metaphysics, philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, history, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Roman Law, theology, chemistry, medicine, etc., etc. In his association here with great scholars of broad and liberal views, men learned in the theory of government, but without experience in its administration, we can readily see how Locke lost all touch with the spirit of Puritanism into which he had been born. His father died in February, 1660, leaving him a small estate, sufficient, with his studentship at Oxford, to afford him a comfortable living. Lord King, his kinsman, says he had the choice of three distinct roads to fame and fortune, the Church, the practice of medicine, and diplomacy, and with equal certainty of success in each. Medicine seems to have been his choice and love, and to this study he devoted the most of his leisure, save for that short dissipation in diplomacy, when he went as Secretary with Sir Walter Vane on his Embassy to Holland. In spite of his great ability and close devotion to his studies, through his neglect of some formalities, he failed to get his diploma in medicine. This failure would have ended his connection with his college but for the intervention of some powerful friends, who had been won to him by his charming personality and marked abilities, and who procured from Charles II a peremptory command to the Dean and Chapter of Christ Church to continue his studentship with its emoluments.

About this time he became associated in some way with Dr. David Thomas in the practice of medicine, and it was this association that in 1666 accidentally brought him in contact with Lord Ashley. Ashley, afterwards better known as the Earl of Shaftesbury, was a man of brilliant attainments and remarkable abilities. He was a masterly and unscrupulous politician, and had been Royalist, and Roundhead, and Royalist again, as the balance of power shifted. Probably no other man of his high rank and position was ever the subject of so much scathing abuse and bitter satire. Dryden immortalized his memory in caustic verse, and Macauley, in equally bitter and brilliant prose. But "during his long political career, in an age of general corruption, he was ever incorrupt," and he was always a devoted friend and staunch advocate of both civil and religious freedom. He was by far the ablest of the Proprietors, and his dominating personality made him easily the leader in all their conferences. Appointed Lord Chancellor by Charles II, November 17th, 1672, without even a smattering of the rudiments of law, he filled that high office with credit. He was dismissed from office in disgrace in September, 1673, and Lord Campbell says that the first act of his successor, Lord Nottingham, "was to seal a pardon to his predecessor, which had been stipulated for when Shaftesbury took the office, foreseeing that he might do many things for which a pardon might be required, and wishing to have the pleasure of sinning with an indulgence in his pocket." It is difficult to tell which most compels our admiration, the wisdom of the politician or the delicious humour of the sinner.

Ashley was troubled with an abscess in his chest, the result of an ugly fall, which threatened to develop into cancer, but which was eventually cured under Locke's advice and direction. In July, 1666, Ashley, intending to visit Oxford, and wishing to try some medicinal waters in that vicinity, wrote to Dr. Thomas, who deputized Locke to wait on him. These two men, so great each in his different way, so dissimilar in character, and socially so far part, were drawn together at their meeting into an intimate friendship, and a close association, that was not to be shaken by either time or fortune. As the result, in July, 1667, Locke left Oxford to live with Ashley as his Secretary.

Speaking of the Lords Proprietors, Bourne, in his life of Locke, Vol. 1, page 236, says: "Of these patentees Ashley was the most active and influential, and thus it happened that Locke, being Ashley's principal adviser and assistant, became in some sort of irregular way the chief secretary or manager of the whole company of Lords Proprietors of Carolina."

In their letter of September 8th, 1663, to Governor Berkeley, the Proprietors urge the necessity of doing something towards the development of their new possessions, "that the King may see we sleep not with his grant but are promoting his service," etc. And yet, in spite of this, nothing was done, but the promulgation of laws, until 1669. In fact, while the Proprietors in 1669 spent some £3200 (equal at this time to about $75,000 or $80,000), and other sums later, towards the settlement of South Carolina, they gave little or no financial aid to Albemarle, evidently believing that it was, or ought to be, able to support itself.

But now had come an important need for some settled and permanent form of government and laws for the province, and hence the Fundamental Constitutions. They are always called "Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," and are generally reputed to be solely the product of his pen and brain. But Bourne, whose life of Locke is by far the best that has been written, says: "Wonderful pains were taken to provide good government for Carolina, and perhaps no colony was ever started with a more elaborate scheme of political, social, and religious organization. Locke had a large share in this work, though there can hardly be any doubt that it was initiated by Lord Ashley, and modified by his fellow Proprietors." A careful study of all the authorities forces me to the conviction that this Utopian scheme was devised by Ashley, aided by the suggestions of Locke, and discussed, modified and then adopted by the Lords Proprietors. It is incredible that a man like Ashley, of such great abilities, of such high position and influence, so arbitrary, and dominating, should have deputed to his Secretary, even though he was Locke, the making of laws, which were evidently intended to be perpetual for all time, for such vast possessions. It is certain, I think, that the general outlines having been framed by Ashley, and agreed upon by the Proprietors, it was given to Locke to draft, and put them in proper shape.

It is a fact, not generally known, that first and last there were five several sets of these Fundamental Constitutions. The first set, dated July 21st, 1669, contained eighty-one articles; the second, March 1st, 1670, contained one hundred and twenty articles; the third, January 12th, 1682, contained one hundred and twenty articles; the fourth, August 16th, 1682, contained one hundred and twenty-one articles; and the fifth and last, April 11th, 1698, of forty-one articles. Of the first set Bourne says "there is extant a draft in Locke's handwriting, dated the 21st of June, 1669, and which with some alterations were issued by the Proprietors on the 1st of March, 1670." This set was never officially promulgated or sent out to Carolina, and but little is known of them. The second set, dated March 1st, 1670, which contained 120 articles, is the one generally referred to as "Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," and is published at length in all of Locke's works, in 1 Coll. Rec., 187, and 2 Rev. Statutes of North Carolina, page 449. It is this act which I propose to discuss in this article, and which for brevity I shall call Locke's Constitutions, for while there were three other sets adopted and promulgated afterwards, yet neither Locke or Shaftesbury had part in them.

In 1674 Locke's health began to fail, and about November, 1675, he went to France on this account and remained there until the last of April, 1679. Shaftesbury had lost favor with the Court, and was dismissed from the Chancellorship in September, 1673. From this time on he was alienated from the King, was imprisoned in the Tower twice, indicted for high treason, and finally, in November, 1682, fled to Holland, where he died soon after. From the time of his return to England in 1679 until November, 1682, Locke was much of his time in the country, and Shaftesbury too deep in political plots to devote much care or time to Carolina. Locke's connection with the Lords Proprietors certainly ceased when Shaftesbury fled to Holland.

There is some confusion and difference among the historians as to which of the first two sets was actually the one first adopted, but after careful study I feel assured I have named them in their proper sequence. This confusion, as Hawks correctly says (Vol. 2, page 184), arose out of the difference, which prior to 1752 existed between the civil or legal year, which began on the 25th of March, and the historical year, which began on the 1st of January.

I have before endeavored to show the serious differences which already existed between the colonists and the Proprietors, and the conditions which produced them. The Constitutions were intended as oil upon troubled waters, the deliberate result of a sincere desire on the part of landlords, utterly ignorant of the pulse of their tenants, to allay forever the restless fever of rooted discontent. But the people—the governed—were not represented or consulted in their making, and by the voice of history they were in their very infancy doomed to disastrous failure. For when, since the day of Runnymede and Magna Charta, has any set of fundamental laws, in the making of which the people had no part, been of lasting duration?

In the preamble to each and every set of the Constitutions the Proprietors declare them to be "for the better settlement of the government of the said place, and establishing the interest of the Lords Proprietors with equality and without confusion; and that the government of this Province may be made most agreeable to the Monarchy under which we live * * * and that we may avoid erecting a numerous democracy." And in the last clause of each it is solemnly declared that, "These fundamental constitutions * * * and every part thereof shall be and remain the sacred and unalterable form and rule of government of Carolina forever." Hereafter will be seen the careless and indifferent ease with which their Lordships suspended, altered and revoked their "sacred and unalterable pledges" as it suited their pleasure, or their interest. Let us now, as briefly as may be, consider this system of law.

A nobility was created, consisting of Palatines, Landgraves and Casiques, in the order of precedence given; and some twenty or more clauses were devoted to defining their estates, their dignities, devolution of titles, etc. A noble could only be tried for a criminal offense in the Chief Justice's Court, and there only by a jury of his peers. The seven chief offices, besides that of Palatine, to-wit, Admiral, Chamberlain, Chancellor, Constable, Chief Justice, High Steward and Treasurer, could only be held by the Proprietors or their Deputies.

Then came the courts, of which there were a great number. There were eight supreme courts, called the Great Courts or Proprietors' Courts. The chief of these, the Palatine's Court, was composed of the Palatine and the other seven Proprietors. The other seven, each consisted of a Proprietor "with six councillors added to him." A queer attachment was tacked on to all the courts in the shape of a college of twelve assistants, whose sole office was to furnish a body out of which to select the Councillors. In order to preserve their proper dignity and equality, each of the Proprietors had his own especial supreme Court. These Proprietors' Courts had each power to mitigate all fines and suspend all executions in criminal cases arising in any inferior court.

The Palatine's Court, "wherein nothing shall be acted without the presence and consent of the Palatine or his deputy and three others of the Proprietors and their deputies," had jurisdiction to call the sessions of Parliament, to pardon all offences, to elect all officers, to dispose of all public moneys, except those set apart by Parliament for some particular public use, and to negative all acts, orders, votes and judgments of the Grand Council and Parliament.

Here we find a bold and clear nullification of that most important provision of the Great Charter by which the Proprietors could only make laws with the assent of the Parliament.

Then came the Chancellors' Court, composed of one of the Proprietors and six Counsellors, called Vice Chancellors. It had jurisdiction of all state matters, treaties with the Indians, invasions of the law of liberty of conscience, and of the public peace upon the pretense of religion, and the license of printing. The twelve assistants were called Recorders.

The Chief Justice's Court, consisting of one of the Proprietors and six counsellors called Justices of the Bench, had jurisdiction of all appeals in civil and criminal cases, except such as were cognizable in the Proprietors' Courts, and the regulation of the registries of writings and contracts. The assistants were called Masters.

The Constable's Court, of one Proprietor and six Counsellors, called Marshals, had charge of all military affairs by land, arms, ammunition, land forces, forts, etc., and "whatever belonged unto war." Each of the assistants was a Lieutenant-General.

The Admiral's Court, one Proprietor and six Counsellors, called Consuls, was an Admiralty Court, and given authority over all ports, navigable streams "as far as the tide flows," shipping, and all maritime affairs. The assistants were Pro-Consuls.

The Treasurer's Court—a Proprietor and six Counsellors, called under Treasurers—had charge of the public revenue and treasury. The assistants were called Auditors.

The High Steward's Court, a Proprietor and six Counsellors, called Comptrollers, ruled over all foreign and domestic trade, public buildings, work-houses, manufactures, highways, sewers, bridges, carriers, fairs and markets, all things pertaining to the public commerce and health, surveying of lands, appointing places for towns to be built on, and prescribing their size and figure. The assistants were called Surveyors.

The Chamberlain's Court was a most remarkable legal machine. Of course it consisted of the usual and indispensable Proprietor and his six Counsellors, called Vice Chancellors. It had cognizance and charge—note well its grave and serious duties—"of all ceremonies, precedency, heraldry, reception of public messengers, pedigrees, the registry of all births, burials and marriages, legitimation and all cases concerning matrimony or arising from it," and "power to regulate all fashions, habits, badges, games and sports." The assistants were called Provosts. How gladly would such a tribunal be hailed and welcomed in this day of the high tide of Democracy by members of the high and exalted Four Hundred, and of certain other exclusive societies, whose names I have not the courage to mention. But what wot those fustian clad yeomen and dames of Albemarle of fashions or habits, of pedigrees or heraldry, of ceremonies or precedency, in the gloom of the wilderness! To them there came no patterns of fashion from London, or Paris, or even from Philadelphia or New York, and her own good taste in the neat fitting of her gown to her trim figure, was the only pattern or guide to the good women of the Province.

As each of the Proprietors had his own especial high court, and each with equal but ill-defined power, it was vitally necessary to erect some tribunal to compose the disputes, which were certain to arise between them—and hence one reason for the Grand Council.

This was a most important body. It consisted of the Palatine and the other seven Proprietors and the 42 Counsellors of the seven Proprietors' Courts. One of the Proprietors and his deputy and twelve other members, no less, could make a quorum. It was given supreme power, to determine any controversy arising between any of the Proprietors' Courts as to their respective jurisdictions, or method of proceeding—to make peace and war, leagues and treaties, general command over the Constable's and Admiral's Courts for the raising, disposing and disbanding of the land and sea forces—the judging of all causes and appeals affecting any of the Proprietors or the Counsellors of their courts—and the disposition of all monies voted by the Parliament and directed by it to any particular public use. But these, in the opinion of the colonists, were but as trifles, compared with the other and most vital matters. This court was directed "to prepare all matters to be proposed in Parliament. Nor shall any matter whatsoever be proposed in Parliament but what has first passed the Grand Council." One might safely presume that the Proprietors would be content with this two-fold limitation upon the power of the Parliament—that having provided that only such measures should be considered by it as were proposed by their courts, and that then they, sitting in the Palatine's Court could nullify any act so passed—they would be satisfied that this sickly shadow of authority could in no manner be hurtful to their interests. And yet so tender were their Lordships as to their prerogatives, so distrustful of their own perspicacity, and their deputies, so afraid that they—sitting as the Grand Council—might propose some dangerous legislation to this bastard Parliament which it might accept, that by the 76th article it was declared that "No act of Parliament shall be of any force unless ratified in open Parliament" by the Palatine and three Proprietors, or their deputies; and even after such ratification, the act was to continue in force only until the next Biennial Parliament unless in the meantime ratified by the Palatine himself and three other Proprietors under their own proper hands and seals. No deputies this time "an it please you." Pray, of what avail were the reservations of the great charter to the freemen of the Province in the face of this unlawful assumption of more than kingly power? How long would the Parliament of England have suffered such extreme and arbitrary measures on the part of the King?

These were the great departments of the Government and the Chief Courts. But besides these there were County Courts, Precinct Courts, and a special court for the trial of all capital crimes. No cause could "be tried twice in the same court upon any reason or pretence whatever." But appeals to higher courts could be bought by paying to the Proprietors prices ranging from £5 to £50 in capital cases.

All jurors in the Precinct Courts were required to own 50 acres of freehold; all grand jurors in the County Courts and Assizes 300 acres, and all petty jurors 200 acres; and all jurors in the Proprietors' Courts must own 500 acres. A very decided change of opinion on the part of the Proprietors since 1663, when they gravely proclaimed that 10 acres of land was enough for any man to hold "in that growing country."

And yet with all this grand array of courts, all this confused and complicated machinery of law, lawyers were absolutely banned and proscribed. For by the 70th article it was declared, "It shall be a base and vile thing to plead for money or reward; nor shall any, (except he be a near kinsman, nor farther off than cousin, germane to the party concerned) be permitted to plead another man's cause, till before the Judge in open court he hath taken an oath, that he doth not plead for money or reward, nor hath nor will receive, nor directly nor indirectly bargain with the party whose cause he is going to plead, for money or any other reward for pleading his cause." This remarkable and unique provision was most undoubtedly the work of Locke, and copied by him after the Cincia Lex of the Roman Law—"Ne quis ob causam orandam pecuniam donumve accipiat."

The Parliament, or General Assembly as I shall hereafter call it, was composed of the four estates—the Proprietors or their deputies, landgraves, casiques and freeholders, all sitting together as one body. Only owners of 500 acres of freehold were eligible to the General Assembly, and every voter must own 50 acres. The Assembly was to meet biennially, and at the opening the first ceremony "was the reading of the Fundamental Constitutions, and its subscription by all the members present." For it was declared that no man should sit or vote in the Assembly until he had signed the Fundamental Constitutions. Elections for members of Assembly were to be held biennially.

...th Carolina ...e Library

"All manner of comments and expositions on any part of these Fundamental Constitutions, or on any part of the common or statute laws of Carolina, are absolutely prohibited." And so any criticism or discussion of any of these laws were "mala prohibita," crimes to be punished at the will of the Judges.

An office was established for the registration of conveyances, and one for births, marriages and deaths. The age of every one in the colony was reckoned from the date of the registration of his birth. No marriage was lawful until registered, and no administration could be had until the death of the decedent was registered. So that no man could be legally born, legally married, or legally dead until he was so registered.

All towns were to be governed by a Mayor, twelve (12) Aldermen and twenty-four (24) Common Councillors. The system so provided was a very cumbrous one for the small villages of the Province. This was in 1670; and yet in 1709, near forty (40) years later, it was said, (1 Coll. Rec., 715): "Here is no church, though they have begun to build a town called Bath. It consists of about twelve (12) houses, being the only town in the whole Province." This little town of Bath, which forty (40) years after the promulgation of the constitutions, only contained twelve (12) houses, was totally insufficient to furnish men enough to fill the municipal offices required by the above provision. Could there be stronger evidence of the total ignorance of the Lords Proprietors of the conditions existing in Carolina, and their incapacity to foster its growth and prosperity!

Port towns were to be established, and no goods or commodities could be lawfully exported or imported under a heavy penalty, unless loaded or unloaded at a port town.

It was declared by section 95 that no man could be permitted to be a freeman of Carolina or have any estate or habitation within it unless he acknowledge the divinity of God; and by section 101, that no person, man or woman, of seventeen (17) years and upwards could have any benefit or protection of the law unless he was a registered member of some church or religious body. And that in a country in which no church was built until many years after the promulgation of these constitutions!

Very broad and liberal provisions were made for the freedom of religious convictions and worship, and stringent laws against the disturbance of any religious congregation or abuse of any church or religion. But at the same time the Church of England was declared to be the only true and orthodox church, and the only one entitled to support from the public revenues. Locke, sturdy in his defense of entire religious freedom, bitterly opposed this clause and refused to draft it.

All persons were given absolute power and authority over their negro slaves, even that of life and death. This provision needs no comment, save that it never had the sanction of law in any Southern State during the days of slavery.

Now we come to the 112th Constitution, by which the Proprietors deliberately proposed the most illegal and deadly blow at the very life and being of the colonists. It boldly declared that no person whatever should hold or claim any land in Carolina by purchase or gift or otherwise, from the Indians, or any other way whatsoever, save under and from the Proprietors, under pain of forfeiting all his real and personal property and of perpetual banishment. This decreed confiscation and banishment to any man who dared to claim or assert the title which he had previously acquired to the little estate carved out for himself at so great a sacrifice, and which had been expressly saved and guaranteed to him by the very words of the King's Grant. These titles and rights were preserved to him not only by the grant, but also by Magna Charta, the greatest of those three great testaments, which, Chatham declared, composed "The Bible of the English Constitution." "Nullus liber homo capiatur, vel imprisonetur, aut utlagetur, aut exuleter, aut aliquo modo, destruatur, nec super eum ibimus, nec super eum mittemus, nisi per legale judicium parium suorum, vel per legem terrae."

"Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus rectum aut justitiam."

Near seven centuries have swept over the world since that historic drama on the willow clad banks of the Thames, when the great Barons, churchmen and yeomen of England wrung with mailed hand from King John this declaration of their rights and liberties. New kingdoms, new principalities, new republics have reared their proud heads among the nations of the world, while others, old and new, have crumbled and vanished into the gloom of eternal night. Weak nations have grown strong and powerful, while others, once strong and powerful, are barely allowed a national existence in the jealousy and fear of disturbing the balance of power. Strange and unexpected cataclysms have from time to time violently altered and changed the destinies of nations. But through all the Anglo-Saxon people alone, crucified at times by war, but purified by revolution, increasing, conquering, broadening and expanding, have reached that great eminence, where standing together, they easily dominate the world. And yet even though they have separated and divided into two great nations, they have each always jealously and religiously preserved unaltered to themselves and to their children as a sacred inheritance, the everlasting shelter and protection of Magna Charta. If the evil day shall ever come, when this great protection from wrong and oppression shall be destroyed, then will inevitably follow violence, distress, ruin and anarchy. And from this day and this fate may God in His infinite mercy ever preserve our people.

All inhabitants over seventeen (17) and under sixty (60) years of age were bound to serve as soldiers, whenever required so to do by the Grand Council.

A copy of the constitutions was to be kept "in a great book" by the register of every Precinct, and signed by every person, whether male or female, over the age of seventeen (17) years; and no such person who had failed to subscribe the constitutions could hold any estate or possession in Carolina, or have any benefit or protection from the law. Any alien could subscribe these constitutions before any Register, and ipso facto he was naturalized. And having thus declared the laws some eleven rules of precedency among the nobility were established.

This lengthy abstract of the constitutions is necessary to a full and proper understanding of the laws, so solemnly enacted and declared by the Proprietors for the government of their subjects. It is to be noted here that no system of taxation, of raising revenues for the support of this cumbrous government, and no salaries for any of the officers were provided. One would naturally suppose that in drafting laws which were intended to be forever unalterable, for the government of their new possessions, the Proprietors would have provided some system for the support and maintenance of the officers. Why this was done, or was not done, does not appear. The Provincial Parliament evidently provided for certain of the expenses of the Province. The chief officers certainly took care of themselves in the handling of the public moneys.

Having thus promulgated these solemn declarations of their unalterable will, but a few months passed before the Proprietors declared that "they were not able to put it fully in practice by reason of the want of Landgraves and Cassiques and a sufficient number of people." And yet in the very next breath, and in the same instructions, they speak of four precincts in Albemarle County, and direct the Governor to issue writs for the election of five representatives in each precinct to the General Assembly. This was fully six years and more after their grant. It would seem that the yeomen of Carolina were not very desirous of being raised into the nobility. In fact, while some twenty-five (25) Landgraves and twelve (12) Cassiques were created by the Proprietors, only two (2) Landgraves and no Cassiques can be credited to this State. The Landgraves were De Graffinreid, and perhaps Eden. Even in the bestowal of these titles of nobility the Proprietors violated the provisions of the grant which restricted them to the inhabitants of the Province. John Locke was the first Landgrave created, and many of the others were never in the Province at all. It would seem that in the beginning the Proprietors sent out to their Governors blank deputations for Landgraves and Cassiques, which were for sale to almost any one who would pay the required price; but these were cancelled or ordered to be cancelled by the instructions to Governor Nathaniel Johnson, in June, 1702, (1 Coll. Rec., page 556.) These facts show what little regard, in fact what contempt, the settlers in North Carolina had for such empty honors. They felt, and correctly, that if they accepted titles of nobility from the Proprietors, that they would be in duty bound as vassals to support their rule; but they had no intention or idea of surrendering their independence for such baubles. From this time on for some years we find the Lords Proprietors, in their instructions to the different Governors, continually lamenting their inability to put their celebrated constitutions in effect and force by reason of the lack of material out of which to build Landgraves and Cassiques. In truth, the provisions of the constitutions were never enforced in North Carolina. Hawks says, "At last, in 1698, these fundamental "immortals" were laid aside by the Lords Proprietors forever." (2 Vol., 185.) In this, as in many other things, he was in error; for in June, 1702, in their instructions to Governor Nathaniel Johnson, the Proprietors wrote him that "you are to follow such rules as we have given in our Fundamental Constitutions," etc. (1 Coll. Rec., 555.) And De Graffinreid was created a Landgrave August 4th, 1709. It may be curious to note that on the day he received the patent as Landgrave, De Graffinreid paid £50 to the Proprietors in part of the purchase of the land he had bought in North Carolina, and the greater part of it was immediately divided among the Proprietors, who each received a little over £5. It would seem from this that they were glad to get even so little amount as twenty-five dollars.

In commenting upon the existing conditions in the Colony at the time of the promulgation of these constitutions, Hawks most felicitously says, (Vol. 2, page 183): "Their Lordships theorized, the colonists felt: the Proprietors drew pictures, but the hardy woodmen of Carolina were grappling with stern realities. Titles of nobility, orders of precedence, the shows of an empty pageantry, were to them but toys which might amuse childhood; but there was no romance in watching the savage, or felling the forest, or planting the corn, or gathering the crop with the ever-present weapon in reach of the laboring hand. In short, 'the day of chivalry' had not then dawned on the widespread forests of Albemarle; and we may well believe that the rough colonists, in the mass, felt a sublime contempt alike for Palatine and Landgrave, and Cassique."

Governor succeeded Governor in quick succession. Drummond was succeeded by Stephens in 1667, who, in 1670, was succeeded by Carteret. There was some promise of peace and content in the Great Deed of Grant, but it was merely transient. The conflicting instructions to the different Governors, the flagrant violations of the provisions of the Great Charter, the attempts to deprive the settlers of their lands acquired by them prior to the charter, the attempt to deprive the General Assembly of an independent part in the making of the laws, all combined to produce dissatisfaction and discontent, which at times swelled into disorder and violence. A free Parliament, a free hand in the making of the laws by which they were to be governed and protected in the possession of their lands, were what the people were determined to have. Carteret was unable to breast the storm and carry out his instructions. He left the Province in disgust late in 1675 or early in 1676 to carry the tale of his failure to England, leaving, says Chalmers, "the administration in ill hands and worse order. In truth there was no Governor and no government in Albemarle for about two years." Two of the colonists, Eastchurch, who had been Speaker of the General Assembly, and one Miller, who had a "grievance," followed Carteret to England and to an audience with the Proprietors. Eastchurch, seeming to them "a very proper and able fellow," was made Governor in 1676, and Miller Secretary, and Deputy of Shaftesbury, and also collector of the King's revenue. At this time, according to Hawks, the colony of Albemarle contained some 2,500 to 3,000 people, of course not including tribal Indians. Twenty-five hundred people, and no man yearning for a patent of nobility!

In 1677 Eastchurch sailed from England, stopping in the West Indies, where, beguiled by love, he dallied some months till he was married. Miller went on to Albemarle, and upon his arrival, without the least warrant of authority, usurped and took to himself the government and control of the affairs of the Province. Drunk with his stolen authority, and often, the historians say, with liquor, he ruled the Province and squeezed the people in the lordly manner of the ancient robber Barons of the Rhine. In six short months he gathered to himself some five thousand dollars ($5,000) in money and thirty-three (33) hogsheads of tobacco from one item alone, the export duty on tobacco. Tobacco was virtually the currency of the Province, and by this time a very considerable and lucrative trade in it between Albemarle and New England settlers had grown up, and this Miller made strenuous efforts to break up and divert to England. Out of his oppressions and extortions sprang what is generally called "Culpepper's Rebellion." The colonists had lived for two years and more in peace and content, and without a Governor. The breath of freedom was in their nostrils. The Proprietors had seemingly abandoned or forgotten them; for here was this man, one of themselves, allowed to plunder them with impunity and without authority. The inevitable happened.

"The law protects not us; then why should we be tender,
To let an arrogant piece of flesh threat us."

Vexed and oppressed beyond endurance by the extravagant actions of Miller, the people arose in 1677 and seized and imprisoned him and the deputies of the Proprietors. Chalmers says, (2 Carroll, 304): "They seized the royal revenue, amounting to £3,000, which they appropriated for supporting the revolt; they established courts of justice; they appointed officers; they called a Parliament, and for years exercised all the authority of an independent State." What nobler and bolder stand for their just rights could any people have taken! And this was but the prelude to what followed. For from now on, upon reading the history of our State as written in her records, we will find our ancestors in constant revolt against the oppression and injustice of their rulers The insurgents, and among them were the most prominent and wealthy men in the Province, including the President of the Grand Council, in defense of their action, declared that Miller had "positively cheated the country out of 130,000 pounds of tobacco, had raised the taxes, misapp opriated the public funds, and denied them a free Parliament." Miller, escaping from prison, fled to England to spread his complaints in every quarter, and with the eager and confident expectation of warm approval and armed support from the Proprietors. He had before complained and triumphed, but now he met only bitter disappointment and humiliation.

Eastchurch now arrived in the colony with a commission as Governor, and authority from the Proprietors that was unquestionable. But the colonists were in an ugly mood. They had tasted of independence, and it was sweet and gracious to their taste. They would have none of Eastchurch, and he went to Virginia to seek aid and military support to establish himself firmly in the enjoyment of his just rights as Governor. But, fortunately for the colonists, he died before a sufficient number of troops was gathered to him.

Culpepper boldly followed Miller to England and confronted him before the Proprietors. Their accusations against each other and recriminations brought distress to both. Miller was put aside with contumely, and Culpepper indicted for treason; but he, that is Culpepper, was defended by Shaftesbury himself and acquitted. Undoubtedly he could have only been defended and acquitted upon the ground that Miller was a mere usurper, with no lawful claim to the authority and power which he had exercised over the Province. This uprising of the people against oppression was the first armed expression in the State of that yearning for freedom and independence, which later on was so often and so conspicuously displayed by them. It was a brave and reckless deed which the men of Albemarle did, in the very face of the extreme and bloody punishments which had so recently been inflicted in Virginia by the vindictive Berkeley on the unfortunate followers of Bacon. But there was this pregnant difference in the results of these two uprisings: Virginia was a royal Province, and a fleet and soldiers were sent to it to crush Bacon and his adherents; while the Proprietors forgave, even to the verge of approval, the acts done in the Province of North Carolina. Looking at this event from the standpoint of their interests, it is impossible to account for their extremely weak and vacillating, indeed almost apologetic course of action, save upon one ground, their habitual aversion to the expending of any money out of their own pockets for the protection of their interests in Albemarle. If they had sent a fleet and soldiers to put down the revolt with a stern and bloody hand, and had followed this with strong government, how far-reaching may have been the effect! It would most probably have secured to them their possessions until the revolution; and even in that struggle might possibly have made the States South of Virginia loyal to them and their King. And if so, it is certain there would have been no King's Mountain, no Guilford Court House, no Yorktown, and no independence. It is difficult, if not impossible, for any impartial student to ascribe this uprising of the people to any other cause than that of a just and manly indignation and resentfulness of an unlawful invasion and denial of their rights. And yet Hawks heaps abuse and vilification with overflowing measure upon Culpepper and his followers. To him Miller was "the champion of order," "freedom's martyr," and his opponents, unprincipled, unscrupulous, bad, "a set of vulgar and ignorant insurgents and anarchists, * * * acting under the guidance of unscrupulous, artful and better informed leaders, whose most appropriate elevation would have been, not to the honor of legitimate office, but to the topmost heights of the gallows tree." This was a direct fling at the Proprietors, who afterwards appointed or recognized both John Harvey and Colonel Jenkins, who were both leaders in Culpepper's Rebellion, as Governors of the Province. Hawks even went to the extreme of abusing Shaftesbury for, that in defending Culpepper, "he robbed the gallows of its due." Truly North Carolina has been unfortunate in her historians! When one of her own sons, and he a man of such marked ability, declares false judgment against his own people, what better opinion could we expect from others. The Lords Proprietors themselves, at the time of the occurrence and after full consideration and examination into the facts, formed a very different view from that which Hawks wrote into the history of his State. Miller, repulsed by the Proprietors with contempt, was not content to leave the matter so, but carried his complaint to the Committee of Trade and Plantations, which as his Majesty's interest in the revenue was concerned, promptly called on the Proprietors for an explanation. The answer of the Proprietors, under date of November 20th, 1680, is in many respects a remarkable paper, (1 Coll. Rec., 326). It begins, "Mr. Thos. Miller, without any legal authority"—the italics are in the original—"got possession of the government of the County of Albemarle in Carolina in the year 1677, and was for a tyme quyettely obeyed, but doing many illegal and arbitrary things, and drinking often to excess, and putting the people in generall, by his threats and actions in great dread of their lives and estates, and they, as we suppose getting some knowledge that he had no legal authority, tumultously and disorderly imprisoned him, and suddenly after Mr. Biggs and Mr. Nixon for adhering to Mr. Miller and abetting him in some of his actions, and revive an accusation against Mr. Miller of treasonable words, for which he had been formerly imprisoned, but never tryed, and appoynt Mr. Culpepper to receive the King's customs, etc." It further states that they had appointed Seth Sothell, "a sober, moderate man," who had lately become one of the Proprietors, Governor, but that he had been "taken by the Turks and carried into Angiers," (sic); that on hearing of this they had appointed John Harvey Governor until the arrival of Sothell, and sent his commission by Robert Holden, who had been appointed by the King's commissioners of customs, Collector of his Majesty's customs in Albemarle; that Harvey had died and the Grand Council had appointed Colonel Jenkins in the place of Governor, "ad interim," and that they were sending out Colonel Wilkinson temporarily as Governor. This report or explanation is a complete justification of the action of the colonists, evidently so intended, and a repudiation of the acts of Miller that whilom, "Champion of order" and "freedom's martyr." Harvey and Jenkins were both later on Governors of the Province; Holden, Durant, Blount, Willoughby, White, Bruner, Slocumb, Calloway, Lillington, Jarvis, and many other of the adherents of Culpepper, bore names which have since illumined the pages of the history of this State.

Harvey died very soon and was succeeded by Jenkins. But little is known of the short official life of Jenkins, but he was evidently "persona non grata" to the colonists, for he was deposed by the people. We are not enlightened by the historians as to the cause of his deposition, but as the Proprietors did not resent it, but seemingly concurred in it, by appointing Wilkinson to succeed him, we must assume that the people had just grounds for their extreme action. Sothell was worse than Miller. Hawks says, (Vol. 2, page 486): "His principles would not have disgraced an education in a college of thieves, and his morals illustrated the purity of a gambling-house. He had purchased the right of Clarendon as Proprietor, for no other purpose than to be placed officially in a position to plunder; and it was not long ere he had exhibited evidence that he was capable of almost any crime, and equally an adept in all." Hawks was right this time, for Sothell well merited all the abuse and opprobrious names which Hawks heaped upon him in that vigorous style of which he was such a master. The patience and endurance of the colonists was finally exhausted, and in 1688, although Sothell was one of the Lords Proprietors, one of their lawful sovereigns, he was seized by them and imprisoned preparatory to being sent to England for trial. Sothell, however, did not want to be sent to England, but, Governor though he was, begged that he be tried and judged of by the General Assembly of the Province. The General Assembly found him guilty on all the charges brought against him, banished him from the Province for twelve months and compelled him to abjure the government of the Province forever. The Lords Proprietors mildly protested against this action of the colonists as "prejudicial to the prerogative of the Crown and to their honor." But they quietly submitted as usual and sent out another Governor. It does not concern us, however, to follow any further the fortunes of the various Governors sent out to Albemarle. A few specimens of them is sufficient. Raper says (page 6), that "From 1674 to 1712 the colonists knew little of governmental restraints except those of their own making, and drove out of office six of their fourteen Governors or Deputy Governors."

A mere cursory review of the Fundamental Constitutions makes it plain even to a casual reader, that they were utterly unsuited to the times, the situations and the people. There were laws in abundance—laws that were good, and others that were bad—some that were chimerical, and others most sensible—some despotic, others mild and lenient—and some Utopian, while others were brutal. Balancing the bad against the good, the bad greatly predominated. And to this was added the still greater evil of weak and unprincipled Governors. Hence the people refused the constitutions, and they were never enforced in Albemarle. Over and over again did the Proprietors in their letters and instructions to the Governors and Deputy Governors of the Province acknowledge their inability to enforce the provisions of the constitutions; and always for the same and entirely erroneous reason that they could not find men worthy of nobility. If they had said that they could not find men who were ready and willing to buy themselves titles of nobility, that would have been nearer the truth. The weak and vacillating policy of the Proprietors, their greediness for revenue and stinginess for appropriations and financial aid, their easy condonation of the insubordination and revolts of the colonists, the weakness, greed and lack of principle and courage of their various Governors and Deputy Governors all inspired the people to a system of constant and persistent resistance against the laws and their rulers. Most unfortunately, the records of the proceedings and debates in the General Assemblies of that period have been lost, and we will never know the people's side of the question, the true reason for those acts, which have induced historians to denounce the early settlers of Albemarle as refugees from justice, absconding debtors, and law-breakers, reeking with turbulence and sedition. The truth is, and I am cherishing the hope that in the very near future an historian will make it plain, that they were a race of sturdy, independent, self-respecting men, always ready to obey cheerfully just laws and honest rule, but equally ready to resist oppression and evil rule. With the injustice of the first laws still rankling in their hearts, about the only effect of the coming of the constitutions was to knit the people more firmly together in their determination to resist all unjust laws.

And so the Fundamental Constitutions, after a stormy life spent in vainly striving to make a home in Albemarle, were shipwrecked and lost. They were never enforced, never abrogated or repealed, but simply died from inanition.

As it may interest some of the readers of the BOOKLET to know in what manner and by what mystic words and rites nobles were created in the Province, I give below a copy of the patent which was granted by the Proprietors to Landgrave, Thomas Smith, of Charleston, South Carolina. It is in the following words:

William Lord Craven, Palatine of Carolina, and the rest of the Lords Proprietors of the same, to all officers and ministers, & all the free inhabitants of the Province of Carolina, Greeting.

Whereas, his most serene Majesty, Charles 2nd of Great Brittain France & Ireland King Defender of the Faith &c of his special grace and favor has given and granted to us: together with the Province of Carolina power of constituting States, Degrees & Titles of Dignities and Honours in the said Province & Preferring to the said Degrees men of Merit & graceing & adorning such with Titles of Honours. And Whereas according to the forms of Government by us Established & which is perpetually to be observed by us and our successors: its appointed that there shall be a certain number of Landgraves and Cassaques who shall be the Perpetual & Hereditary Nobles and Peers of our Province of Carolina. And Whereas Thomas Smith a person of singular Merit will be very servisable to us by his great Prudence & Industry & we being willing to reward a Gentleman that has deserved so well of us we have Constituted him a Landgrave.....

Know ye therefore that as a lasting Monument both of our favor and his Merits we have promoted the said Thomas Smith & credited him Landgrave and by these presents do prefer to and confer upon the same Thomas Smith the Name, State, Degree, Style, Dignitie, Title & Honour of a LANDGRAVE together with four Barroneys each of which shall containe Twelve Thousand Acres of Land and Other Privileges pertaining to the said Dignity, and forever unseparably Annexed to the same, and we have given and granted & by these presents in behalf of ourselves our Heirs & Successors, do give and grant to the said Thomas Smith his Heirs and Successors the Name, State, Degree, Stile, Dignity, Title, and Honour of Landgrave together with the four Barroneys Ennexed & all & every the rights Preeminencies privileges and Immunities belonging to the said Dignity, to hand and to hold the same according to the Dignity of our FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTION with and by these presents granting that the said Thomas Smith and his Heirs aforesaid shall always successively bear the name and enjoy State, Degree, Style, Dignity, Title and Honour of Landgrave and possess the four Barroneys annexed, and that Every one of them should bear, have and possess, and by the name of LANDGRAVE be called and named, and that the said Thomas Smith & his Heirs aforesaid should be successively held in in all things as Landgraves and be treated and Reputed as such, and every one of them should be so held, and reputed. And that they should forever have hold and possess and each of them enjoy the four Barroneys Annext paying annually for each acre a penny Lawful money of England to us and our Heirs, which payment is to commence about the end of the year One Thousand Six Hundred and Ninety. And Furthermore that the said Thomas Smith and his heirs aforesaid, all and singular of them should possess and use by the name of LANDGRAVE all and every the rights, privileges, preeminencies and Immunities which in Law & right belong to the said State. In witness whereof we have caused these our Letters to be made Pattent under our Great Seale of Carolina; given from and under our hands the Thirteenth day of May Anno. Dom. 1691.

The document, of which the foregoing is a copy, is very ancient, and is now in the possession of Mr. Edw. S. Tennant, of Spartanburg, South Carolina, whose father, Edward Tennant, was a lineal descendant of the Landgrave. The signatures have been cut off; and on the back of it is endorsed "The Landgrave Pattent, Englished." So the original was probably in Latin, and this is only a translation.

The four Baronies, 48,000 acres of land, were taken up by the Landgrave on the west side of Cape Fear River, in what is now Brunswick County, and included the large island at the mouth of the Cape Fear River called "Smith's Island," which took its name from the Landgrave.

INDUSTRIAL LIFE IN COLONIAL CAROLINA.

BY THOMAS M. PITTMAN.

If full credit be given the early writers on Carolina, we must believe that the men of that period were chiefly concerned to avoid every form of industry that involved physical labor or inconvenience. Lawson says, "Some of the men are very laborious and make great improvement in their way, but I hardly dare give them that character in general." And again, "The planter sits contented at home whilst his oxen thrive and grow fat, and his stocks daily increase; the fatted porkets and poultry are easily raised to his table, and his orchard affords him liquor, so that he eats and drinks away the cares of the world, and desires no greater happiness than that which he daily enjoys." It is quite possible that Lawson, and Brickell who copied him closely, had in mind the attraction of new settlers to Carolina and sought to convey the idea that living was easy. Col. Byrd, on the other hand, was contemptuous towards Carolina, and most likely fell into exaggeration from that feeling. He says in the Westover MSS.: "The men for their parts, just like the Indians, impose all the work upon the poor women. They make their wives rise out of their beds early in the morning, at the same time that they lie and snore till the sun has risen one-third of his course, and dispersed all the unwholesome damps; then, after stretching and yawning for half an hour, they light their pipes, and, under the protection of a cloud of smoke, venture out into the open air; though if it happen to be never so little cold, they quickly return shivering into the chimney corner. When the weather is mild, they stand leaning with both arms upon the cornfield fence, and gravely consider whether they had best go and take a small heat at the hoe; but generally find reason to put it off 'till another time. Thus they loiter away their lives like Solomon's sluggard, with their arms across, and at the winding up of the year, scarcely have bread to eat."

No such imputations, however, attach to the mothers of those early days. They are ever spoken of with high appreciation. Lawson tells us: "The women are the most industrious sex in that place, and, by their good housewifery, make a great deal of cloth of their own cotton, wool and flax; some of them keeping their families, though large, very decently apparcled both with linens and woolens, so that they have no occasion to run into the merchant's debt, or pay their money out in stores for clothing." Again, "Many of the women are very handy in canoes and will manage them with great dexterity and skill, which they become accustomed to in this watery country. They are ready to help their husbands in any servile work, as planting, when the season or the weather requires expedition; pride seldom banishing good housewifery. The girls are not bred up to the wheel and sewing only, but the dairy and the affairs of the house they are very well acquainted withal; so that you shall see them, while very young, manage their business with a great deal of conduct and alacrity." An incident recorded in George Fox's Journal shows that women of even the highest station were skilled in the handling of boats. On one occasion he was unable to bring his boat to the shore, when the wife of the Secretary of the Province, seeing his strait, as he says, "came herself in a canoe, her husband being from home, and brought us to land."

As opposed to the suggestion of indolence on the part of the men, the proposal of Tymothy Biggs to the Lords Proprietors in 1679, concerning Albemarle, shows that "Ye Inhabitants have liven and gott Estates under ye Lord^{ps} there by their owne Industry and brought it to the capacity of a hopeful settlement and ere these had it had your Lord[ps] smiles and assistance but a tenth part of what your Southern parts have had It would have been a flourishing settlement."

It must not be supposed that the settlers were entirely dependent upon the labor of their own hands in the mastery of this new land. There were many slaves in the colony—white, Indian and negro—to whom fell the greater burden of reclaiming the wilderness. The whites consisted of male and female convicts who, we are told, were "bought by the planters for the terms specified in their respective warrants, and worked with the negro slaves, under the lash of an overseer." Many of these, by industry and reformation of life, prospered when finally released from bondage, so that one old writer tells us that "thousands of them, if we are not misinformed, have by turning their hands to industry and improvement, and, which is best of all, to honesty, became rich, substantial planters and merchants, settled large families, and been famous in the country; nay, we have seen many of them made magistrates, officers of militia, captains of good ships, and masters of good estates." This was written of Virginia, but the similarity of conditions in the two colonies makes the statement as applicable to one as the other, except that there were more of such slaves in Virginia than in Carolina.

Naturally the first interest of the settlers was the building of houses, the clearing of land and the development of agriculture. There was no inn or place of accommodation. Literally a place to lay the head had to be created from timbers yet standing in the forests. Title to their lands was also dependent upon such improvements. Their grants contained a proviso, that if the grantee, his heirs or assigns "doe not seat or plant or cause to be seated or planted upon y[e] s[d] Land w[t]in three years after y[e] next Insueing y[t] then it shall be lawful for any Adventurer or planter to make choice and seat thereupon." That agriculture was prosecuted with enterprise and vigor is manifest from the extraordinary statement, that aside from the supplies grown for their own necessities, tobacco, the great market crop, was grown to such extent in Albemarle, that in 1679, it yielded annual custom duties of at least £8,000 sterling—a most remarkable showing when we recall that the total white population of all the scattered settlements in the colony did not equal that of one-third or fourth rate town of the State at this time. At an earlier date even, the competition of this product with that grown in Maryland and Virginia had so embarrassed the trade of those colonies that they sought to induce a reduction of the crop.

The mild winters and fertile lands were so favorable to vegetable life that prodigious crops were produced—almost beyond credulity. Like favorable conditions furnished an opportunity for breeding horses, cattle, sheep and swine to great advantage, which the settlers availed of to become rich in flocks and herds. Lawson declares that the "beef of Carolina equals the best that our neighboring colonies afford. * * * The veal is very good and white. * * * Mutton is generally exceeding fat and of a good relish. * * * The horses are well shapen and swift. * * * The pork exceeds any in Europe." The writer of this paper has old letters of a later period, from which appears a custom of driving hogs in great droves to the Virginia markets from North Carolina. These products of the forest, farm and field were so greatly in excess of the needs of the people as to support a considerable export trade in "beef, pork, tallow, hides, deer skins, furs, pitch, tar, wheat, Indian corn, peas, masts, staves, heading boards, and all sorts of timber and lumber for Madeira and the West Indies, rosin, turpentine and several sorts of gum and tears, with some medicinal drugs." Many fish were also exported and considerable quantities of butter and cheese of good quality.

Manufactures, in the modern acceptance of that term, can scarcely be said to have had an existence in the colony. Yet the existence of a lumber trade suggests, and credible historians argue, that saw-mills must have existed here at a time when mob violence would not tolerate them in England. Good brick and tiles were made and worked into buildings still in use; also lime, which was made of oyster shells, the limestone deposit being too far inland for the convenience of the early settlers.

Buildings were at first of extremely primitive design and construction. Col. Byrd's description of the houses and fences will interest the older readers by its close resemblance to those of their own recollection. "Most of the houses in this part of the country are log cabins, covered with pine or cypress shingles, three feet long and one foot broad. They are hung upon laths with pegs, and their doors too turn upon wooden hinges, and have wooden locks to secure them, so that the building is finished without nails or other iron work." The fence: "They also set up their poles without any nails at all, and indeed more securely than those that are nailed. There are three rails mortised into the posts, the lowest of which serves as a sill with a groove in the middle, big enough to receive the end of the poles; the middle part of the pole against the inside of the next rail, and the top of it is brought forward to the outside of the uppermost. Such wreathing of the poles, in and out, makes them stand firm, and much harder to unfix than when nailed in the ordinary way." In a little while, however, frame, brick and stone houses came into vogue, and were fairly representative of the growing prosperity and ambitions of the people. They also evidence the improved facilities for building and the presence of skilled artificers and mechanics. Some of the houses of the Colonial period would make a creditable appearance in advanced and prosperous communities of the present day. Dr. Rumple gives an account of the "Old Stone House" erected in Rowan by Michael Braun (Brown) of "native, unhewn, but rather well-shaped blocks of granite laid in cement so durable that it still stands in ridges between the stones." We are without the record of any furnace making iron plates in this State during the colonial period, but the inscriptions on the plates of the fire-box or stove of this house give pretty certain assurance of their American manufacture and indicate the possibility of Carolina origin. On one plate the inscription is

COM . BAN . NI :
1766 "

On another—

GEORGE ROSS . ANN
MARY ANN FURNACE."

It was quite evidently the work of a German-American, but whether from Pennsylvania or North Carolina, does not appear.

Brickell, whose book was published in 1737, notes that "The men are very ingenius in several Handycraft Business, and in building their canoes and houses." Describing the houses of the period, he says, "The most substantial Planters generally use Brick and Lime, which is made of Oyster Shells, for there are no stones to be found proper for that purpose, but near the mountains; the meaner sort erect with Timber, the outside with Clap-Boards, the Roofs of both sorts of houses are made with Shingles, and they generally have Sash Windows, and affect large and decent Rooms with great Closets, as they do most beautiful Prospect by some noble River or Creek." Dr. Hawks adds, "The chimneys of the better class of houses, as well as ovens, were built of brick. Indeed, a brick chimney was a mark of gentility in its owner."

Naturally the earlier and more important trades represented among the early artisans were those connected with the building and related interests, as sawyers, brick, tile and lime makers, carpenters, masons, and blacksmith. The services of the smith, however, were by no means confined to the building interests. He was the metal worker of the community. "We have abundant evidence of his early presence in the province, though the iron which he wrought was all, at first, brought from abroad. The division of labor which in older countries characterized this branch of mechanical art, did not obtain in Carolina. The smith who made or repaired the implement of husbandry, was equally skilful in mending the gun-lock or making a hinge. So valuable was this artisan to the neighborhood that we find on the records of the Council, during the Indian War of 1711, representations made from a neighborhood of the indispensable need of a blacksmith in the settlement, and a consequent special order that he should be exempt from military duty, that he might not be obliged to march against the savages, and thus deprive the people of his important services." (Hawks.)

The carpenter, too, was in demand for making the furniture, implements and vehicles of the period, as well as for house building.

Another group of workers, most important, were those who contributed to the clothing of the people as tanners, shoemakers, weavers, tailors and hatters. The tanners learned from the Indians a mode of tanning deer skins, which converted them into a soft and pliable material of great toughness and endurance. This was extensively used for the ordinary dress of woodmen, and was admirably adapted to that purpose. The abundance of hides and the facilities for tanning them at small cost made this a most important industry, so that Dr. Hawks doubts "whether any manufactory in the province was more common than that of leather."

The shoemaker was sometimes tanner, too; and often a general worker in leather, making harness and saddles as well as shoes. They were reputed more numerous than weavers and smiths combined.

Dr. Rumple describes the towns as "composed of the public buildings, the residences of some of the county officials, a store or two, a hatter-shop, a blacksmith shop, a tailor shop, and a few inns."

There were also the trades relating to commerce—coopering and ship-building, both of which were considerable industries, the preparation of naval stores, the manufacture of tar, etc. To these should be added the fishing industry, licensed by the Governor. One writer mentions seeing, at one time, three New England whalers at Cape Fear.

The German settlements in the later Colonial period furnish probably the most interesting examples of industrial life in the history of the period embraced in this paper. Their indifferent knowledge of the English language cut them off largely from participation in the general movements of the times. "Hence letting public affairs alone, and attending to their home interests, they surrounded themselves with well-tilled farms, and adorned their premises with capacious barns and threshing-floors. Who has not seen the immense double barns, with wide double doors, to admit a four-horse wagon with its towering load of hay, or straw or wheat; and the threshing-floor, where the horses tramped out the wheat, and the wind-mill blew the chaff into the chaff-house? And who has forgotten the long stables where the cows were yoked to the trough, each one knowing her place, while the calves were tied to a trough at the other wall." (Rumple.)

The first Moravian settlers, who founded the village of Bathabara, consisted of twelve men, the most complete industrial group that ever came to the State. There was a minister, a warden (the business man), a physician, a tailor, a baker, two carpenters, a gardener, a shoemaker and tanner, and three farmers. Within the first year they had established and put in operation seven distinct enterprises, as follows: Carpenter Shop, Tailor Establishment, Pottery, Blacksmith Shop, Shoe Shop, Tannery, Cooper Shop. A mill was under way, but had not then been completed.

Within three weeks after their arrival six acres of land had been cleared and planted in winter wheat. During the first year not less than fifty acres were cleared and prepared for farming purposes. "In the first summer they gathered wheat, corn, flax, millet, barley, oats, buckwheat, turnips, cotton and tobacco in addition to the garden vegetables. Fruit trees were planted, and various kinds of medicinal herbs." (Clewell.)

Many reminders and specimens of the handiwork of the early days are preserved in the intensely interesting museum at Salem, which the writer of this paper was permitted to visit during the fall of 1906, through the courtesy of Judge Starbuck, and Mr. Lineback, the custodian. It is a pleasure to note that the community planted upon an industrial basis so sound and prudent has steadily prospered during its entire history and stands to-day unsurpassed by any community within the State in all the elements of a prosperous, enlightened and elevated citizenship.

NOTE.—The materials for this paper are drawn from Lawson's, Brickell's and Hawks' Histories of North Carolina, Bernheim's German Settlements, Reichel's Moravians, Clewell's Wachovia, Rumple's Rowan, The Colonial Records, etc.

An Address at Banquet Given by Newport News Chamber of Commerce to the League of Virginia Municipalities and Visiting North Carolinians Preceding the Launching of the U. S. Cruiser North Carolina.

BY HON. JAMES ALSTON CABELL.

"Governor Swanson showed good discretion in selecting Hon. James Alston Cabell to represent him at the 'North Carolina launching' banquet. Mr. Cabell's address was scholarly, tactful, generous and eloquent, and, with the good taste of a gentleman, he paid tribute to North Carolina's valor, chivalry and glorious achievement, without giving his remarks the sickly savor of flattery. In an address of this character, by a speaker of one State to an audience from another, one is apt to be either patronizing, or gushing. Mr. Cabell went to neither extreme. His praise consisted not in the emptiness of fine phrases, but in the recitation of the facts of history. It seems to us to have been an admirable address for such an occasion and was duly appreciated, we doubt not, by our neighbors from the Old North State"—Editorial Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 7, 1906

"OUR DEAREST NEIGHBOR—THE OLD NORTH STATE"

> "Great souls by instinct to each other turn, > Demand alliance and in friendship burn."

I suppose it is understood that the Governor of Virginia was to have responded to this toast, but was unable to be present. I have been requested by him to express to you his heartfelt regrets. When your accomplished chairman informed me of the condition of affairs, and asked me to come to you, I thought of a scene in the closing chapter of one of Tom Page's stories, "Mah Lady," in which the minister, standing before the couple about to be married, asks: "Who gives this woman to this man?" and the old darkey said: "When he ax dat question and look at me and I think about all the suffin' we done been thro', and old Missus and Marse Phil all gone, and dere ain't nobody to took up for de poor chile, I couldn't help it, so I says, when he ax dat question, 'Unc. Billy.'"

So when I thought of the Governor of Virginia being away, especially at this time, just as the big crowd has assembled here to witness the ceremonies of the marriage of a veritable queen, the battleship North Carolina to the king of waters, and that there would be no one to speak for the "poor chile," for the Governor of North Carolina will have his hands full in speaking for Virginia, I feel like "Unc. Billy," and am here to speak all unprepared and unfitted as I feel myself to be.

I do not know that I am wholly unfitted to respond for North Carolina. Some of my ancestors, of whom I am proudest, were North Carolinians, and played a prominent part in all the eventful epochs of her early history, and I am proud to say I am a member of the North Carolina, as well as the Virginia Society of the Cincinnati. I know her history, and delight to recall her glorious past, rich in lofty and heroic examples, and to witness her splendid present, so full of courage and industry and wisdom.

We all must admit that North Carolina had an excellent start, because when she began her career she was "Virginia," and she has done so amazingly well that we Virginians like to remind her of it, and we are proud to know that her first permanent settlement was made by Virginians. But she goes back of this and tells us that she boasts of the first English settlement in the new world, and that Virginia Dare, the first child of the English race, born on this continent, was hers. She was then known as "Virginia." Her first Governor, William Drummond, came to her from Virginia, and he began from the start to make her a record by becoming a patriot and martyr. Every boy knows that she boasts of being once the home of Daniel Boone, that prince of pioneers, king of Indian fighters and pride of Kentucky. Not to speak of Flora McDonald, that picturesque and lovely Scotch heroine, as well as a number of romantic characters. But when we come to call over the names of her truly great men, and to look at her history, so resplendent with great names and great deeds, we must admit that no after-dinner speech can do her justice.

As I stood last April by the grave of Cornelius Harnett, in Wilmington, and took part in the laying of the cornerstone of the monument to be erected to his memory, and heard the long roll-call of North Carolina's immortals, I felt what the orator said was true, that the very air we breathed was fragrant with the incense of offerings laid on the altars of liberty and constitutional government, that that hallowed spot was richly red with patriotic blood. That the page of history was luminous with the records of deeds of valor done by North Carolina's sons.

But her's is indeed a wonderful history. It is connected with much of the romance of the career of Sir Walter Raleigh and Queen Elizabeth. No less a man than the famous John Locke drew up for her the most elaborate and comprehensive scheme of government ever devised for any colony. It was called the "Fundamental Constitution or Grand Model." From the earliest times she offered a retreat for the oppressed and unfortunate, and her history has been singularly free from the charge of persecution. She has ever been prompt to assert her rights and stand up for what she believed to be just. The first blood shed in the cause of the Revolution was upon her soil, and was that of her sons. First at the battle of the Alamance, May 16, 1771, and again at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, where Caswell defeated the British February 27, 1776. Henry Alexander White, in his recent History of the United States, says: "That this was the first clear victory won by the Americans in the war of independence. It was great in its results. It caused the failure of the British plan to land a large army in North Carolina." In spite of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Ritchie it appears to be proven that she pronounced the first declaration of independence. She had her own tea party. Fully as patriotic and much more delightful to read of than any Boston ever produced. Colonel Hunter's ride (with the halter around his neck with which he was to have been hung) on Fanning's own stallion, down the side of the steep rock to Deep River, put Putnam's little exploit, down the steps, out of sight. Her resistance to the stamp act was bolder and more effective than that in any of the other colonies. The defiance she flung to tyranny, and the love and devotion she gave to liberty was second to none. King's Mountain and Guilford Court House changed the tide of war and led to Cornwallis's defeat at Yorktown. She has always played her part well. Slow to determine but prompt to act. She voted against secession, and was the last State to leave the Union, but the first blood shed for the Confederacy was that of one of her sons. She seems to have raised a storm by asserting the proud claim to 'First at Bethel, farthest at Gettysburg, and last at Appomattox.' I am not going to get into hot water by discussing this matter, but will simply say that the glory that North Carolina won in the Confederate war will endure as long as this country endures, or as men revere devotion to duty and splendid courage. How well she fought is shown by the wonderful record of 127,000 of her sons sent to the Confederate armies, 42,000 of these killed or wounded. What a story! What a glorious record! I wish that time permitted me to say all that I could, and all that I would like to say about this grand old State.

No Virginian will knowingly withhold the praise that belongs to North Carolina. She was once Virginia. She was Virginia before the three famous ships sailed into this beautiful harbor, three hundred years ago, whose advent North Carolina is going to help us celebrate next year. Her first permanent settlement was made by Virginians in 1688. When she gave tobacco, potatoes and Indian corn to the world she was known as Virginia. It was all then "Virginia." All one then, and all one now, if our hearts are to make answer, whatever the difference in name. Our destinies have ever been, and must ever be the same, bound together as we are by a thousand tender memories and a thousand ties of common interests. As in the past, so in the future, America will again require the leadership of Virginia and North Carolina.

In the past, North Carolina was singularly careless about her history. She was content to do splendid things and let others claim the glory. The old books told us her principal products were "tar, pitch and turpentine," but they said little of her great products—her splendid women and her noble men. Believe me, she has always had something precious and distinctive in manhood and character to contribute to American life. She has awakened at last to the importance of letting the world know of her great children, and what they have done for this country. She is showing a past glittering with glorious deeds and an ancestry full of lofty and heroic examples. The sole object we have in view in recounting the great deeds of our ancestors and keeping alive their memories, is to infuse into the minds of the people a like spirit. This, indeed, is the object of all history, and as Lord Bolingbroke says: "It should be neither to soothe our indolence nor to gratify our vanity." The true and proper object is a constant improvement in private and public virtue. In this age of money-making, when the lust of wealth is threatening the ruin of the country, it is well that the people should be reminded by the examples of men who have gone before, that they owe something to their motherland. A child-like attachment to the native soil has in all ages been the strongest and simplest basis of patriotism. It has ever been the inspired theme of all great seers and poets, and it is to-day the stronghold of all nationality.

Wherever this spirit is appealed to, in the rugged mountains of Switzerland, on the vine-clad waters of the Rhine, on the sacred soil of France, or in the marshes of Holland, we see the old worldworn nations becoming children in the violence of their passions.

What better way to foster this spirit, and infuse a love of native land and inspire the hearts of the people, than to keep before them the great deeds of their ancestors. The citizens of Rome placed the images of their ancestors in the vestibule of their houses, so that whenever they went in or out, those venerable busts met their eyes and recalled the glorious actions of the dead to fire the living, to excite them to imitate and even to emulate their great forefathers. The success answered the design. The virtue of one generation was transfused, by the magic of example, into several; and the spirit of heroism was maintained throughout many ages of that commonwealth. Let us continue to keep alive the memory of the great men who made these great States what they are, keeping ever fresh the recollection of the illustrious deeds of those great patriots who have gone before us, and by the magic of example, let them be infused into this generation. Let the people who know who were the men that established Virginia and North Carolina; that in their veins ran the blood of fierce, war-like, liberty-loving ancestors, rendering them incapable of counting the costs of resistance when liberty was at stake; let them know that the bold spirit which sustained their fathers in the trying hours of the Revolution and the Confederacy, has been transmitted to them unimpaired as their heritage and birthright.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF CONTRIBUTORS.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

ALFRED MOORE WADDELL.

Hon. Alfred Moore Waddell, LL.D., whose valuable article on "North Carolina in the French and Indian War" appears in this issue, was born in Hillsboro, N. C., September 16th, 1834, educated at Bingham's School, Caldwell Institute, and graduated at the University of North Carolina, class of 1856. He read law under Chief Justice Nash, Judge Bailey, Judge Battle and Hon. Samuel F. Phillips. Since 1856 he has made his home in Wilmington, N. C. He edited the Wilmington Herald in 1860; entered the Confederate Army in 1861; was made Adjutant and advanced to Lieutenant-Colonel; was elected to Congress in 1870; was re-elected three terms; served from March 4th, 1871, to March 4th, 1879; was Chairman of Post-office Committee of the House during his last term; was elected Mayor of Wilmington five times. Colonel Waddell is a lawyer of acknowledged ability and distinguished for his power and eloquence as a public speaker and as a painstaking historian. He has brought to light many instances in the history of our State which have been generally unknown to the people of the other States. Col. Waddell was one of the twelve writers who contributed an article for Volume 1st of THE BOOKLET. His article was entitled "The Stamp Act on the Cape Fear." This recital of events leading to the Revolution is founded on the incontrovertable fact, that the Stamp Act, which was passed by the British Parliament March 22, 1765, and the repeal of which occurred just one year afterwards, was one of the most potent causes of the Revolution of 1776, which resulted in the establishment of the government of the United States; that in the old Colonial town of Brunswick, sixteen miles below Wilmington, on the Cape Fear River, the first armed resistance to British oppression on this continent occurred on the 28th of November, 1765. This was ten years before the Revolution and nine years before the Boston Tea Party. Colonel Waddell asserts "with absolute confidence, that while all the other colonies were resolute in their determination to resist the Stamp Act, yet in one colony only did they openly, in large numbers and with arms in their hands, resist in armed force a 20-gun sloop of war—in an attempt to land the stamps, and this two weeks after they had compelled a stamp master to resign his office."

Col. Waddell, in the article referred to, has given a full recital of the events leading to this armed resistance, not only the tradition as handed down to sons and daughters of the men who did these things, but the facts which are verified by Governor Tryon's letter book, which was discovered in London in 1848. There were various versions of the story before the contemporaneous records were brought to light, although in regard to the main facts they agreed. One of these versions confused these events with the "tea parties" of Edenton and Boston, which occurred several years afterwards.

North Carolina has ever been noted for the liberty-loving spirit of her people, and Bancroft, in his first edition, paid a magnificent and just tribute to this characteristic as displayed by them in Colonial days; but in editions published during the war for Southern Independence the tribute was eliminated and no longer appears in that standard work. Great credit is due Colonel Waddell for espousing the cause of the Cape Fear section, a section as historic as any in America, not only famous for its resistance to unjust oppression, but for the first victory of the American Revolution, won at Moore's Creek Bridge on February 27th, 1776, which has been most ably written up by Prof. M. C. S. Noble of the University of North Carolina, in March number of BOOKLET, 1904.

The chief historical work written by Colonel Waddell is a volume entitled "A Colonial Officer and His Times"—this being a biography of his ancestor, General Hugh Waddell, who figured so conspicuously in the period just preceding the Revolution.

Col. Waddell comes of distinguished ancestry. His great grandfathers were Gen. Francis Nash (for whom Nash County and Nashville, N. C., and Nashville, Tenn., were named), mortally wounded at Germantown, Pa., October 4th, 1777; General Waddell (colonial); Col. J. Pugh Williams (revolutionary), and Alfred Moore, Justice of the United States Supreme Court (1799-1805), for whom he was named. His father's mother was the only child of General Nash.

Colonel Waddell was married first to Miss Savage, of Wilmington, and second to Miss Gabrielle de Rosset, of the same city. This genial and gifted gentleman at this writing resides in Wilmington and is engaged in the practice of law.

MR. JUNIUS DAVIS

Mr. Junius Davis, the author of the article in this number of THE BOOKLET, entitled "Locke's Fundamental Constitutions," is a prominent lawyer of the Cape Fear section of North Carolina, and was born on the 17th of June, 1845. He was the son of Hon. Geo. Davis, at one time Attorney-General of the Confederate States, who at the time of his death, in February, 1896, was called the first citizen of Wilmington; a man of unsullied character and eminent for his ability, culture and public service. The mother of Junius Davis, the first wife of his father, was Miss Mary Adelaide Polk, daughter of General Thomas G. Polk, of Mecklenburg County, and a granddaughter of Colonel William Polk, of the Revolution.

The subject of this sketch began his education in the primary schools of Wilmington, and on reaching his twelfth year he became a pupil of the celebrated Bingham School. In 1861, after the war began, the family having removed to Charlotte, he there studied for a few months, but on reaching the age of seventeen he enlisted as a private in Moore's Battery, which was Company E of the Tenth North Carolina Regiment. He passed through the dangers and perils of war, serving faithfully as private and corporal; was in the engagements at Plymouth, New Bern, Drury's Bluff, Bermuda Hundreds, battles around Richmond, in the trenches at Petersburg, Battle of the Crater, the assault on Fort Harrison, and continued to endure the hard experience which fell to the lot of Lee's veterans, and had the good fortune of escaping without any serious wound. It was with a sad heart, after hearing of the surrender of General Lee, that he with some companions pursued their way towards Bedford City, Va., with the purpose of joining Johnston's army; when they reached the vicinity of Greensboro they heard of Johnston's surrender, and that the last Confederate army had disappeared. Corporal Davis came to Greensboro and surrendered himself to the Federal provost-marshal at that point and was paroled. He then returned to his home in Charlotte, obtained employment for a time, returning to Wilmington in the fall of 1865 at the age of twenty years. In the absence of any other opening he engaged himself as a clerk in a dry-goods store. Indeed, at that time nearly every one was in a similar condition; young men all over the South were ready and willing to do any honorable service to earn a livelihood. As a clerk Mr. Davis was faithful, rendering efficient service to his employers, and passed through that period after the war that tried men's souls, with that resolution which insures success.

In the year 1867 Junius Davis began the study of law in his father's office, and obtained his license to practice in the County Courts; was associated as a partner with his father until the death of that gentleman in 1896.

Inheriting much of the talent of his father and trained by him in the details of professional work, Junius Davis fell into the same careful habits of precision and thoroughness that were the distinguishing traits of that honored lawyer and public-spirited citizen.

Mr. Davis has attained an honorable position in his profession, and his opinions are held in as high esteem as that of any other lawyer in the State of North Carolina. He is an honorary member of the North Carolina Society of the Cincinnati and a member of the North Carolina Sons of the Revolution, and a member by baptism of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

On January 19th, 1874, Mr. Davis was married first to Miss Mary Orme Walker, daughter of Thomas D. and Mary Vance Walker. Mrs. Davis having died, some years later he married Miss Mary Walker Cowan, daughter of Colonel Robert H. Cowan, of Wilmington. He has had eleven children, of whom nine survive.

Mr. Davis is of distinguished lineage. Among his ancestors were Roger Moore, Sir John Yeamans, John Baptista Ashe, Major Alexander Lillington, Col. Sam Swan, as well as from other equally worthy lines of Colonial ancestors, whose axes had first rung in the forests of the Cape Fear. With such blood in his veins he is a worthy scion of illustrious stock.

Mr. Davis partakes of his father's literary and historical turn of mind, is interested in the local history of the Cape Fear, his public addresses though but few, on account of his arduous professional labors, have a genuine literary flavor, and his style is strong and forcible. His historical addresses show research and familiarity with the history of the State, and can be relied upon as thoroughly accurate.

(The above facts, chiefly condensed from a sketch of Mr. Davis in Biographical History of North Carolina by Capt. S. A. Ashe.)

MR. THOMAS M. PITTMAN.

Mr. Thos. M. Pittman, the author of the article in this issue entitled "Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina," is a practicing lawyer in the town of Henderson, North Carolina, where he devotes his time to his profession. He was born in Franklin County, North Carolina, November 24th, 1857. He was the son of Alfred H. Pittman and Elizabeth (Neathery) Pittman. His parents died when he was about fourteen years of age, but up to this period they had given him the best educational advantages that were attainable in the town where they lived. At the age of fourteen he began work at the Mecklenburg Iron Works and settled at Charlotte, N. C., where for four years he was diligent as a clerk, and won the esteem and confidence of his employers. At the age of eighteen he began the study of law, and at the age of twenty years received his license; was admitted to practice in the District and Circuit Court of the United States in 1878. In the fall of the same year, without waiting the usual three years, he was almost immediately appointed Examiner in Equity in the Circuit Court. Mr. Pittman, with these exceptional advantages, besides being an almost omniverous reader, has risen to the topmost round of his profession and has won the esteem and kindly consideration of his professional brethren, and of his countrymen. He has devoted much of his leisure time in gathering materials and making studies of North Carolina History, and has a notable collection of historical material hardly to be equalled in the State.

Mr. Pittman is a writer of ability and has delivered and written many addresses on different epochs in our State's history. Among the most important—

"The Great Sanhedrin of the Jews and its Criminal Procedure."

Address on "English Words."

The Race Question and Socialism.

The Preparation for Baptist Work in North Carolina.

The Revolutionary Congress of North Carolina, and the Monograph on John Penn, "the signer," written for the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, Vol. IV, September, 1904.

Address on Nathaniel Macon.

Address before the Baptist State Convention at Greenville, N. C.

Address at Guilford Battle Ground, July 4, 1902.

J. S. Carr Prize Essay.

Lemuel Brickett, A Sketch.

John Porter and the Cary Rebellion.

Address to Summer School at A. & M. College, 1903.

He has written several sketches for the Biographical History of North Carolina, 1906-7.

Mr. Pittman is a prominent member of the Baptist Church, and has filled the offices of Deacon, Clerk, Sunday School Superintendent, Teacher, Vice-President of the Baptist State Convention, and of the American Baptist Historical Society, and many other offices that are recorded in the annals of this progressive denomination.

Mr. Pittman married Mrs. Harriet Lassiter, formerly Thrower, in June, 1884, and they have two children, Elizabeth, a graduate of the Boston Conservatory of Music, and Thomas M., Jr., a civil engineer on the Illinois Central Railroad.

GENEALOGY.

The Pittmans are of German extraction, and were settled on the Rhine at an early period. They were in England prior to the settlement of Virginia. The first of the family in this country died at Jamestown within the first ten years of that settlement. Later two branches of the family settled in America, one in Rhode Island, the other in Virginia. His grandfather, Merritt Pittman, came to Halifax County, in this State, from Isle of Wight County, Virginia; his father was James Pittman, who was settled on the James River.

Thomas M. Pittman's maternal ancestor was Richard Bennett, who came to North Carolina from Maryland about 1750 and settled in Halifax, N. C. He was one of three brothers. One settled in Marlborough County, S. C., and gave the name of Bennettsville to the county town; the other settled in Anson and was ancestor to Judge R. T. Bennett and others of consideration in that county. He numbers among his ancestors the Neatherys and Lancasters of Revolutionary fame.

With Mr. Pittman's determined will, noble ambition and character, together with a superior intellect, he will continue on the road to success, ranking with the best in all his undertakings.

COMPILED BY MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

HON. JAMES ALSTON CABELL.

The Honorable James Alston Cabell, lawyer, legislator, writer, was born in Richmond, Virginia. He belongs to an English family of undoubted antiquity, which was seated in the counties of Devon, Wilts and Somerset. His ancestor came to Virginia at a very early period. During the Colonial and Revolutionary epochs of our history, the members of his family bore a conspicuous part in all public affairs, and rendered their country useful and distinguished services in war as well as in peace, serving in the Colonial wars, the House of Burgesses, the Committees of Safety, the Conventions and the Army of the Revolution. His father, the late Col. Henry Coalter Cabell, was a prominent lawyer, and in the Civil War was Chief of the Artillery of the Army of the Peninsular, and Chief of Artillery of McLaw's Division of the Army of Northern Virginia. The mother of the subject of this sketch was Jane Alston, daughter of Major James and Catherine (Hamilton) Alston, of Abbeville, South Carolina.

Mr. Cabell is a graduate of Richmond College, and also of the University of Virginia, having had three degrees conferred upon him by the latter institution. While at the University he was prominent in athletics as well as in his studies; was editor of The Virginia University Magazine, which he conducted with marked ability, and won the scholarship in the Scientific Department and a thousand dollar prize. He was called to a professorship in the Central University of Kentucky, which he filled for two years. This position he resigned in 1880, and joined his father in the practice of law at Richmond. In 1884 he was elected a member of the City Council. In 1893 he was elected a member of the General Assembly of Virginia. He was re-elected and served until 1897, when he declined re-election. In 1896 his constituents desired him to become a candidate for Congress, but he had determined at the close of his legislative duties to devote himself to his profession and literary labors. He has recently been conspicuously mentioned as a candidate for Governor of Virginia. He married June 12, 1895, Miss Ethel Hoyt Scott, of New York City. He served for nine years as Chairman of the Virginia Commission on the Uniformity of Legislation in the United States.

Mr. Cabell is a member of the State Bar Association and the American Bar Association; a life member of the American Historical Association, the Southern Historical Association, and the Virginia Historical Society. He has been a member of the Advisory Board of the Association for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities since its organization. He re-organized the Virginia Society of the Cincinnati, and was elected President of Temporary Organization of the Virginia Society in 1890. He is also an hereditary member of the North Carolina Society of the Cincinnati. He was elected President of the Sons of the Revolution in Virginia in 1895; President of the Alumni Association of Richmond College in 1896, and Commander of the Virginia Commandery of the Military Order of Foreign Wars in 1899. He is a graceful speaker.

Mr. Cabell is an active, honorary, or corresponding member of a number of literary historical and scientific societies in this country and abroad; is editor of the Virginia Masonic Journal, and is the author of a number of scientific historical and biographical treatises and papers.

This excellent address, delivered by this popular and talented Virginian, at a banquet given by the Newport News Chamber of Commerce last autumn before the launching of the U. S. Cruiser North Carolina, has been republished in THE BOOKLET at the suggestion of a prominent North Carolina lawyer.

ABSTRACTS OF WILLS

From the Office of Clerk of Superior Court of Chowan County, Edenton, N. C.

Will of Stephen Cabarrus, of Pembroke, Chowan County, October 20th, 1807. Sisters Marianna, Cadette and Julia Cabarrus, now living at or near Bayonne, $3,000. Brother Augustus, now living with me, nephews Thomas and Augustus Cabarrus, nowing living with me; sister-in-law Clarence, wife of my brother Bartholemy Cabarrus, now living at Paris, France; my large diamond ring and gold snuff box, formerly belonging to my beloved deaceased wife, Mrs. J. Charrier, sister of my beloved wife and wife of Mr. Jean Charrier fils, living at Bordeaux, France, all her sister's clothes, her diamond earrings, diamond Aigrette, our double gold wedding ring and a garnate necklace; my friend. General William Richardson Davie, living in S. C., my friend Judge John Louis Taylor; Sophia Niel, her sister Polly Niel, children of Julia Beaulieu Charrier, wife of Jean Charrier fils. Samuel Tredwell, Judge John Louis Taylor, John Roulhac and brother Auguste, Exrs. My servants, Louis, Sylvia, Lorient and John I desire emancipated and to each $100.00. Test. John Otis Freeman, Nat. Bond. From the office of C. S. C. Chowan Co., Edenton, N. C. Abstract of Will of Stephen Cabarrus.

Abstract of Wills taken from Secretary of State's Office.

Will of Elizabeth Anderson, Nov. 1732; prob. Dec. 1733. Son James, son Carolus, daughter Elizabeth Pitman, daughter Elizabeth Anderson, Eliz. Pitman's son, Wm. Anderson, daughter Sarah Anderson, granddaughter Elizabeth Anderson, granddaughter Sarah Anderson.

Will of Henry Bonner, Chowan. Son Henry, son Thomas, grandson Richard Lewis, daughter Elizabeth Lewis, daughter

Deborah, daughter Mary, granddaughter Sarah Lewis, granddaughter Deborah Lewis: Sept. 1, 1738.

Will of James Ansell, Sept. 12—1738; prob. Apr. 1—1740. John Ansell, daughter Sarah Roberts, grandson James Roberts.

Will of William Badham, Chowan. Oct. 28—1736; Ellen, daughter of Martha Dunston, relict of John Dunston, born at Edenton, Aug. 1st—1733, land I Bought of William Willson; 250 acres adjoining Orlando Champion to her sister Mary, born June 6th—, 1735.

Wife Martha, Barnaby Stetz Dunston, Richard William Dunston, Arthur Laport, son of Jonho Laport.

HELEN DEB. WILLS.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Sixth Volume began in July, 1906.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second-class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern," Sarah Beaument Kennedy.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury."
"Historic Homes—Bath. Buncomb Hall, Hays." Rodman, Blount Dillard.
"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow." Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash
"Life in Colonial North Carolina." Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania." Judge Walter Clark.
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina" Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S. Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780." Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C. Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor.
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes." by T. M. Pittman, and E. Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

"Highland Scotch Settlement in N. C.," Judge James C. McRae.

"The Scotch-Irish Settlement," Rev. A. J. McKelway.

"Battle of Guilford Court-House and German Palatines in North Caroliua," Major J. M. Morehead, Judge O. H. Allen.

Vol. V.—(Quarterly).

No. 1.

"Genesis of Wake County," Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.

"St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C., and its Associations," Richard Dillard, M. D.

"N. C. Signers of the National Declaration of Independence, Part II, William Hooper," Mrs. Spier Whitaker.

No. 2.

"History of the Capitol," Colonel Charles Earl Johnson.

"Some Notes on Colonial North Carolina, 1700–1750," Colonel J. Bryan Grimes.

"North Carolina's Poets." Rev. Hight C. Moore.

No. 3.

"Cornelius Harnett." Mr. R. D. W. Connor, "Edward Moseley," Prof. D. H. Hill.

"Celebration of the Anniversary of May 20, 1775," Major W. A. Graham.

"Edward Moseley." by Prof. D. H. Hill.

No. 4.

"Governor Thomas Pollok." Mrs. John W. Hinsdale.

"Battle of Cowan's Ford," Major W. A. Graham.

"First Settlers in North Carolina not Religious Refugees," Rt. Rev Joseph Blount Cheshire, D. D.

Vol. VI—(Quarterly.)

"The Indian Tribes of Eastern North Carolina," Richard Dillard, M.D.

"History Involved in the Names of Counties and Towns in North Carolina," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.

"A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear" (Admiral Sir Thomas Frankland), Hon. James Sprunt.

October, No. 2.

"The Borough Towns of North Carolina," Francis Nash.

"Governor Thomas Burke," J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton, Ph.D.

"Colonial and Revolutionary Relics in the Hall of History," Col. Fred A. Olds.

"The North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution and its Objects."

"Biographical Sketches of Dr. Richard Dillard, Francis Nash, J. G. de R. Hamilton and Col. Fred. A. Olds," Mrs. E. E Moffitt.

January, No. 3.

"State Library Building and Department of Archives and Records," R. D. W. Connor.

"The Battle of Rockfish Creek, 1781," James Owen Carr.

"Governor Jesse Franklin," J. T. Alderman.

"North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown," Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton.

"Biographical Sketches of Mrs. S. B. Kenneday, R. D. W. Connor, James Owen Carr, and Prof. J. T. Alderman," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

April, No. 4.

"Lock's Fundamental Constitution," Junius Davis.

"The White Pictures," W. J. Peele.

"North Carolina's Attitude towards the Revolution," Robert Strong.

"Biographical Sketches," Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

"Genealogical Sketches," Mrs. Helen de B. Wells.

Index to Vol. VI will be mailed with No. 1 of Vol. VII.

Vols. I, II, III, IV, 25 Cents Each. Vols. V and VI, 35 Cents Each.

NOW IS THE TIME TO
SUBSCRIBE TO THE

NORTH CAROLINA JOURNAL OF EDUCATION

Published twice each month at Durham, North Carolina, under the editorial supervision of Mr. E. C. Brooks, assisted by associate editors and numerous contributors.

SUBSCRIPTION, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR

Address all communications and make all remittances to H. E. SEEMAN, Publisher, Durham, N. C.

Vol. VII. OCTOBER, 1907 No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLINA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

	Page
Ode to North Carolina By Pattie Williams Gee	79
The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists By Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.	86
Joseph Gales, Editor of Raleigh's First Newspaper By Willis G. Briggs	105
Our First Constitution, 1776 By E. W. Sikes	131
North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition By Mary Hilliard Hinton	138
Biographical Sketches By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	146

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1907. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME VII.

1. North Carolina in the French and Indian War, Colonel Alfred Moore Waddell
2. Colonial Newspapers, ... Dr. Charles Lee Smith
3. Finances of the North Carolina Colonists, Dr. Charles Lee Raper
4. Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry, Judge James C. MacRae
5. Schools and Education in Colonial Times, . Mr. Charles L. Coon
6. Joseph Gales, ... Mr. Willis G. Briggs
7. General Robert Howe, ... Hon. John D. Bellamy
8. The Resolution of April 12, 1776, . Prof. R. D. W. Connor
9. Our First State Constitution . . . . Dr. E. W. Sikes
10. Permanent Settlement of the Lower Cape Fear, (1725–1735) Mr. W. B. McKoy
11. Colonial Edenton, . . Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D.
12. The Quakers of Perquimans, . . Miss Rebecca Albertson

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VII, are requested to give notice at once.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,

"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"

Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VII. OCTOBER, 1907. No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

North Carolina State Library

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MISS LOUISE PITTINGER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VII OCTOBER, 1907 No. 2

ODE TO NORTH CAROLINA.

BY PATTIE WILLIAMS GEE.

I.

By Honor called
To stay the rocks from heralding the shame
Long gathering of oblivion to blame;
Of silent tongue
While one beloved is still untrumpeted, unsung;
A daughter of the pines would climb Old Bald,
And from his heaven-ascending brim,
Down the long slopes which greet the sea's low rim,
Would gonfalons of song unfold
(As when Vulcanus rolled
His rugged gold;
Demeter swung her surging plumes,
All her arms held of primal blooms,
Of subtle beauty and of wild perfumes)
Far o'er the fruited, fern-robed Wold,
(A bride the burning Sun
Doth feast his amorous lips upon);
And over orioled mountain peaks
Whose sweeping eagles' piercing shrieks
Die in blue beds of cloud-blown deeps;
Till e'en the bitterest wrong
Which through the sad years yearns and weeps
Shall from its stream of tears up-leap to strife-dissolving song!

II.

O, Carolinians, lift your eyes!
(God-gladdened eyes!)
And know this well:—
That 'tis your happy lot to dwell
Where Nature walks
In affluence.
Beneath a low-hung sky forever slipping
Warm kisses on her lips and dewy nectar dripping
Upon her flowered petticoat
Oft caught by wandering mists afloat;
Whose tunic, jewel-broidered, gleams;
Whose train is sun-lit, shimmering streams,
And talks
With him who owns her influence!

III.

Yours the consecrated sod
Which first the Anglo-Saxon trod
Of all our hard-won soil!
And sanctifying home and toil,
Yours the Mother on whose breast,
Smiling in confiding rest,
Lay the first American!
O, Carolinians, know this well,
And to your children's children tell
That here our civil rights began!
That here a woman stricken sore
Scorned to spare the sons she bore!
That here our proto-martyrs bled!
Say no stately rites were said
O'er these first for freedom dead,—
These first red drops for freedom shed,
But tell them, Carolinians, how
From wounds and bruise of sword and lance,

From purple pools of Alamance,
There sprang the flower of Mecklenburg,
The laurel flower sprang, and how
Its spreading leaves of liberty
Wreathed first their Mother's brow!

IV.

O, blood-blown Leaves of Liberty,
So doubly dear, so fair,
O, blood-blown Leaves of Liberty
Which stained her glorious hair
When foes unnumbered sacked her shores
And left a leprous reptile at her doors,
A leprous reptile that a woman may not name,—
O, blood-blown Leaves of Liberty, men blush at your great name!
Since Nero burned imperial Rome,
His torches flashed beneath her dome,
Was never scourge like this,—
This crucifix which weak lips needs must kiss!

V.

But who could bear to stir a woman's pain
When guns, corosive, cold,
Lie dumb and still?
When o'er a wind-swept hill
Where sleep her valiant slain
A flawless moon unfolds in sympathy to rise in glory and in glory wane?
When o'er a silvered plain
The stars flood melody to light the reign
Of Love wherein young Hope was born?—
Born of the Awakening of unused resources
Wedded to Vigor of swift water courses

From towering summits scurrying cold
Through miles of cotton blossoms, miles of corn,
A Naiad robed in gold?—

VI.

Oh that a living lyre might tell
This patient Mother's virtues! Dwell
Upon each deed chivalric of her sons!
Oh that an Orpheus might sing
Of that chill morn whereon there fell
Such courage courting death
As merged Purpose into Promise; flowered incipient life to breath
When Victory's voice o'er Moore's lonely dell
Shook the gray boughs; forced every woodland bell![1]
Oh that resounding hymns might ring
Of Ramseur's Mill and the four hundred under Locke
Who stilled the booming of a thousand guns!
Of Joseph Graham whose twenty score
Repulsed the madness of four thousand more Flung powerless upon a human rock!
Of that immortal field in Memory's raptured fabric woven[2]
Whereon no foe was lost, no foe uncaptured or uncloven!
Of her who won a warrior's crest
And blazoned Charlotte with The Hornet's Nest—
The proud escutcheon of the Hornet's Nest!
And of Penelope of old,
Leading (as chronicles relate)
The women of quaint Edenton to hold
High council and protest
Against coercion by an alien state
In mad exaction of an alien tax!
Of New Bern, Hillsboro, and of Halifax!

[1]The Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, February 27, 1776.
[2]The Battle of King's Mountain.

VII.

Oh that a living lyre might tell
Her virtues! Dwell
Upon each deed chivalric of her sons,
Till from a million throats
Upon the rushing currents of the years,
(In tiger-breeding wars through tears)
There floats
This shibboleth—The spirit of the Spartan breathes and burns!
Ah yes, what though her iron days are past
And though the adamant wherein her fate was cast
No longer binds,—
The spirit of the Spartan breathes and burns
And on the shifting winds
Of Duty seaward turns,—

VIII.

Seaward where torn flags are trailing over crushed and crumbled walls,
Men are sighing, struggling, dying, to be freed from ancient thralls,
And again a righteous Mother,
Instant to relieve another,
Instant at her country's call,
Sends one with this spirit in him
"To return with Valour's guerdon"—
(List the Spartan Mother's burden!)
"Or beneath a soldier's pall!"
(Oh the pity and the heartache
And the anguish of it all!)
For Alamance and Bethel's story
Rings again amid the glory,
Rings again when at the daybreak,

With the Southern fire within him,
With his father's sword without him,
With the old flag wrapped about him,
(Oh the triumph and the glory,
And the rapture of it all!)
For his country's vindication,
For a friend's amelioration,
For the healing of his nation
Gallant Bagley bleeds and falls!

IX.

Yes, Alamance and Bethel's story
Heard again amid the glory
Challenges a nation's praise,
Challenges the world's amaze!

X.

Oh, with this spirit, Carolinians,
Onward to those pure dominions
Overspread by angels' pinions,
By the strong Thought angels' pinions!
Through all dreaming with its leaning toward the infinite,
Through all seeming to God's meaning clear and definite,
Onward to those pure dominions
Overspread by angels' pinions,
Where divine, effulgent light is!
Turn not backward where the night is,
For the broad-orbed sun is risen;
Holy Progress calls you: Listen.

XI.

Onward, patriot souls, unfettered,
Lifting standards, golden-lettered,
"Esse Quam Viderie" graven,
Words no coward hands nor craven

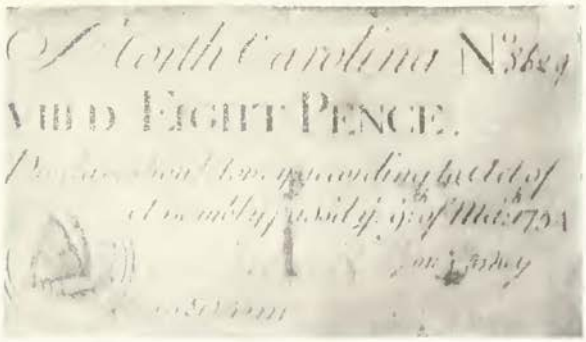
Dare upraise! The Future calls you;
All her luminous doors uncloses,
Pelts you with her dew-drenched roses;
Subtle Art and Music greet you;
Clear-voiced Learning low entreats you;
All the intellects and sages
Of the lost and buried ages
Echoing their sublime acclaim:
Brothers, she who bore you, calls you;
Answer her with deathless fame.

THE FINANCES OF THE NORTH CAROLINA COLONISTS.

BY CHARLES LEE RAPER, PH.D.,
PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA.

At the mere mention of finance, unless it be in a suggestion of a gift to us in the shape of money, most of us at once declare our lack of interest, if not indeed our complete indifference. We have become so accustomed to the idea that the monetary phase of life is so dry and uninteresting, that the consideration of this phase of our life belongs exclusively to the economist, the expert historian, or the statesman, that most of us, if not indeed all of us, are ignorant of some of the most vital and fundamental aspects and problems of our common everyday life.

But, notwithstanding this apparent popular indifference, the monetary phase of our common life is really vital to all of us—to every man, woman and child among us. We can never, even for a single moment, escape the question of finance, however much we would like to do so. The sentimentalist, who according to his own conceited belief lives solely in the realm of the beautiful and the true,—even he is most fundamentally dependent upon its forces. Finance is not, as many of us have so oftentimes fancied, a subject foreign to our real everyday selves. It is indeed a most vital and universal phase of our normal life, of our life as individuals and as collective bodies of individuals. It is ever present and vital in our consumption of wealth, and in our production and distribution of wealth. It is ever a problem, and a most serious one, for the state, which of necessity must consume wealth for the satiation of all its myriad wants and for the performance of all its protective and developmental functions. The state must not only satiate all its manifold



South Carolina
VIII EIGHT PENCE.

No.
ONE SIXTH
DOLLAR.
ONE SIXTH.

No. 2844
Thirty Dollars.
THIRTY Spanish
milled DOLLARS

wants, but also perform its part in the production of wealth or the conditions of wealth production. It must do its part in creating and maintaining efficient and equitable conditions, in which the individual citizen may produce the maximum of wealth and the maximum of enjoyment from its production or consumption.

Indeed, the individual must needs have money as a standard of his values and a medium of their exchange before it is at all possible for him to play an important role in life. In fact, money, an efficient and just system, is one of the really great achievements of civilized man. For all men who live in a stage above that of the most primitive type, who are above the exceedingly crude phase of the savage hunter, fisherman, and root-grubber, money is both a necessity and an efficient instrument of individual and social weath and welfare. Whenever man has products which he desires to exchange with another man, wherever he may be, and the higher his civilization and culture the greater number of such products does he possess, then must he have money; then must he possess a standard of the values of these products and a medium of their exchange.

And the state, as well as the individual, has vital need of money. It, like the individual, must needs have money as a standard of values and a medium of their exchange. So numerous and varied are the State's wants and functions that we can not here give them in detail. It must perform all the functions of living, all the functions of protecting itself and all its citizens, and all the functions of developing itself and the conditions of peace, order, prosperity, and welfare, for all its citizens.

In all these phases of life, whether of the individual or of the state, money plays the ever vital part of transmitting economic forces and values, just as the blood carries to all parts of the body the physical forces. It also plays the part of supplying a common expression of these forces and values, just as language gives to us a common medium of the expression of our thoughts and feelings.

With these convictions ever present in our minds, let us now trace and analyze the finances of our ancestors—the monetary system, and its forces and problems, of the North Carolina colonists. And we shall treat this vital phase of our colonial life under the following heads: Coin, Barter, and Paper.[1]

COIN.

The first colonists, in North Carolina as well as elsewhere in the American provinces, possessed little, if any, money in the shape of coin. They were for the most part poor, and the small amount of wealth which they possessed was in other forms than metallic money. Their wealth was in their weapons, tools, implements, seeds, cattle, and horses, and in this form it was only very slight. People of much wealth were now comparatively few anywhere in Europe, and life in a far-distant and savage land, where at best it was very severe, could offer little attraction to the wealthy and the contented. It was indeed the economic force, or prospect rather, that brought men and women from old and comparatively prosperous countries—it was the hope of economic betterment that brought our ancestors to this wild and unknown land. The provincial government, either in North Carolina or elsewhere, was forbidden to coin money in any form or denomination, and consequently the colonists could obtain only that coin which came to them as a result of their trade with Englishmen, in the motherland, or with foreigners. During the colonial days English coins occasionally came to our ancestors, and these were of the denominations of pound, shilling, and pence. And at times came Spanish silver coins, called Spanish dollars, and Brazilian gold coins. To the North Carolina colonists the Spanish coins came rarely. Our colonial ancestors for many years lived in almost complete isolation. They carried on little direct trade with the colonists of the Spanish islands; their exchanges with foreigners, even with their friends in England, were largely carried on through the New England traders. Ships from New England came to our shores, exchanged finished products for our surplus of raw materials and finished goods, and then transported them to the Spanish islands or Europe. The Carolina colonists sold for foreign or English consumption the surplus products of their streams, forests, and farms, but for the most part they received in exchange finished goods, not coin.

[1]Since every fact upon which this paper is based can be found in our great collection, The Colonial Records of North Carolina, and in the acts of the provincial assembly—in the first four Revisals of North Carolina Statutes or in manuscript now in the office of the Secretary of State—we do not deem it necessary to make detailed references to these collections. For full details we would, with the reader's permission, refer to our North Carolina Study in English Colonial Government (Macmillan's, N. Y.), pp. 125-147. And we shall, in referring to this work, use this abbreviated title: Raper's North Carolina.

BARTER.

The early colonists of North Carolina, coming into the possession of little coin by means of their commerce, and being forbidden by the government in England to mint such money, must needs resort to the use of barter or paper currency. And they used barter currency extensively, if not indeed exclusively, until 1712, when paper money came into existence; and the use of barter continued for many years after this time. This currency was, to be sure, no new creation by the Carolina colonists. Its use has been universal in certain stages of economic development. Whenever people have surplus products to exchange with each other and do not possess a common standard of the values of these products or common media of their exchange, they always resort to barter currency. They, by common consent or by legislative enactment, declare that a certain one of their products shall serve as a standard of all values, and that a number of their commodities shall serve as media of exchange; and to these commodities they assign certain legal tender values, in terms of which all their exchanges must take place. The Carolina colonists already possessed a standard of values—the English pound, sterling. In terms of this standard all their barter commodities were given a legal exchange value.

Exactly when the Carolina colonists resorted to the use of barter currency and gave it definite form we are unable to find out, though we have many reasons for thinking that it was early in their provincial life. In 1715-1716 the lords proprietors allowed, though unwillingly, an act of the assembly to go into operation, in which seventeen commodities were enumerated and assigned full legal tender values as barter currency; and this act was only a revisal of a former one. This act, changed a few years later so as to incorporate a few more commodities, was in operation until the middle of the eighteenth century, notwithstanding much opposition on the part of the lords proprietors or the crown officials (after 1731). The following is the table of commodities and their legal tender exchange ratios in terms of the standard, sterling, as declared by the act of 1715-1716:

	Pound.	Shilling.	Pence.
[1]Tobacco, per hundred		10
Indian corn, per bushel		1	8
Wheat, per bushel		3	6
Cheese, per pound			4
Row buck and doe skins, per pound			9
Dressed buck and doe skins, per pound		2	6
Tallow, per pound			5
Leather, per pound			8
Beaver and otter skins, per pound		2	6
Wildcat skins, per piece		1
Butter, per pound			6
Feathers, per pound		1	4
Tar, per barrel		10
Pitch, per barrel	1
Whale oil, per barrel	1	10
Beef, per barrel	1	10
Pork, per barrel	2	5

This act was changed in 1723. Indian corn was now given the legal tender ratio of 2 shillings per bushel, in the place of 1 shilling and 8 pence, as by the act of 1715-1716, and wheat was given the value of 4 shillings, in the place of 3 shillings and 6 pence. Hemp, at 8 pence per pound, rice, at 1 pound and 5 shillings per hundred, and turpentine, at 1 pound and 5 shillings per barrel, were now added to the table of barter commodities.[1]

[1]Colonial Records, IV., pp. 291-92.

As was to be expected, these legal ratios of the barter commodities did not long remain the same as their market ratios. Each commodity became more abundant or less abundant as compared with the demand for it, and consequently its market price must needs vary. Its market price must be either higher than the legal price or lower than this price. For instance, the market price of deer skins was in 1731 practically the same as that fixed by the law of 1715-1716, while the prices of tar and pitch in 1731 were from one-third to one-fourth of their legal value as fixed in 1716. Since the assembly for the most part took the maximum market value of the barter commodities and declared this to be the legal tender value, not only for that time but also for many years afterward, it was most natural that in the case of many of the commodities their market value should be much lower than their legal value. Exactly what the exchange ratio of these barter commodities in terms of the standard, sterling, was for the whole period of their use we can not say. It is, however, a well established fact that barter was for practically the whole period of its existence a depreciated currency. We have specific evidence that the average market ratio of these barter commodities in terms of sterling was in 1709, 1731, and 1733, three to one. So great was the depreciation of this currency, so much was the market value of many of these commodities below that assigned to them by law, that the lords proprietors at times refused to receive this currency in payment of their quit-rents,[2] unless this money should be offered at a fair market rate.[3]

[1]Colonial Record, IV., pp. 292-93.

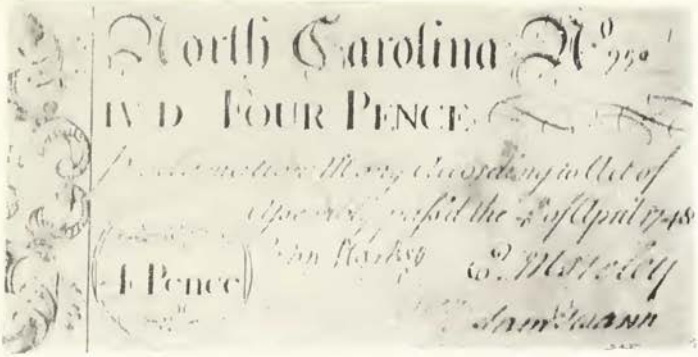
[2]Quit-rents were the land rents due from the colonists to the lords proprietors.

[3]Raper's North Carolina, pp. 129-30; Colonial Records, III., p. 185.

Such a currency, with its many fluctuations and its great depreciations, was, to say the least, very inadequate, if not indeed disadvantageous. It caused fluctuations in prices and wages. It was certainly a most inconvenient medium of exchange, both to the buyer and the seller, to the payer and the payee. It was also a dishonest form of the payment of fees to the provincial officers and of quit-rents to the proprietors, to say nothing of its great inconvenience. These fees and quit-rents were fixed in amount upon the basis of barter being equal to sterling, and were therefore only in part paid when barter money was actually worth from one-third to one-fourth sterling. Little wonder is it that we have so many and so frequent complaints of such a currency, on the part of the provincial officers, the lords proprietors, and the crown. And the defects of such a currency became more and more grievous as time went on and the economic life of the colonists became more extensive. There would be fluctuations and depreciations in this currency, even though the assembly at each session established new rates of the exchange of these commodities in terms of the standard, sterling; and this they most certainly did not do. Such a currency must be set aside entirely or the colonists must, at least, have some other form of money to supplement it. They could not, because of an order from England, mint coin money. They therefore resorted to the issue of paper currency, to supplement or take the place of barter. And the history of this paper money is full of disaster and broken faith, if not indeed of dishonor.

PAPER.

That a demand for this form of currency came early from the Carolina colonists, we are most certain. But the lords proprietors did not grant such a demand until 1712, and it was the pressing need of a financial emergency, that of war, which now caused them to yield. The provincial government was now burdened with a debt which the Tuscarora war had brought upon it. And, though this debt amounted to only



North Carolina
IVD FOUR PENCE
Penee

about 4,000 pounds, a really small sum, so inadequate was the province's machinery of taxation, and so great and fundamental was the colonists' opposition to paying a tax, that it was decided by the assembly to borrow this amount by forcing into circulation 4,000 pounds of bills of credit. These bills were given the same legal exchange ratio as barter currency; they were based upon the common standard of values, a pound sterling. They were also made full legal tender money—that is, they were forced into circulation by the provision that the refusal to accept them in payment of a debt caused the debt to become null. While theoretically they were to be redeemed, they were in actual fact irredeemable, at least for a time. To be sure, the legislature levied a tax for the purpose of their redemption, but this tax was only in slight part collected, and very slowly at that. But, notwithstanding its inconvertibility, this form of money passed for a time at its par value; its volume was small and the demand of the colonists for money was comparatively great.[1]

A new form of currency had now been issued by the provincial assembly, and its use had now been allowed, though very unwillingly, by the lords proprietors. When once the precedent of issuing irredeemable paper money was established, it was certainly a most difficult thing to resist the demand of the colonists for a further use of this kind of money. In 1713 this demand was again granted, and 8,000 pounds of bills of credit were emitted. To these bills, as to those of the issue of 1712, full legal tender powers were given, and they were forced into circulation among the colonists. They, like the bills of the first issue, were theoretically redeemable. For this purpose a tax upon land and polls was levied, but this tax, like the one levied in 1712, was only in slight part collected, and the bills were in actual fact not redeemed. They, as a matter of course, did not long pass on the market at their par value; there were now in circulation 12,000 pounds ($40,000) of practically irredeemable paper money, a supply very large for a population of not more than 10,000. Soon they had depreciated within the province to the extent of forty per cent of their legal value, and outside of North Carolina they were all the time practically worthless.[1]

[1]Raper's North Carolina, pp. 130-1.

As we have already said, these issues of irredeemable and depreciating currency were very unwillingly allowed by the lords proprietors. But their opposition came not because of their conviction that such a currency would bring disturbances to provincial prices, but because they were keenly aware that this money would be an unfair form of payment of fees to their officers in the province and of quit-rents due to themselves from their land. Their opposition to the issue of such a currency was, however, of no avail. The lords proprietors lived in England, then an exceedingly great distance—a many-days' journey—from North Carolina, and their control over the provincial government was at best only slight.

This kind of currency once being established, and the policy of practical independence on the part of the provincial assembly once being allowed by the lords proprietors, paper money continued to be the chief currency of our ancestors for many years, in fact until the English parliament in 1764 forbade the issue, by any of the provincial assemblies, of bills of credit, and in 1773 of treasury notes. In 1714-1715, though the Indian wars were over, and, as time has proved, forever, though there was no pressing need for public revenue to the provincial government, the assembly again ordered, in spite of the opposition of the lords proprietors, an emission of bills of credit—24,000 pounds. This issue was for the purpose of retiring the bills which had been emitted in 1712 and 1713, now much worn and defaced, and of paying the other debts of the provincial government. The taxes which had been levied for the redemption of the first two issues had either not been collected or the funds accruing from these taxes had been expended for other uses than their legal ones—in either case a most remarkable comment upon the province's fiscal fairness and honesty. And for the redemption of this issue, that of 1715, no limit of time was fixed, though theoretically a tax was levied for its redemption some time or other. These bills were given a legal exchange ratio equal to that of the barter currency, which was now 1.5 to 1 sterling. To prevent their depreciation, the assembly resorted to a most extraordinary and foolish plan. The assembly not only gave to these bills full legal tender powers, but also established a severe penalty for refusal to accept them in payment of debt. For refusing to accept them meant, so the law declared, the forfeiture of twice the amount of the bills offered. But, notwithstanding such a provision, this paper currency did not pass on the market at its legal ratio of exchange. Irredeemable paper money rarely, if ever, passes at par value; the conditions of its redemption are too uncertain and vague. The very fact that the assembly provided such a penalty for refusal to accept clearly enough indicates the weakness of such money. The public credit of the provincial government was too weak for these bills to pass on the market at their par value, regardless of such an extraordinary penalty. By 1721 they were passing at 2.5 to 1 sterling, though by the law of their issue they must be accepted at 1.5 to 1 sterling. And now even the lords proprietors refused to accept such depreciated currency in payment of lands or quit-rents, though they were at this time accepting in payment of such claims that inconvenient and depreciated currency known as barter.[1]

[1]Raper's North Carolina, p. 131.

So inefficiently was the tax which was levied upon land and polls for the redemption of these bills of credit of 1715, that one-half of the issue—12,000 pounds—was still outstanding in 1722, seven years after their emission. And, too, it was most evident that the colonists did not seriously intend to redeem them, for in 1720 the assembly enacted a provision which diminished the rate of the tax, and this in spite of a clause in the act of 1714-1715 to the effect that the rate should never be diminished as long as any of this paper money was in circulation. These bills which were in 1722 still unredeemed were worn and defaced, and during this year the assembly ordered that they be replaced by new bills. This act, together with the fact that one-half of the issue of 1715 had been redeemed, it was hoped, would bring greater value to the province's paper money. But such a desirable result did not come. Bills of credit for practically the whole of the next seven years, from 1722 to 1729, passed on the market at about 5 to 1 sterling, while by the act of their issue they were given a legal exchange ratio of 1.5 to 1 sterling. And little wonder is it that their depreciation was so great. The faith of the provincial government had too many times been broken, and during these seven years very little was done to bring back public credit to a condition of fairness and honesty.[1]

[1]Raper's North Carolina, pp. 128, 132-3.

And this was by no means the last of irredeemable and depreciating paper money. The colonists were for many years yet to be cursed by the excessive use of this kind of currency—a curse which came to them while they were expecting a blessing. In 1729, just before the crown assumed administrative control of the province, though after the transfer of ownership of the soil had been made from the lords proprietors to the English king, 40,000 pounds of this very kind of currency, bills of exchange, were by the provincial assembly ordered to be emitted. The lords proprietors had all the time opposed the issue of inflated and inadequate, unfair and dishonest money, and the English crown was soon to advise, specifically and in strong terms, against its continued use. But now in the interim, as it really was, in the period between the administration of the lords proprietors and that of the king, the colonists fairly satiated their inordinate desire for such inflated money. They increased the paper currency of the province to the extent of 30,000 pounds of bills of credit. They now, through an order from their assembly, issued 40,000 pounds of such paper money; 10,000 pounds of this to be used for sinking the old bills, which were now defaced and which had really come down from 1712 and 1713, and 30,000 pounds to be loaned. For the redemption of this total issue, 40,000 pounds, a provision was made for the loaning of 30,000 at six per cent. interest for a period of fifteen years; the interest accruing from this loan would, they thought, bring in sufficient funds with which to redeem the whole issue—40,000 pounds—and leave a balance to the credit of the provincial government of 5,000 pounds. But this plan, if it was not indeed foolish, came to a disastrous failure. The security upon which the loans were made was, at least in many cases, the most inadequate. To these new bills was given the legal exchange ratio of 5.17 to 1 sterling, which was approximately the market ratio of the old bills. But these bills, like all the others, did not long pass at their par value. The banking scheme of the assembly, by which these bills were to be redeemed, was so inefficiently executed, the securities upon which the 30,000 pounds were loaned were so unsound, so long had the faith of the provincial government been broken, that irredeemable paper money could not possibly pass at par. By 1731 the bills of 1729 were circulating at about 8 to 1 sterling, though by the act of their emission they were given full legal tender powers to pass on the market at 5.7 to 1 sterling.[1]

[1]Raper's North Carolina, pp. 133-4.

Such was the monetary condition when the English crown actually assumed control of the provincial government, such was the province's depreciated currency in 1731. And the first royal Governor, George Burrington, came with full and specific instructions from the officials in England not to accept such depreciated money in payment of fees and quit-rents. But such instructions could not possibly be carried out. Only in theory could Burrington and the other crown officials in the province refuse to accept such currency in payment of fees and quit-rents; the colonists refused to pay these obligations unless they were allowed to pay them in their own money. And the royal governor was also instructed not to allow any further emission of such depreciating and dishonest currency. But the conditions which prevailed throughout the province, the great powers which the provincial assembly had gradually acquired through all the years of the proprietary period, and the extreme weakness of the English control over the Colonists,—all these circumstances stood face to face with the royal instructions, and the instructions were ignored or set aside. By 1735 not one tenth of the money due from the loan of 1729 had been collected, and the small amount which had been collected had been used for other than the legal purpose of redeeming the bills of credit; the whole issue of 1729 was still in circulation. Quit-rents to the King and fees to the crown's officers in the province were greatly in arrears. All this created a most favorable atmosphere for the advocates of inflated currency, and they now demanded a further issue of irredeemable paper money. And Governor Johnston, notwithstanding his royal instructions to the contrary, saw fit to accept an act of the assembly by which 40,000 pounds of new bills of credit were emitted. These new bills were to sink the issue of 1729; and it was enacted that the loan of 1729 should be continued and that the funds which accrued from it should be reloaned until 1744. The colonists again, as in 1729, made a frank and open declaration in favor of a permanent use of irredeemable and fluctuating paper money. In all their early issues they made theoretical provision for their speedy redemption. But now, as in 1729, they provided for a large volume of paper money for a period of at least ten years. In the past, the use of paper money had been practically permanent, though in theory only temporary. Now it is made permanent both theoretically and practically.[1]

[1]Raper's North Carolina, pp. 134-5.

And this is not all of the monetary legislation of the year 1735. In order to pay certain claims against the provincial government, presumably salaries to the members of the legislature, the assembly made a grant to the crown of 14,150 pounds. In return for this grant of revenue to the crown, the assembly violated the royal instructions which forbade a further issue of bills of credit. They ordered to be issued 12,500 pounds of new bills, in addition to the 40,000 pounds already mentioned, and levied a tax upon polls and liquors for a period of five years.[2]

With 52,500 pounds of paper money in circulation for a population of only 35,000 whites, with very inefficient provisions for its redemption, and with a continuous record of broken public faith since 1712, it is not at all strange that the new bills of 1735 should depreciate. Soon they were passing at 10 to 1 sterling, while by the act of their issue they were given the full legal tender powers of 5.17 to 1 sterling—in reality the total volume of the province's actual media of exchange was only about 5,000 pounds sterling. All these bills should have been fully redeemed by 1745, but in actual fact none of them had been redeemed by this time. The loans of 1729 and 1735 had proved to be disastrous failures and the taxes levied in 1735 had either not been collected at all or had been illegally used for other purposes than that of redeeming a part of the issue of 1735.[3]

The monetary situation from 1745 to 1748, to say the

[1] Raper's N. C., pp. 135-6.
[2] Ibid., pp. 135-6.
[3] Ibid., pp. 136-38.

least, was very unsatisfactory. To relieve the depreciated currency and to pay fees, quit-rents, and legislators' salaries, many attempts were made to emit more bills of credit. In the minds of many of the colonists the one panacea for all financial ills was the issue by the assembly of bills of credit—to inflate and inflate a currency which was already absurdly swollen. These attempts were, however, unsuccessful until 1748, when Governor Johnston, in spite of his royal instructions to the contrary, yielded. The province must make defence against the French and the Spanish. The crown officials must have their salaries, which were now greatly in arrears. Under the pressure of such conditions, Governor Johnston accepted a bill which provided for the issue of 21,350 pounds of bills of credit, and the whole amount was voted to the crown. These new bills were given full legal tender powers at the exchange ratio of 4 to 3 sterling and 1 to 7.5 old bills. They were called "new proclamation" money, in distinction to the old bills and barter currency, which were called "old proclamation." For their redemption a poll tax was levied, to be collected until all of the bills should be redeemed—redemption at an indefinite time, perhaps never. These bills were to be used for the following purposes: 7,000 pounds to sink the whole outstanding paper currency, nominally 52,500 pounds, but in terms of sterling only 7,000 pounds; 6,000 pounds for coast defence, and the remainder for salaries. 21,350 pounds of paper money was not an excessively large amount of currency for a rapidly growing population and agricultural development; $71,093 should not have been an excessive amount of money for a population of about 85,000. But still these new bills, this "new proclamation" money, depreciated. Its redemption was too uncertain. It was based upon a tax which, according to the experiences of the past, would not be at all efficiently collected.[1]

[1]Raper's N. C., pp. 138-39.

For six years the demands for further inflation of the currency were resisted. The next issue was in 1754. The fourth intercolonial war, popularly known as the French and Indian war, was now fast coming on. The province must needs defend itself; it must have forts, soldiers, and provisions of war. Matthew Rowan, who as president of the council was now the crown's chief officer in the province, in the interim of Governor Johnston, now dead, and Governor Dobbs, who had not yet arrived, gave his assent to a bill of the assembly by which 40,000 pounds of bills of credit were emitted. These bills, like those of 1748, were "new proclamation" money and were given legal tender powers of exchange at the ratio of 4 to 3 sterling. Provision was, in theory at least, made for their redemption. A tax was levied upon polls and imported liquors for this purpose, but this, like former taxes, was very inefficiently collected, and the bills, like all former ones, depreciated.[1]

War continued and the province's burdens increased. Governor Dobbs, though desirous of complying with his royal instructions which forbade the issue of bills of credit, was really forced to assent to a further emission of paper money. He gave his assent to an issue, not of bills of credit, but of treasury notes; in 1756, 3,400 pounds, in 1757 and 1758, 25,806 pounds, in all 29,206 pounds of treasury notes. These notes were essentially different from the bills of credit which had so long and with such disastrous results been issued. Unlike these bills, the notes bore interest. They were also redeemable within a short time; a poll and liquor tax was levied for their redemption. The bills, as we have seen, had been practically irredeemable, though in theory some provision had always been made for their redemption. And in this instance, that of the treasury notes, the provincial officers largely kept the public faith. By 1764 they had paid, in interest and principal, 23,807 pounds on these notes—the first really faithful fiscal performance since 1712, when the colonists started upon their policy of unsound and wasteful paper money. Though these issues and their comparatively speedy redemption brought much relief to a bad monetary situation, still it was expecting too much to hope that they would bring in a sound condition of public credit. Public faith broken constantly for more than forty years—this was a great difficulty to overcome.[1]

[1]Raper's N. C., pp. 139-40.

While these treasury notes were redeemed, almost according to promise, the bills of credit issued in 1748 and 1754 were not redeemed, at least rapidly. They were, therefore, depreciating. By 1759 they were passing on the market at only 1.9 to 1 sterling, while by the act of their issue they had the legal tender ratio of 1.33 to 1 sterling. And this depreciation came in the face of a rapidly growing population and consequently an increasing demand for money.[2]

And still the province must provide the expenses of war. Governor Dobbs, in spite of royal instructions to the contrary, accepted in 1760 a bill of the assembly by which 12,000 pounds of bills of credit were ordered to be emitted; and again in 1761, 20,000 pounds. These bills, like those of former issues, were given full legal tender powers. They were also really irredeemable, though in theory at least a tax was levied for their redemption. The volume of this kind of currency had now become large. The acts of 1748, 1754, 1760, and 1761 had put into circulation 93,350 pounds of legal tender, non-interest bearing, paper money. By 1764 only 25,286 pounds of this currency had been redeemed. But this was really a remarkable showing, since during the first forty years of the issue of such bills practically none had been redeemed. There were, then, still in circulation 68,064 pounds of bills of credit and 6,769 pounds of treasury notes—a total of

[1]Raper's N. C., pp. 140-1.
[2]Ibid., p. 141.

74,833 pounds of paper money. This was an amount of currency not apparently excessive for a population of at least 200,000. But we must remember that barter was still, to an extent, used in the western portions of the province.[1]

We have now come to the end of the issue of bills of credit; the issue of 1761 was the last. The emission of this kind of currency had long been contrary to the king's instructions, but, as we have seen, these instructions were not infrequently set aside. Now, in 1764, the English parliament enacted a law which forbade its use, and from this time until the downfall of the royal government the demands of the colonists for this inflated currency were never granted. But still the bills which were outstanding, those of 1748, 1754, 1760, and 1761, did not pass on the market at their par value. In 1767 they were exchanging at the ratio of 1.82 to 1 sterling, and in 1771 at 1.60 to 1, though legally they were to pass at the ratio of 1.33 to 1 sterling.[2]

Why this continued depreciation? The population was rapidly increasing. Business was prosperous. And these bills were being redeemed. But now, in 1768, the assembly, perhaps for the specific purpose of putting an end to a decrease in the paper currency, ordered that the taxes which were levied in 1760 and 1761 for sinking the bills of these years, should no longer be collected. In the same year 20,000 pounds of debenture notes were issued. Bills of credit had been forbidden by parliament. Governor Tryon, who needed money to pay the expenses of his first campaign against the "regulators," and to finish his magnificent palace at Newbern, gave his assent to such an issue. Though these notes swelled the paper currency, they were not made legal tender —were not forced into circulation by law,—and provision was made for their speedy redemption. The issue of these notes did not, however, permanently improve the fiscal situation. By the close of 1771 the provincial government, mainly because of a second campaign against the "regulators," was under a floating debt of 60,000 pounds. There were also outstanding 42,800 pounds of bills of credit. To provide for the floating debt, the assembly passed a bill and Governor Martin gave his assent to it, whereby 60,000 pounds of new debenture notes were issued. This issue of debenture notes made the paper currency at about 100,000 pounds, a volume of money not too great for a population of about 250,000. But still these bills and notes did not circulate at their par value. They were given the legal ratio of 1.33 to 1 sterling, but were passing on the market at 1.6 to 1. Too long had the provincial government broken its promise.[1]

[1]Raper's N. C., pp. 141-2.
[2]Ibid., pp. 143, 145.

We come now to the end of the issue of paper money by the provincial government of North Carolina. The colonists still asked for more inflated paper currency, but from 1771 to the downfall of the royal government, in 1775, their demands were not granted.

And this is the record of the finances of the Carolina colonists, though presented in its barest outlines and told with all too little clearness and interest. Though a record of failure and even of unfairness, still many excuses should be offered for it. Lack of an understanding of the deep forces and problems of money, primitive conditions, and hard circumstances—these in part furnish an apology for such public conduct on the part of our colonial ancestors. And the monetary record of the other twelve American provinces is no less dark. They each have left a record of inefficiency and unfairness in their administration of that most difficult problem, money. And, too, the monetary record of the American people since they have become an independent and sovereign people is far from being all bright, honorable and glorious.

---

[1]Raper's N. C., pp. 144-5.

JOSEPH GALES, EDITOR OF RALEIGH'S FIRST NEWSPAPER.

BY WILLIS G. BRIGGS.

Joseph Gales, martyr to freedom of the press in England, editor of The Raleigh Register for thirty-four years, champion of popular education, advocate of every measure for moral and industrial development of the people; his political creed combined the liberty upheld by Jefferson with the progressive national policies sustained by Adams, Webster and Clay and placed him ever in advance of his time.

This brief statement of fact is enough to justify our interest in the career of one who left an indelible impress for good upon this community and State. Joseph Gales was born February 4, 1761, in the village of Eckington, Derbyshire, England. His great grandfather and his grandfather had successively taught the village school and were men of the model immortalized in Goldsmith's "Deserted Village." The father, Thomas Gales, who lived to an advanced age, was likewise described as "an Israelite in whom there was no guile."

Joseph Gales was the eldest son, an unenviable position in a crowded humble household. As a child he attended school and was proud to occupy a place at his father's side in the village choir. He never lost his fondness for music and in his latter years was wont to credit this early passion as one of the most salutary influences in his life. When a lad of thirteen he was bound to a man in Manchester for seven years to learn bookbinding and printing. This was a common practice even at a much later period until it was superseded by the apprentice system of today. The youth was grossly abused in the Manchester household and finally determined to make his escape. With only half a crown in his pocket he trudged fifty miles back to his native village. Many years later, touching upon this experience, Gales wrote "In a solitary spot on the mountain moors over which I wended my way, I bent my knees in prayer to my God, thanking Him for my release from a heavy bondage and praying for His future guidance and protection." Relatives then appealed successfully to the law in his behalf. Later he was apprenticed to an excellent man in Newark and shared the refinements of his home. The youth made the most of his opportunities and soon became a master printer and binder.

While employed at this trade, the young man won the favor of Winifred Marshall, youngest daughter of John Marshall, of Newark-upon-Trent. Now developing into a strong, courageous man, his habits frugal and his character irreproachable, his clear intellect and sympathetic heart fired with a passion for peace and justice, he added to these traits the inestimable blessing of centering his temporal affections in the heart of a worthy and excellent woman. Winifred Marshall was related to Lord Melbourne and came from a family of distinction but no longer wealthy. She was her father's pet and constant companion; together they studied Shakespeare, Milton, and the political essays of the day on the governmental side, for John Marshall was a staunch Tory. Her literary talent was recognized and several of her stories and verses published. "Lady Julia Seaton" was the title of a romance written when she was seventeen; thirty years later in America she had a granddaughter who bore this very name,—a strange coincidence indeed.

The marriage was solemnized May 4, 1784, in the Episcopal church at Newark by the bride's brother, a clergyman. After a visit to the Gales family in Eckington, the young couple went to Sheffield in Yorkshire, where the groom had recently established himself as a printer. The first work from his presses was a folio illustrated Bible with annotations by his gifted wife.

The Dissenters from the established church were numerous in Sheffield and they were practically all Liberals in politics. Gales' studious mind had led him to accept Unitarianism as his religious faith. In 1782, at the dawn of the political revolution eminent in England, he threw himself, then a youth of twenty, full hearted on the side of the great unenfranchised class. Reform became his passion but it never dimmed his sense of justice. His cultured wife, reared in far different surroundings, embraced with zeal the religious and political convictions of her husband. In 1787 Gales began the publication of The Sheffield Register, a weekly newspaper, and ardently championed reform. He warmly welcomed the French revolution. The English ministry, under leadership of Pitt, soon resorted to severe measures to repress the liberal wave, fearing that it would bring calamity to the monarchy.

The advocates of reform had formed various Constitutional Societies and Gales was secretary of the organization in his town. Some of these associations may have aimed to employ force in correcting existing injustice, but such was certainly not the purpose of the Sheffield society. The government was nevertheless alarmed. Holt, a printer in Gales' office, was senteneed to four years imprisonment for publishing a letter by the Duke of Richmond advocating reform. The flame was further fanned by the prosecution of Dr. Priestly, a Unitarian divine beloved by the Gales family, as the alleged author of a circular asking friends of liberty to celebrate the fall of the Bastile. Rumors of riots at Birmingham and other points increased the excitement at Sheffield.

The arrival of Tom Paine with his "Rights of Man" further frightened the English ministry. Booksellers were vigorously prosecuted for handling the book. In his shop Gales found a big demand for "The Rights of Man." While Gales was in London on a businss trip a timely warning given by Thomas Diggs, an American visiting in Sheffield, enabled Mrs. Gales to dispose of every copy just before the King's officers arrived and instituted a vain search for "those dangerous books," "those wicked, seditious works," which George III had condemned and forbidden to his subjects. From personal acquaintance Joseph Gales entertained regard for Paine, and Mrs. Gales paid him tribute in later years by writing of "the simplicity and sweetness of his nature and his sprightly wit that charmed the social circle." Paine's flight and the King's proclamation would have produced a riot at Sheffield had not Joseph Gales, "who led the poor man's cause, advocated equal representation and treated all men as brothers," persuaded the mob to go peaceably to their homes.

A study of the file of The Sheffield Register of 1794 reveals no policy which the enlightened twentieth century would not applaud. Joseph Gales' clear convictions gleam in his brief editorials. His sympathy was openly expressed for the two hundred wretched debtors confined in Lancaster Castle, with accommodation for only eighty persons, two sleeping in a bed. When a fifteen-year-old girl was hung for the murder of her grandfather the editor grieved because the child had been given no chance and was so ignorant and wretched as not to know right from wrong. Again he remonstrates on the severity of the law when a farmer in March, 1794, was sentenced to die for shooting a neighbor's foal. The Sheffield editor applauded "the glorious example" of the jury, which refused five times to obey the mandates of the court and persisted in a verdict of "not guilty" in the case of Robert Erpe, charged with speaking libel in that he criticised the Pitt ministry. "Twelve gold medals" ought to be presented to those jurors, declared Gales.

Twice at least was the Sheffield editor provoked to sarcasm. When Pitt entertained certain church dignitaries at a Sunday dinner Gales observed "The conversation of this pious company, we are informed, turned upon the profaneness of the French atheists and many holy toasts were given for success to throat cutting in defence of our religion." When a company for the "Conversion of the Negroes in the West Indies to Christianity" was incorporated, he wrote, "If we add to these advantages the practical comment we, as a Christian nation, are displaying in our continuance of a trade in which we annually murder or enslave fifty thousand wretched Africans, their brethren in the West Indies will no doubt most readily embrace the Christian religion." When a minister, a lawyer and three other advocates of reform in representation were tried at Edinburg and sentenced to fourteen years exile, Gales echoed the sentiment of Charles Fox who exclaimed, "God help the people who have such judges."

Monday, April 7, 1794, was a field day for the "friends of justice, of liberty and of humanity" in Sheffield. Henry Redhead Yorke, a young man of great promise, a graduate of Cambridge, a protege of Edmund Burke, had announced his allegiance to the Liberal cause after a visit to Paris, where he met leaders of the Jacobin clubs. He was hailed as an invaluable ally, and the Constitutional Society and the Society of the Friends of the People at Sheffield endorsed the young man for parliament. Twelve thousand reformers on this April day assembled on Castle Hill, listened to a stirring speech by Yorke and adopted an address. This address, briefly stated, asserted: (1) The people were the true source of government; (2) freedom of speech is a right which cannot be denied; (3) condemnation without trials is incompatible with free government; (4) where the people have no share in the government taxation is tyrrany; (5) a government is free in proportion as the people are equally represented. The address "demanded as a right," and no longer asked as a favor, "universal representation." It concluded with a lengthy petiton not only for "abolition of the slave trade" but for "emancipation of negro slaves" in the British West Indies. The mechanics of Sheffield were wrought to a pitch of highest enthusiasm. Horses were unhitched and the carriage, containing Yorke, the candidate, and Joseph Gales, secretary of the meeting and probably author of the address adopted, was drawn in triumph through the town by the multitude.

The principles which Gales enunciated on that occasion finally triumphed in England, but the triumph came many years later. The Duke of Wellington in 1828 wiped out the test oaths; William Cobbett in 1832 made uniform the system of representation; Wilberforce in 1833 at last saw the slaves emancipated; Disraeli and Arch in our own day expanded and equalized suffrage rights. When these reforms were accomplished then were vindicated the convictions for which Joseph Gales had bravely fought and suffered in the preceding century.

The Committee of Secrecy, appointed by parliament to investigate rumored conspiracies, made a report May 23, 1794, of such a character that the Pitt ministry immediately suspended the habeas corpus act, a course almost without precedent in time of peace. The committee found that there existed "The Society for Constitutional Information" and "The London Corresponding Society" and that these societies had by resolution "applauded the publication of a cheap edition of 'The Rights of Man,'" and voted addresses to the Jacobins at Paris and to the National Convention of France. Continuing the report said "The circumstance which first came under the observation of your committee containing a distinct trace of measures of this description, was a letter from a person at Sheffield, by profession a printer (who has since absconded), which was thus addressed 'Citizen Hardy, Secretary of the London Corresponding Society', which was found in the possession of Hardy on the twelfth of May, last, when he was taken into custody." The letter was dated from Sheffield April 20, 1794, on paper from "Gales' printing office" and the objectionable portion of the communication was as follows: "Fellow Citizens: The barefaced aristocracy of the present administration has made it necessary that we must be prepared to act on the defensive against any attack they may command their newly armed minions to make upon us. A plan has been hit upon, and, if encouraged sufficiently, will, no doubt, have the effect of furnishing a quantity of pikes to the Patriots, great enough to make them formidable." This was the only reference to resistance or force in the letter. With Hardy's paper was also found an account of a meeting at Sheffield where a full chorus sang a hymn written by James Montgomery.

When the news that the right of habeas corpus had been suspended reached Sheffield Gales exclaimed in his paper "every wretch who has either through malice or envy a dislike to his neighbor will have now an opportunity of gratifying his malicious intentions." Warrants were issued for Yorke, Gales and others, charged with treasonable and seditious practices, and the Sheffield editor knew that the time had come when he must either seek safety elsewhere or be delivered to his enemies.

The Sheffield Register of June 26, 1794, contains the editor's farewell. In this address he wrote: "The disagreeable predicament in which I stand, from the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, precludes me the Happiness of staying among you, My Friends, unless I would expose myself to the Malice, Enmity and Power of an unjust Aristocracy. It is in these persecuting days, a sufficient Crime to have printed a newspaper which has boldly dared to doubt the infallibility of ministers, and to investigate the justice and policy of their measures. Could my imprisonment, or even death, serve the cause which I have espoused—the cause of Peace, Liberty and Justice—it would be cowardice to fly from it; but, convinced that ruining my family and distressing my friends, by risking either, would only gratify the ignorant and the malignant, I shall seek that livelihood in another state which I can not peaceably attain in this." He reviews his course: "I was a member of the Constitutional Society," he admits, "and shall never, I am persuaded, whatever may be the final result, regret it, knowing that the real as well as ostensible object of this society, was a rational and peaceable reform in the representation of the people in parliament. * * * The Secret Committee has imputed to the Society intentions of which they had no conceptions and crimes which they abhor. * * * It has been insinuated, and, I believe, pretty generally believed, that I wrote the letter which is referred to by the Secret Committee, concerning the pikes. This charge, in the most unequivocal manner, I deny. I neither wrote, dictated or was privy to it. * * * It will always be my pride, that I have printed an impartial and truly independent newspaper, and that I have done my endeavors to rescue my countrymen from the darkness of Ignorance and to awaken them to a just sense of their privileges as human beings, and, as such, of their importance in the grand scale of creation."

Ten years later in America, when a rival accused Gales of having been indicted in England, he replied in his paper, "If it be deemed a crime to have opposed by means of a free press, governmental usurpation on the rights of the people, I plead guilty."

After he reached the continent the Sheffield Society adopted an address wishing "Health, peace and happiness" to "Our ever dear friend and brother," and added "Though we regret your sufferings, yet, viewed in connection with their cause, we behold you dignified with the unfading crown of a martyr in the illustrious cause of God and man."

The Sheffield Register and printing plant were left in charge of Joseph Gales' competent wife and his assistant editor James Montgomery, the poet, who had entered the employ of Gales when a lad. The political disturbances had given rise to frequent riots and the Gales' possessions were under constant guard. The mechanics of Sheffield marched in a body and volunteered their services to Mrs. Gales, but she begged them to go peaceably to their homes. The King's messengers came, made a vain search for the absent editor and left without molesting the family or injuring the property.

The Sheffield Register in 1794 had attained a circulation of 2,500 in the Yorkshire, Derbyshire and Nottingham districts and the ministry coveted a paper of such influence. Mrs. Gales, however, rejected with spirit a flattering offer made by an agent for the government and sold the property to their devoted friend James Montgomery. He changed the name to The Iris. A file of The Iris for several years is in our State library. Montgomery remained true to the liberal cause, was constantly persecuted and twice imprisoned. Although separated by the Atlantic, the brotherly affection between these two men was never severed. Thirty years later, when Montgomery retired from the editorship, a banquet was given in his honor and he embraced the occasion to pay glowing tribute to Joseph Gales, whom he denominated "the true friend of freedom and humanity" and characterized as "generous, upright, disinterested and noble minded."

In a letter instructing his wife to join him in Denmark, Gales wrote: "Bring nothing with you, my dear Winifred, but what the strictest justice warrants. Let us meet in peace, with a clear conscience, and my trust is in God, that He will help us. We are young, healthy, and able to struggle for a support for our dear children; and, leaving no one behind us who can with truth say that we have wronged him, fear not but that He Who feeds the young ravens will feed us."

Mrs. Gales crossed the channel with the two children,—Joseph, born April 10, 1786, and Sarah, born May 12, 1789,—and the family was soon reunited at Altona. In September, 1794, they set sail for America. However, the harbor was scarcely cleared before the vessel encountered a storm, the craft appeared far from sea-worthy, and the captain had no control over the crew. Gales forfeited his passage and returned with his family to shore on a passing pilot boat. The winter was then spent in Altona and proved most profitable for Raleigh's future editor. Several years before an itinerant short-hand teacher had visited Sheffield and implored Gales' aid. He had assisted the man in organizing a shorthand class and himself became one of the students. The months spent in Altona gave him an opportunity to perfect himself in this art, rare indeed in that day, and leisure to acquire French and Spanish in addition to his Latin. He and his family also formed intimate friendships with numerous influential French refugees then quartered in that city. During the winter a daughter was born and named Altona Holstein Gales, in honor of their city of refuge.

Not until August, 1795, did the Gales family land in Philadelphia after an eventful voyage. When the vessel was a few hundred miles from the American coast it was captured by the notorious privateers, Hutchins and Bethel. Incredible as the story appears, the pirates were overcome by the wit and charm of Mrs. Gales and relinquished their prize.

The English printer was introduced by a friend to Dunlop and Claypole, owners and editors of The American Daily Advertiser, and was given employment on that paper as a compositor. His worth was recognized and he was soon promoted to bookkeeper. Congress was in session in Philadelphia and The Advertiser's reporter gave dissatisfaction by his inaccurate reports of the debates. By mere accident the editor discovered that his bookkeeper knew the art of shorthand, so Gales was immediately transferred to the position of congressional reporter. The young Englishman was not a little embarrassed when the editor escorted him to the old court house, corner of Sixth and Chestnut streets, and introduced him to the Speaker of the House, who received him with great kindness and arranged a table for his convenience in reporting the proceedings for Philadelphia's daily newspaper. A few days later Thomas Pinckney arose and made a short but important speech on the then absorbing topic of our foreign affairs. Pinckney spoke without notes; it was not a set speech; hence Congressmen and the public were astounded next morning when they read in The Advertiser a verbatim report of his remarks. From that day the reputation of Joseph Gales as a reporter was made.

The uncertainty of our relations with France, the unpopularity of the Jay treaty with England, the wide difference of opinion in interpreting the Constitution of the United States, all served to draw a sharp distinction between the Federalists,—a school which embraced Washington, Hamilton, and Adams, and claimed the support of Hooper, Hawkins, Iredell, Johnston, Martin and Davie in North Carolina,—and the Republicans, led by Jefferson and championed in this State by Nathaniel Macon, leader of the congressional delegation, Jesse Franklin, Willie Jones, Bloodworth, Stokes and others. The sympathies of Joseph Gales were with France rather than with the Pitt ministry in England and his convictions were strongly Democratic. Aside from these motives, the passage of the Alien and Sedition laws under the Adams administration,—measures which savored strongly of the tyrrannical laws from which he had so recently escaped,—made Gales of necessity an ardent Republican. He had succeeded in business and was now owner and editor of The Independent Gazetteer, which he had purchased from the widow of the Revolutionary soldier, Col. John Oswold. He enjoyed the acquaintance of the public men of the day. Nathaniel Macon soon perceived the worth of this industrious, high minded man and made him his friend. Hence when Macon and his co-workers recognized the political expediency of a Jeffersonian-Republican newspaper, an organ if you choose, at the newly established capital of this State, Macon no doubt quickly decided that Gales was the man for this task.

This was in the summer of 1799 and Mrs. Gales was convalescing after an attack of yellow fever. The state of her health was a factor in the decision to leave Philadelphia. Otherwise life in that city had been pleasant for the English family. Here they had renewed acquaintance with Dr. Priestly, the persecuted Unitarian divine, and were among the thirteen persons who composed the Unitarian church organized in Philadelphia. Jospeh Gales was the first lay reader. Gales sold The Independent Gazetteer to Samuel Harrison Smith, who followed the national capital to Washington and changed the name of the paper to The National Intelligence.

The trip to Raleigh was broken by a sojourn at Halifax, where the Gales visited Willie Jones, a graduate of Oxford, father-in-law of John Eppes, an ardent disciple of Jefferson and leader in the Halifax convention of 1780 when the federal constitution was rejected. The stay at Halifax no doubt gave the prospective editor a clearer conception of the political situation in this State.

North Carolina, with her 344,807 free white persons, at the dawn of the nineteenth century ranked among the four most populous States in the Union. This State was then an important political factor and Thomas Jefferson proposed to leave no stone unturned to gain the support of this commonwealth. Nathaniel Macon, close ally of the aspiring Virginian, was determined to rout Federalism in North Carolina and perceived the need of the press in this work. The population was scattered, there were no cities and few important towns, public schools were lacking and printing presses were rare. The few newspapers were in the hands of the Federalists and wielded a powerful influence, because any newspaper was indeed precious in those days. Abraham Hodge, publisher, a native of New York, a personal friend of Washington and a strong Federalist, had come to North Carolina in 1785. The legislature chose him State printer and this position he still held. Hodge had followed Washington's army with his press and, during the dark winter at Valley Forge, his paper cheered the drooping spirits of the soldiers with words of encouragement. He now had printing presses at Edenton, Halifax, Fayetteville and New Bern and had established three newspapers. In editing the North Carolina Minerva at Fayetteville he was ably assisted by his nephew William Boylan. While the Federal party was thus supported in North Carolina, the "mobocrats," "red Republicans" and "Jacobins," as they were repeatedly styled, recognized that they must have a newspaper.

Raleigh had been laid out for the State capital, and, at the sagacious Macon's solicitation, Joseph Gales was making his way to the village capital to launch a newspaper to do battle for Republican principles. His task did not appear easy. The Federalists had made decided gains in the North Carolina election of 1798 and had partially recovered the ground they lost in 1796. Instead of one, the Federalists now had four of the ten congressmen from this State. The State senate had passed a resolution by a vote of five to one approving the Alien and Sedition laws but the resolution failed in the house of commons, in which the Republicans had a slender majority. However, these Adams measures were not popular with many North Carolina Federalists, who otherwise approved the Adams national administration, and Jesse Franklin was elected United States senator to succeed Alexander Martin, who had voted for the Alien and Sedition laws. The mixed situation in North Carolina puzzled the politicians, for, in the summer of 1800, Jefferson wrote that the condition of the public mind in North Carolina was mysterious to him.

Under these political conditions Joseph Gales issued the first copy of The Raleigh Register, October 22, 1799. The paper was indeed The Sheffield Register resurrected, without a single change in principles for which the editor stood. The Raleigh Register had for its heading a budding staff, surmounted by the cap of liberty, with a scroll bearing the word "Libertas" and the motto:

> "Our's are the plans of fair, delightful Peace,
> "Unwarped by Party Rage to live like Brothers."

The Register began immediately to arouse public sentiment against the Adams administration by printing the prosecutions under the Sedition law, characterized the encampment of the Sixth United States Regiment here as a threat, and published, without editorial approval, however, Jefferson's famous Kentucky resolutions, which met inglorious defeat in North Carolina. The paper soon became a power and copies were being sent by Gales to every county in the State.

The Register held the Raleigh field undisputed only a few months before William Boylan moved his Minerva from Fayetteville to Raleigh and sought to combat The Register. Electors in this State were then chosen by districts, and in the 1800 election the Republicans captured six and the Federalists four of North Carolina's districts. The legislature was Republican, and Joseph Gales succeeded Hodge as State printer, a position which ten years later paid only $1,400 gross per annum, and The Register's rival then offered to take the job for $900. The Register was paid less than $80 a year for publishing acts of congress.

The Minerva was backed by the ablest Federalists, and in 1802 such men as Duncan Cameron, General Davie, Archibald Henderson, Colonel Ashe of Wilmington, and others were striving to extend The Minerva's circulation by something on the order of the club plan.

The Minerva denounced Jefferson as a demagogue, who cheats his neighbors and blasphemes his Saviour. The Register championed the President and his administration. It is not surprising that such irreconcilable opinions led to a personal clash. Both papers, be it said to their credit, denounced the then prevalent practice of the duel. The two editors met one morning on Hillsboro street and fought out their differences. Gales claimed that Boylan assaulted him and he brought a civil suit for damages. The trial was moved to Hillsboro, where a jury awarded the plaintiff 100 pounds. Gales paid his attorneys' fees out of this sum and donated the remainder to the Raleigh Academy. He was one of the first trustees of the academy and felt the keenest interest in the school.

Indeed Joseph Gales threw himself with enthusiasm into the life of this community. Dr. Stephen Weeks, in his little pamphlet on the press in North Carolina, says of him: "He was a man of untiring energy; besides editing The Register, he kept all his accounts, made out his bills, gave receipts, conducted a bookstore, managed a book printing establishment. He was director in a bank and secretary of nearly every benevolent society in the city. He was never idle. The Register was always on the side of law, order and good morals. It did not teem with editorials, but when it spoke it was with such fullness, discretion and power that the whole country was moved and impressed".

Gales and Macon were in thorough accord in their opposition to the Federalists' Alien and Sedition laws; both believed in full suffrage and fair representation, but, aside from these issues, the union of their political convictions apparently ended, though their mutual regard was never severed. The Macon school believed that people least governed were best governed, that taxes should be endured in merely sufficient amount to operate the simplest possible government machinery; an army and navy, internal improvements or the development of industries or resources by governmental encouragement were extremely objectionable; that the States were sovereign and the Union but a weak confederacy with little power save for defense from invasion. Gales believed just as devoutly in the fullest liberty for the citizen, but he did not conceive that men must remain primitive or rustics in order to retain their freedom. He believed that a republican form of government was devised not simply to prevent men from cutting each other's throats, but to uplift and improve the condition of society; that the Union of States should not be a mere badge of defense but a force for righteousness and growth.

The files of The Register from 1800 to 1810 show that Joseph Gales during that decade advocated a State bank, after calling attention repeatedly to the fact that North Carolina was then the only one of the original States without such an institution; he urged a government banking system which would bring about specie payments; he sought to encourage home industries by offering prizes for the best cloth made in North Carolina, and recommended that the people wear no imported goods; the embargo he upheld; he urged in vain that the citizens subscribe $20,000 to build a cotton factory in Raleigh, and presented arguments that the enterprise would pay; he pointed out the benefit of organizing the proposed North Carolina Insurance Company with three hundred thousand dollars capital, and was its most persistent champion; and at this early date favored public improvements. He was strong in his contention that dueling should be prohibited, imprisonment for debt abolished, the existing harsh penal code modified, and above all a State penitentiary should be established. The slave trade, which South Carolina still fostered, should be ended immediately, for on this question, Gales wrote, in 1806: "We tremble when we reflect that this cloud (slavery) may one day burst and bury so many thousands in irretrievable ruin."

These convictions, enunciated prior to 1810, he expanded and perfected but never violated. Gales had warmly supported Madison's administration in the War of 1812, and viewed with pity and concern the disaffection then prevalent in New England. Before 1820 The Register was known as a defender of both a State and a National bank. When the enemies of the State bank were preparing for an attack on that infant institution in 1813 Gales, on the eve of the session of that Legislature, wrote: "We presume that it will be a difficult matter to persuade the citizens of this State, who before the State Bank went into operation, were in the habit of losing 5 to 10 per cent on New Bern and Cape Fear notes, to return to a similar state of things, by again putting afloat our ragged currency." He applauded in 1810 the first sympathetic expression, voiced by Henry Clay, for every people struggling to attain liberty and free government.

Perhaps Nathaniel Macon represented the prevalent opinion in this agricultural State when he declared: "Whilst the present Constitution remains to the United States it is utterly impossible for the United States to become a manufacturing nation," still Joseph Gales was no less positive in his declaration, "We are in favor of supporting American industries," and again "Protect the great staples of our country and articles fabricated from them." Later, when the North Carolina Legislature of 1820, by resolution, instructed our senators and requested our representatives in Congress "to use their best efforts to prevent any increase in the tariff to protect manufactures," the editor of the Register, then State Printer, defied the sentiment of the Legislature and wished that "our people would use a little common sense" on the subject. In this editorial Gales regretted the passage of the resolution and added: "We are of the opinion that this country will never get clear of its embarrassment until a stand is made in favor of Home Manufactures; until the amount of our imports shall not exceed that of our exports." Indeed he had set the example by locating a paper mill here and, beginning with the issue of September 29, 1808, The Register was printed on paper manufactured at Raleigh.

As editor and as a member of the State Board of Internal Improvements he labored for the upbuilding of the State, the improvement of highways and navigable streams, welcomed Fulton on his visit to Raleigh and encouraged the establishment of steamboats on our waters. He was anxious for the government to maintain a great highway from Washington through Raleigh to New Orleans. Nearly a century ago he urged that the nation connect the Atlantic and Pacific by canal. Before 1830 many leaders of the dominant political party here, in their extreme adherence to State rights, denied the power of the nation to make river and harbor and kindred improvements. In the face of such contention, The Raleigh Register boldly asserted, "If the Union is dismembered it will be by the States trenching upon the rights of the general government."

While The Register contended for principles which have since prevailed and have been thoroughly vindicated, yet the editor did not represent the popular view in North Carolina at that time. He was not a statesman to side with every faction, or a politician whose supreme aim was to be on the winning side; Joseph Gales disdained not to stand with a small minority in city, county and State. At the close of Monroe's second term, The Register supported William L.

Crawford of Georgia, then Secretary of the Treasury, as logical successor to the presidency. However, when the election, for the second time in the history of the government, was thrown into the national House of Representatives and the choice lay between Jackson and Adams, Gales declared in his paper: "We assuredly prefer Mr. John Quincy Adams to General Jackson." He took this position notwithstanding the fact that Jackson in the recent election had swept North Carolina, carried Wake County by an almost unprecedented majority, and won in the City of Raleigh by a vote of more than two to one. Old-line Federalists, like William Boylan and Colonel Polk, who had carried Wake County over Gales' strenuous opposition in 1812, were now supporters of Andrew Jackson and remained in the majority.

Though Gales' policies were not accepted at home, still he had the full confidence of his neighbors. From 1813 to 1833, with one exception, he appears to have been annually elected by the people as Intendant of Police of the City of Raleigh. The one exception was in 1826, when Col. John Bell, editor of The Star, was chosen Intendant, but the next year the office was restored to Joseph Gales. A ten-dollar fine was, in those days, imposed upon the citizen who declined a municipal office here. Gales served on the city patrol, organized the first fire company here, and brought a fire engine to Raleigh prior to 1820. He retained the position of State printer until the Jackson party in the legislature gave the printing to his rival, The Star.

The Register strongly approved the Adams administration (1825-'29), and, when the presidential election of 1828 came, Gales was urging the re-election of President Adams, an attitude not popular in the South. A convention or caucus was held in Raleigh to name an Adams electoral ticket; Gales was secretary of that meeting and was made chairman of the Adams Vigilance Committee for the campaign. The Adams ticket made a pitiful showing in the election; Jackson swept the State. Gales was too strong a man to be deterred in his policies by lack of popular support. However, he was not alone. During the decade ending 1830 his advocacy of policies which would uplift and improve conditions had brought him into more or less distinct political accord with the rising young Willie P. Mangum, Judge Gaston, a former Federalist, Wm. A. Graham and others, who became leaders of the Whig party in the thirties. In 1825 The Register had supported Mangum for congress from this district; he was elected by only 58 majority; his opponent, Rev. Josiah Crudup, a Baptist preacher,—who was denied a seat in the State Senate from Wake the previous year under the constitutional provision debarring ministers from the legislature,—carried Wake by the then almost unprecedented majority of 961 out of a total vote of less than 1,200.

While Gales in 1830 was consistently opposing a reduction of tariff duties, he at least had the satisfaction of seeing the legislature of North Carolina, almost unanimously and without regard to party, emphatically repudiate South Carolina's nullification doctrine,—a course more timid slave States had hesitated to take. In 1832 Gales was again bitterly opposed to Jackson, but for a third time the General easily carried North Carolina.

The time was now at hand for Joseph Gales to lay aside editorial work, and his mantle was to fall upon the worthy shoulders of his son, Weston R. Gales. William W. Seaton, a brilliant young editor, came from Halifax to Raleigh and formed a business partnership with Joseph Gales in January, 1809. March 31, 1809, he married Sarah Gales. Joseph Gales, after coming to Raleigh, had purchased an interest in The National Intelligencer at Washington for his son Joseph Gales, Jr., and in 1807 the young man, who had been carefully trained by his father and was an expert at shorthand, went to Washington as congressional reporter on that paper. He became sole owner in 1810. Two years later William W. Seaton moved to Washington and joined his brother-in-law in owning and editing The National Intelligencer under the name of Gales and Seaton. Joseph Gales, Jr., married in December, 1813, Julia Lee, of Mestmoreland, Va., and this cultured woman often acted as reporter for her husband and posterity is indebted to her for preserving the famous debate between Webster and Hayne. Altona Holstein Gales, the second daughter, married Rev. Anthony Foster, a Presbyterian divine who afterwards became a Unitarian. He lived only a few years later, and his widow died here November 16, 1827. Anna Eliza Gales died here September 22, 1822, aged 25 years, in an epidemic of fever which was accompanied by great fatality in Raleigh. Caroline Matilda, the youngest daughter, married Major Thomas L. West, of Bertie, on March 25, 1818. There were two other sons: Thomas Gales, who studied law, located in Louisiana, served on the staff of General Jackson in the War of 1812 and with his own hand hauled down the Union Jack at Pensacola, Fla.

Weston Raleigh Gales was born April 20, 1802, and died July 23, 1848. In January, 1822, he became associated with his father in publishing The Register under the firm name of Joseph Gales & Son. From 1823 to 1830 the paper was issued as a semi-weekly. In the fall of 1833 Joseph Gales announced that he would retire from business, leaving The Register in the hands of his son, Weston R. Gales, and spend his remaining years with his children in Washington City. This was just as his political party was at last coming into power in North Carolina; Mangum was now in the United States Senate, and in 1834 a revolution in sentiment gave the opponents of Van Buren, Jackson's candidate, the State Senate, while Wm. H. Haywood, of Wake, a Jackson man, was elected Speaker of the House by only four majority.

The retirement of Joseph Gales called forth universal regret in Raleigh. The citizens gave a public dinner in his honor; Governor Swain presided; Chief Justice John Marshall, Judge Gaston and other distinguished men attended. The beloved Rev. William McPheeters, who came to Raleigh in 1810 as "Principal of the Raleigh Academy and Pastor of the City," paid tribute to his devoted friend and the resolutions he offered thanked Joseph Gales for his "long-continued, efficient and faithful services as corresponding and recording secretary of the North Carolina Bible Society."

Joseph Gales lagged in no worthy cause. For years he was secretary of the Peace Society, which sought to end dueling and promote peace between individuals and nations. His untiring efforts he devoted to the Colonization Society, which purposed to gradually end slavery by transporting to Africa negroes, as they were freed. The last few years of his life spent in Washington were occupied with work as secretary of this society. Slavery he abhorred but recognized that the institution was thrust upon the South. The Register in 1825 made the prophetic statement that slavery was "a great evil but we can not believe it irremediable, hopeless and perpetual." When the legislature passed a very pro-slavery act in 1831, The Register boldly declared: "A string may be stretched till it breaks. It is admitted that slavery is a curse to the Southern States. Would it not be better to think of some means of getting rid of it, rather than fly in the face of humanity and the Constitution."

With Nathaniel Macon he considered the custom of treating at elections one of the worst evils of the day, but more than a decade passed after he directed public attention to the curse before it was prohibited by law. Gales advocated in 1805 "guardians for drunkards, lunatics and idiots." When whiskey was being sold freely in almost every store at 40 cents a gallon and temperance societies had not been formed here, The Register, in 1820, declared: "We heartily wish there were no grog shops in this country." Ten years later the same paper repeated that "to lessen the drink evil no experiment should be left untried."

Dr. McPheeters had a zealous worker for Sunday schools in Joseph Gales. The Register in 1820 hoped ere long to see "a good Sunday school in every neighborhood." An editorial in 1829 gave this information: "It is gratifying to find that the governors of our State are lending the influence of their example to the cause of good morals. Our late governor (Iredell), the successor of the venerable Macon in the United States Senate, would not permit card parties in the governor's palace. * * * Our present governor (Owen) has accepted an invitation to visit the Sabbath school in the Presbyterian church, which is chiefly composed of children of Baptist and Presbyterian parents." In 1829 he called attention to the fact that a canvas in Wake County showed 49 out of 114 families without a copy of the Scriptures, and he urged support for the Bible Society to enable it to place a Bible in every home. One of the few controversies into which The Register was drawn was when the honored and beloved Bishop Ravenscroft, a highchurchman, in a special sermon here in 1824 expressed misgivings about the free dissemination of the Bible among the people, without interpretation and church rites, and feared that the Bible Society would do harm rather than good. Joseph Gales was so deeply interested in the Bible Society, of which he was secretary, that he wrote an editorial in reply, in which he said:

> "We have always believed that the Scriptures contained many things hard to understand, yet there is sufficient in them, which is plain and intelligent to the meanest capacity, to produce the best effects on the life and character: and sufficient even without a guide to teach men their duty to God and to their fellow-men. Nor do we conceive the diversity of opinion among men on the subject of religion as an evil to be lamented. All that is necessary to produce happiness under such circumstances is that men should think charitably of each other, and agree to differ.

> believing that every one who professes himself to be guided by the principles of the Gospel, and leads a good life, is sincere in his profession and will hereafter be approved by his Maker."

Bishop English, of the Roman Catholic Church, came to Raleigh about this time and delivered a series of religious lectures in the Presbyterian church. Gales formed a high opinion of the Bishop and they became fast friends.

No victory gave Editor Gales keener joy than when the legislature of North Carolina in 1820 declared against imprisonment for debt, and thus set "a glorious example" to the other States and to the nation. If Gales could have seen a penitentiary established while he was in the editorial chair and the severity of the penal code mitigated, his cup of joy would have been almost full. As foreman of the grand jury in Wake County he aroused public attention to the fact that the jails were then hot-houses of filth and disease, with no sanitation, heating or proper ventilation, and at his insistence a sewerage system was planned for the jail here. There were only two crimes, he believed, for which the death penalty should be inflicted, although the list in North Carolina was then much longer and included horse stealing and bigamy. Executions were always public, multitudes, including women, attended; drunkenness was prevalent. The Register ever protested and declared that when the State took human life it should be done in private. He expressed agreement with the first movement, in 1825, which finally culminated in the Constitutional Convention of 1835, when the clause disfranchising Jews and Catholics,—a clause not enforced, however, (which The Register declared in 1826 "it will be expunged whenever an opportunity occurs for so doing")—was expunged and our constitution vastly improved.

An earnest champion of good schools, he repeatedly asserted that education should be the primary matter before the legislature. "The framers of our constitution," he wrote when the legislature met in 1825, "directed such schools to be established, and it is time that direction was being obeyed." At a non-political public dinner given John C. Calhoun here in 1825, Joseph Gales gave this characteristic toast: "Industry, frugal habits and a good system of general education, the surest means of promoting and securing individual and national prosperity and happiness." As a publisher, "Matilda Berkley," probably the first novel published in the State, came from his presses; also numerous publications on agriculture and law, besides annually Gales' Almanac with weather prognostications by the famous Beasley of Wake. A study of the census of 1820 led Gales to begin advocating a school for the deaf and a hospital for the insane. In 1827 Gales, Dr. McPheeters and Dr. Caldwell led in a convention held here to urge the legislature to establish a school for the deaf.

After spending six years in Washington with his children, the old man returned to Raleigh. Nearly fifty years ago one who had known him well thus wrote: "In Raleigh there was no figure that, as it passed, was greeted so much by the signs of a peculiar veneration as that great, stalwart one of his, with a sort of nobleness in its very simplicity, an inborn goodness and courtesy in all its roughness of frame,—a countenance mild, commanding yet pleasant, betokening a bosom no low thought had ever entered. You had in him, indeed, the highest image of that staunch old order from which he was sprung."

Two years after the death of his dear companion, who had indeed been his comfort and helpmeet and charmed the social circle here, he died of paralysis in this city. In the City Cemetery a granite stone bears this simple inscription:

TO THE MEMORY OF

JOSEPH GALES,

an Englishman by birth, but for a period of nearly forty years a citizen of Raleigh.
Born February 4, 1761,
Died August 24, 1841.

Authorities consulted.—Files of Sheffield Register, Raleigh Register, Minerva and Star; Dr. Dodd's invaluable Life of Macon, Dr. Weeks on the press in N. C., Dr. Bassett on suffrage in N. C., addresses by Dr. K. P. Battle and Gov. Swain; lives of Pitt, Jefferson, Adams and Jackson; I am specially indebted to Mr. Charles Root, a descendant of Joseph Gales, for Life of Wm. W. Seaton and extracts from memoirs of Mrs. Gales.—W. G. B.

OUR FIRST CONSTITUTION, 1776.

E. W. SIKES.

The last representative of the English government in North Carolina was not driven from the colony, but on April 24, 1775, he deemed it wise to leave New Bern and go to Fort Johnston on the Cape Fear River. This flight of Governor Martin marks the failure of the English government in this province. Martin little thought when he spent the night with his good Scotch friend, Farquard Campbell, on his flight, that it was his last night as governor of this province.

Martin had seen the danger threatening in the two provincial congresses that had met in August and April under the very shadow of his palace at New Bern, but when he saw from his palace window the citizens removing the cannons from the palace lawn, he thought it high time to seek safety in flight.

Samuel Johnston soon called the provincial congress to meet for the third time in August at Hillsboro. This body declared that whereas the governor had "abdicated," it was now necessary to establish some temporary form of government. With this brief declaration the English government was dismissed. The temporary government consisted of a provincial council of thirteen members. Six district committees of safety of twelve members each, and the county and town committees.

These vigorous committees were able to meet the Scotch Highlanders and defeat them at Moore's Creek in February, 1776. The sceptre that fell from the nerveless grasp of Governor Martin was picked up by vigorous committees. In April the provincial congress met at Halifax. Public sentiment in the State, or at least among the revolutionists, was now crystalized. The victory at Moore's Creek in February made them feel that independence was in easy grasp. A few days after the meeting the congress instructed its delegates in the Continental Congress to vote for independence. Samuel Johnston wrote Iredell that "they are all up for independence." On April 12 these instructions were given to the delegates; on the next day a committee was appointed to prepare a temporary civil constitution.

This was no easy task. These men could declaim about political rights; they knew how to justify their rebellion, but to construct a form of government was a new and untried task. They had no models before them save the old English charters. These were of very little service. After much labor, on April 25th, the committee reported the outline of a form of a government. Briefly the plan was that the executive should consist of a president and six councillors always in session; the legislature was to consist of an upper house composed of one member from each county and a lower house chosen from among the people. Justices of the county courts were to be elected by popular vote. For the upper house only freeholders might vote; for the lower house a household qualification was necessary. All officials were to be elected annually. Thomas Jones wrote that the executive council was to be always in session for "receiving foreign ambassadors" and other such purposes.

These outlines were reported to the congress on the 27th, and were discussed with much division of judgment. On May 2d, Samuel Johnston wrote that "affairs have taken a turn within a few days past. All ideas of forming a permanent constitution are at this time laid aside."

Whatever may have been the cause of this turn of affairs—whether the threatened invasion of the British or the divergence of opinion—the matter was postponed and a temporary government by committees constituted.

The question of a constitution, a form of government, had now arisen. Men began to think on the matter and to work out their plans. The discussion had gone just far enough to show that the revolutionary party, though united on the question of independence, was divided as to the form of government that should be adopted.

On August 9, 1776, the State Council of Safety issued a call to elect delegates to a new provincial congress, whose chief duty it would be to form a civil government. In the call emphasis was placed on the great importance of the meeting.

The campaign that followed this announcement was very bitter. The danger of an invasion had passed, so the pent-up feelings broke forth in this campaign. It was conservative against radical. The conservatives had little fault to find with the principles of the English government. They were in revolt because these principles had been transgressed. On the other hand, the radicals had little love for anything English. They wished to change things "root and branch." Samuel Johnston was the outspoken leader of the conservatives. He had not hesitated to condemn openly the outline that had been proposed. Patriot that he was, he despised the tempest and turmoil of a popular democracy. The leader of the radicals was probably Willie Jones. He was well educated, a large slave owner, but in politics an extreme radical for that day. Johnston was defeated. His opponents rejoiced greatly and burned him in effigy. Jones was elected.

The congress assembled at Halifax on November 12, 1776. On the next day a committee was appointed to lay before the body a bill of rights and a form of government. Among the members of this committee were Richard Caswell, who had come into great popularity since the battle of Moore's Creek; General Pearson, the wealthy landowner of Regulator fame; Willie Jones, the radical "who could draw a bill in better language than any other man of his day," and Thomas Jones, an astute lawyer and friend of Samuel Johnston. The credit of authorship of the constitution rests probably among these men. Judge Toomer reported a tradition that Caswell was its author. Samuel Johnston called it (Thomas) "Jones' Constitution," and others divide the honor between Thomas and Willie Jones.

The political theory of this time is found in the Bill of Rights. The years of quarrels with Colonial governors and their experience in local self-government separated them from English political theory. In this Bill of Rights they declare that all governments originate from the consent of the people and that all representative power vests in them. These men had gotten a great deal from England, but they had also outgrown much that they had received. These brief statements of the Bill of Rights are commonplaces with us now, but they were revolutionary in 1776. Taxation without representation was the practice in England. The colonists raised the question and claimed it as a constitutional right. In this they were clearly wrong. In the end they fell back not on constitutional rights but on inalienable rights—rights not found in parchments but in nature and given man by the Creator of nature.

But it was possible for men to agree on the fundamental principles of liberty and yet disagree as to what form of government best secures that liberty to the individual citizen.

It is surprising to one of the twentieth century to find so many restrictions as are found in the Constitution of 1776. Despite all the democratic maxims of the Bill of Rights, the constitution proper contains many aristocratic principles. True, hereditary succession, hereditary privileges and entails were forbidden, but political power was vested in a few only. The "Fathers" found no inconsistency in proclaiming that "all government rests on the consent of the governed" and then restricting political privileges to a few.

The prevalent belief in America in 1776 was that the man without property ought not to vote. Franklin said that "allowing them to vote for legislators is an impropriety." Landholding, or at least some property qualification, was required in all of these first constitutions. In the Constitution of 1776 only those owning fifty acres of land could vote for State senator, while the payment of public taxes was a requirement of an elector for the House of Commons.

Office-holding was also limited to the property holding class. The governor was required to own a freehold valued at one thousand pounds. This was not peculiar to North Carolina. Maryland required five thousand and South Carolina ten thousand. A State senator was required to own three hundred acres and a commoner one hundred.

The result of this legislation was the disfranchisement in some cases of one-half of the adult males, while the office holding class was composed of a much smaller per cent of the people.

The "Fathers" were jealous of any kind of government. They feared tyranny. They were willing to sacrifice efficiency of administration to escape the danger of oppression or a hereditary ruling class. Consequently the term of office was short. The governor was elected annually, as was the General Assembly. In this way the officeholder was directly answerable to the people. Every year he had to give an account of his stewardship. John Adams declared that "where annual elections end, there slavery begins." Macon quoted this with approval. This clause pleased conservative Samuel Johnston, who said that in this way the people could repudiate the designing demagogue who had won their vote.

The governor was still further restricted by the clause that he could serve only three years out of six. Many of them served the three years limit. In practice it was the policy to re-elect the governors. Only the judges and the secretary of state were elected for a longer term than one year.

These "Fathers" feared the executive power and hemmed it about on every side, but the legislative power they trusted. All the State officers were elected by the General Assembly and for one year only, save the secretary, who was elected triennially, and the judges, who were elected for life. Practically no power was given to the governor. William Hooper declared that he was given just enough power to receipt for his salary, and even his salary was left in the hands of the General Assembly. While the judges were elected for life, still their salaries were determined by the assembly.

The constitution did not establish any judicial system. This was left to the legislature. Though the Bill of Rights declared in favor of the separation of the three departments of government, the idea was not carried out in making the form of government.

Freedom of religious worship was recognized; all sects were tolerated; no church was established. Nevertheless, a belief in these principles did not deter these men from requiring a religious test of officeholders. All officeholders were required to be Protestants. Thus were both Jews and Catholics and disbelievers disqualified. This law was not strictly enforced against the Catholics, for the third governor—Burke —was a Catholic, as was also the distinguished judge, William Gaston. This requirement was not peculiar to North Carolina. New Hampshire, New Jersey, South Carolina, Georgia, Maryland and Massachusetts had similar restrictions, while Pennsylvania and Delaware required belief in God, in future rewards and punishments, and in inspiration of Scriptures.

Another restriction was that no clergyman while he continued active "in the exercise of the pastoral function should be senator, commoner, or councillor of State." In this way it was hoped that both the State and religion would be helped. Such men were not precluded from executive or judicial offices, but it was deemed unwise to entrust them with the making of laws. This law was enforced, and John Culpepper and Josiah Crudup were unseated from the General Assembly on this ground.

There were various other clauses that excited much comment. It was at one time proposed to elect the justices of the county courts by a popular vote. Samuel Johnston thought that this was a most dangerous feature, and prevailed upon them to change, so that the governor commissioned them for life upon the recommendation of the General Assembly. Even the assembly was forbidden to remove them save for misbehaviour, absence, or inability.

Debtors could not be imprisoned after the delivery of his estate; schools were to be established; county officers were to be chosen, and there were other matters of minor importance.

Popular democracy had not yet come; in fact, representative democracy was not well understood. In the composition of the General Assembly the people were not represented, but the counties were. In the Senate every county had one representative, and in the House of Commons two. It mattered not whether the county was large or small, rich or poor, populous or not, the political power was the same.

Altogether, the first constitution of North Carolina was typical of the times. It differs not much from those of other States. It is probable that copies of the constitutions of other States were before the body. There were certain political ideas that had become common property in the colonies, and these find expression with some modifications in these early forms of government. This constitution was destined to withstand every effort to change till 1835, when it underwent a general revision.

NORTH CAROLINA'S HISTORICAL EXHIBIT AT JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

BY MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
(Member of Jamestown Historical Commission.)

It is indeed gratifying to know that the Old North State is creditably represented at this most interesting Exposition of the century, where history is given a place that never before has been accorded in the annals of America. Each of the thirteen colonies, realizing the importance of encouraging a thirst for research and knowledge in this essential branch of learning, has assisted in rendering the exhibition in the History Building a success. Connecticut proves the sole exception. This splendid edifice cost $130,000 and months of careful labor. It is perfectly fire-proof and burglar-proof. Upon the collecting and installing of the exhibits thousands of dollars were expended in addition to the arduous work, wearing anxiety and ceaseless responsibility given by the learned, patriotic men and women from the various sections of this broad land. The results are a compensation to all. From the outset it was intended to be the center of attraction among all the other departments in the numerous buildings. Its work is to be educational. Here the slumbering talent of the ignorant is to be awakened and he is to learn what America has done, can and will do, while the student is to grow wise and the scholar can refresh his treasured acquisitions.

As fashion and history repeat themselves, so again the daughters of Carolina have taken the lead and done their duty in placing her historically where she justly belongs—in the front rank. Too much praise can not be given Mrs. Lindsay Patterson, Vice-President General of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who first planned and arranged this exhibit. As chairman of the Jamestown Historical Commission she proved herself a genuine leader. The Jamestown Commission for North Carolina appropriated as much money as could be spared for this purpose, which was not a large sum. Mrs. Patterson was assisted by Miss Rebecca Schenck, of Greensboro, and Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, of Raleigh, who have given months of arduous toil to this patriotic cause. North Carolina is the only State in which women have sole charge of the historical exhibit.

The relics are chronologically arranged save whenever the artistic can not be sacrificed. With a desire to start with the beginning of our State history, instead of an ambition to antedate the first permanent settlement at Jamestown by twenty-two years, the story of the "Lost Colony" is given by paintings and photographs. First on the post hangs the coat-of-arms of Sir Walter Raleigh; next, forming a frieze running along the top of the two partitions, which are the side walls of our space, are placed the White pictures—18 in number. In 1587 Queen Elizabeth sent John White to Roanoke Island to make paintings of the aboriginals. White remained a year minus five days and made a number of sketches from life. They represent the Indian features: their modes of prayer, dancing, fishing, cooking and eating; the styles of dress adopted by their chiefs, religious men, warriors, their women and children; views of their villages and tombs. The originals are in the British Museum. Colonel Bennehan Cameron gave an order for these paintings to be executed for exhibition, permission having been granted by the government, in the North Carolina space in the History Building. Afterwards they are to hang in the Hall of History at Raleigh. A more generous gift from a more patriotic citizen can not be found here.

Next are arranged the thirteen fine oil paintings of different scenes on the Roanoke Island of to-day, by Mr. Jaques Busbee, who was appointed by the State Historical Commission to undertake this task. Ballast Point, where Raleigh's colony first landed; Fort Raleigh, with its intrenchments plainly visible; the monument to Virginia Dare and the views of water, woods, sand dunes and sky, make one feel he is gazing in reality upon this sacred spot where was enacted the saddest tragedy of American history.

King Charles II. and his lords proprietors hang in the order of their rank: Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon; George Monck, Duke of Albemarle; William, Earl of Craven; John, Lord Berkely; Anthony, Lord Ashley; Sir George Carteret, Sir William Berkely. These photographs—symphonies in brown—are taken from the oil portraits in possession of Mr. James Sprunt, British vice-consul at Wilmington, the only collection of the kind in existence. John Locke, who drafted the fundamental constitution under their rule, has not been forgotten, but an engraving of him looks calmly down from an elevated position on the passing throng. As the beautiful Theodosia Burr, daughter of Aaron Burr, and wife of Governor Alston of South Carolina, met a horrible fate at the hands of pirates on the coast of Carolina, her portrait hangs with this collection. This was washed ashore at Nag's Head in the winter of 1812-13, and was picked up by a banker. It is loaned by Mrs. Overman, of Elizabeth City.

The group of oil portraits, while not large, represents our leading statesmen whose lives were spent in the service of the State and some assisted in making our country great. The three signers—William Hooper, Joseph Hewes and John Penn—are placed side by side. Mrs. Beale's picturesque painting of Charles I. is given a prominent position. Historians can not agree as to the origin of the name of the Carolinas, claiming it is named in honor of either Charles I., Charles II. of England, or Charles IX. of France. It is most probable it was called for the Martyr King. Chief Justices Iredell and Alfred Moore hang on each side of the excellent portrait of the brilliant Judge Gaston. The portraits of Dr. James Norcom, skilled surgeon in the War of 1812, recommended by Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia and appointed by Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina, and that of Mrs. Winifred Hoskins, secretary of the "Edenton Tea Party," are masterpieces—among the gems of the hall. These are the property of Miss Penelope Norcom, of Hertford. The Secretary of the Fourth Provincial Congress, George Green, and Martha Cogsdell, his wife, are loaned by Mrs. George Green, of New Bern. The splendid likeness of Governor William A. Graham, one of the greatest men our State has produced, adorns the middle column, also that of General Joseph Graham, his father. Many photographs, etchings and watercolors of our great men and women, notable events and historic places cover the walls—but lack of space forbids even a cursory mention here.

Of the twelve cases, that devoted to the silver is the handsomest and most showy. It tells of the aristocracy of the colony and offers an opportunity for the study of the armorial bearings of some of our early prominent families. The Colonial service of the Cameron family, bearing the arms of that Clan, loaned by Col. Benehan Cameron, is beautiful in its simplicity and a fine specimen of the style of silver of that period. The elegant service, also Colonial, but not so old and a trifle more ornamented, once in possession of Governor Samuel Johnston of "Hayes," is loaned by members of the Wood family. A portion—four pieces—of the silver presented by Prince Charles Edward Stuart to the dauntless Flora McDonald can be seen. Spoons owned by William Hooper, the signer, George Green, secretary of the Fourth Provincial Congress, the DuBrutz family, and a ladle of John Harvey, bearing the respective crests, are arranged to advantage. The paten and chalice presented by "Col. Edward Mosely" to St. Paul's church, Edenton, in 1725, has been loaned by the vestry and rector of that historic old parish. This disproves the exaggerated statements of Colonel Byrd concerning the religious condition of that borough in 1728. The silver coffee pot and cream pitcher, with the Eden crest, and cruets with the Paget arms engraved thereon, have been secured through the courtesy of Mrs. and Miss Drane, of Edenton. The communion set of pewter, used by the First German Reform church, comes from Alamance. Another relic of interest is the green and gold plate, with festive scene in center, in a red velvet frame, which was one of a set of thirty pieces made to order for a coronation gift for Napoleon to present to Joseph Bonaparte when the Emperor created the latter King of Spain. This was brought to Bordentown and sold to General Patterson, from whom it was inherited by Mrs. Patterson. The plate owned by George Durant, whose treaty with the Indians deserves the reputation of that of William Penn, but is little known beyond our borders, comes from a descendant.

The quaint styles of the dress of long ago are revealed by a display of clothing that fills a case and a half.

The MSS. occupy another case and a half, while others are scattered here and there as chronological order demands. There are documents with the signatures of Generals William R. Davie, LaFayette, Anthony Wayne, Greene, Joseph Graham, Governors Caswell and Samuel Johnston, William Hooper, Joseph Hewes, John Penn, Colonel John Hinton, Major John Hinton, and many other distinguished Carolinians, subscribed. The gem of the collection is the court martial made out in the handwriting of John Paul Jones, from the library at "Hayes."

The treasures handed down in the Blount and Harvey families were tastefully arranged and loaned by Miss Lida Rodman, of Washington, filling a case and a half. They comprise many valuable historic heirlooms.

Army officers and martial spirits pause indefinitely before the battle case, studying the curious old guns and swords stored there. Relics that did service at Alamance, Moore's Creek Bridge, Guilford Court-House and King's Mountain are grouped effectively. The bell that was rung, in lieu of beating the drum, to gather together the bands of Regulators on that fatal day in May, 1771, is one of the chief objects—as is also Cornwallis' pistol. The shaving case—indeed, a handsome one when presented by General Nathaniel Greene to the famous Peter Francisco for courage—is loaned by his descendants, the Pescuds of Raleigh. The velvet-lined tray contained originally a razor for each day of the week, with the name engraved thereon. On the top is an inscription in the handwriting of General Greene, scratched with a sharp-pointed instrument.

The "Edenton Tea Party," so dear to the hearts of the Daughters of the Revolution, who have labored long and patiently to raise funds, by publishing the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, to erect a suitable memorial to those fifty-one patriotic women, is well told in relics. The most unique of our treasures is the dainty little model, an exact reproduction of the "Tea Party House," the residence of Mrs. Elizabeth King, in which the resolutions were signed October 25, 1774. This is a gift from that versatile writer and historian, Dr. Richard Dillard, of Edenton. Above hangs the painting of that historic gathering, also presented by the same patriotic gentleman to the State Library. Another of his gracious acts has been placing in the exhibit for distribution a number of pamphlets, containing his article, revised, which appeared in the BOOKLET, August, 1901. It is well illustrated. A photograph of the stately Penelope Barker, president of the Tea Party, the portrait of Winifred Hoskins, already mentioned, the cut-glass dish, rare china plate and Prayer Book of Elizabeth Horniblower, the china plate of Mrs. Hoskins and the candlestand that came down from the Valentine family—all bring those fascinating dames of the Revolutionary days very close to us and we can feel their very presence, hear their voices in a conglomeration of discussion, and are inspired by their patriotism and zeal. They were true, noble, refined women, who fulfilled the duty of the home yet forgot not their country. Can the daughters of to-day act unwisely in following such examples?

The exhibit of the Wachovia Historical Society reveals the life of the people—their industries, household utensils and implements. The Moravians have an excellent display in the Pennsylvania exhibit and this completes theirs. The entire history of these thrifty, peace-abiding citizens—that have ever remained a distinct colony—affords unusual opportunity for the student. Never before has the Society allowed the whole collection to leave Salem. On this occasion consent was not obtained for the removal until a custodian was permitted to accompany and install it. The maps, covering a goodly portion of the wall, are considered of great worth. A century of lights shows a remarkable series of candlesticks (with quaint methods of manufacturing candles), lanterns, lard and oil lamps. A century of music presents instruments of equal interest, such as a harpsichord played when Washington visited Salem and a horn also used on that notable occasion, with the music, "God save great Washington," by its side. Here can be seen the first printing press in the State, which was seized by Lord Cornwallis at Hillsboro and used by him for printing his proclamations. The fire engine, one of the first in this country, is indeed curious. It could be of service should anything so impossible as a fire occur in this absolutely fire-proof structure. Four cases are crowded with all kinds of curios. Wachovia has done well for her State at the Exposition. To Mr. J. A. Lineback, who installed this splendid exhibit, many thanks are due.

Numerous pieces of furniture were offered, but could not be taken for lack of room. The following, however, were accepted: A chair owned by Washington; a chair from "Buncombe Hall"; one that Cornwallis sat in; two loaned by Colonel Cameron—one came from "Sweet Hall" and has an interesting history attached, the other was the property of Richard Bennehan of "Stagville," and has held some of North Carolina's most notable sons; the card table, a beautiful bit of mahogany that belonged to President Jackson. North Carolina gave three Presidents to the Union—Jackson, Polk and Johnson—and one "first lady in the land"—Dolly Madison. Pictures of these statesmen and their homes with possessions of the last named (loaned by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt) enlighten many who did not heretofore know these incidents in our history.

A limited space forbids a fuller account of this engrossing work, which it is hoped will greatly aid in developing the historical awakening that now exists within our borders. More visitors seek the North Carolina exhibit than any other in the History Building, while numbers come just for a glimpse at that alone. No description can convey a correct idea of its worth or artistic effect—one must see to understand—then enjoy. To the generous men and women of Carolina who have made this exhibition a possibility by the loan of their priceless heirlooms and untiring assistance, to the custodians of other States who by their courtesy and encouragement rendered the installation an easier task—there are obligations existing which can never be repaid. Again, North Carolina has done right nobly.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF CONTRIBUTORS.

SKETCHES COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

KEMP PLUMMER BATTLE, LL. D.

To Kemp Plummer Battle, the erudite scholar and assiduous student of North Carolina history, the BOOKLET owes a debt of gratitude. In no better way can it show its appreciation than by recounting the headings of the monographs which he has contributed from time to time and which has enriched its columns.

(1) In Vol. I, January, 1902, he wrote: "A North Carolina Naval Hero and His Daughter," showing the career of Captain Johnston Blakeley, the brilliant Commander of the American sloop, Wasp, and captor of the English brig-sloop, Reindeer, during the War of 1812.

(2) Vol. II, November, 1902: "Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury," the name given by Tryon to Wake Court House, the site of the city of Raleigh.

(3) Vol. III, May, 1903: "Trial of James Glasgow and the Supreme Court," showing how our higher Court was evolved from the special tribunal organized for the investigation of the frauds committed by Secretary of State Glasgow and others.

(4) Vol. IV, May, 1904: "The Lords Proprietors of the Province of North Carolina," giving a succinct history of each of the eight Lords Proprietors and their successors, including their service to the Stuarts, which earned the grant of the imperial territory of Carolina.

(5) Vol. VI, July, 1906: "Glimpses of History in Names of Counties in North Carolina," showing how these counties derived their names: some named in honor of favored Eng-

DR. KEMP PLUMMER BATTLE, LL.D.

North Carolina
State Library
Raleigh, N. C.

lish lords, of statesmen officially connected with the colonies, of champions of civil liberty, and of Indian tribes; and of educators, governors, and navigators who have lived within the limits of North Carolina.

The following sketch of Dr. Battle by Edward L. Stewart, of the University, and which appeared in a recent issue of the News and Observer, is herewith reproduced by permission of the editor of that paper:

"Kemp Plummer Battle was born in Franklin County, North Carolina, December 19, 1831. His father, William Horn Battle, of the class of 1820, a great grandson of Elisha Battle, of the Constitutional Convention of 1776, was for years a Supreme Court Judge of the State. His mother, Lucy Martin Plummer, a granddaughter of Colonel Nicholas Long, of Revolutionary fame, was a daughter of Kemp Plummer, State Senator from Warren County, who was known as the 'honest lawyer.'

"He entered the University in 1845 and graduated four years later at the age of seventeen. The prize oration, the valedictory address, was drawn for by the three first honor men of the class, and Dr. Battle was the successful one of those who drew for the prize.

"In his senior year, as President of the Dialectic Society, he, in company with Hon. James Mebane, First President of the society and ex-Speaker of the House of Commons, presided at the dedicatory services of the then new Dialectic Hall, which is now known as the History Room, in the Old West Building.

"After graduation he was elected tutor of mathematics, in which capacity he served for four years, during which time he studied law under his father, receiving his license in 1854, and at once began a remunerative practice in copartnership with Quentin Busbee, of the Raleigh Bar.

"In 1855 he married Miss Martha A. Battle, a distant relative, who is still living, the joy of his life. They have been blessed with seven children, five of whom reached maturity. His daughter, Nellie, wife of Dr. Richard H. Lewis, of Raleigh, N. C., died in 1889. His four living children are Dr. Kemp P. Battle, Jr., of Raleigh, N. C.; Thomas H. Battle, of Rocky Mount, N. C.; Herbert B. Battle, Ph.D., of Montgomery, Ala., and W. J. Battle, Ph.D., Professor of Greek of the University of Texas.

"In 1860, he was one of the Whig candidates for the House of Commons in Wake County, and, although himself defeated, he aided in changing a Democratic majority of over five hundred to a Whig majority of two hundred. In this campaign he prepared a pamphlet on "Ad Valorem Taxation Explained by Questions and Answers," which was so highly valued by his party that one hundred thousand copies were printed and distributed among the people of the State. During the Presidential campaign of 1860 he was President of the Wake County Union Club and actively opposed both Lincoln and Breckenridge, but when the great Civil War broke out he embraced the cause of the South with equal zeal and enthusiasm, and was elected a member of the Secession Convention, in which he, foreseeing that the Confederacy would need fuel for its navy and for its factories, successfully advocated the building of a railroad to the coal fields of Chatham, which later became a part of the Raleigh and Augusta Air Line of the present Seaboard Air Line system. At the request of Governor Worth, he was a successful candidate before the Legislature for State Treasurer in 1865, and in 1867 was re-elected practically unanimously, to be turned out of office by the operation of the Reconstruction Acts in 1868.

"In 1862 he was made a Trustee of the University, and soon thereafter he was placed on the Executive Committee, in which position his love for his alma mater at once began to assert itself constructively.

"In 1867 the University entered the darkest period of its history, its funds were running low, and its professors were fast resigning. Dr. Battle, as Chairman of a Committee of Trustees, of which Solicitor-General Samuel F. Phillips and ex-Governor William A. Graham were of the other members, wrote an elaborate report recommending a reorganization along the lines of the present system. The report was adopted almost unanimously, but our dear old University in a short time passed into hands that failed to keep its doors open to the youth of the State.

"In 1874 the University, which had for eight years been but a pathetic reminder of better days in North Carolina, was reached after by the strong arm of the State and, by Constitutional Amendment, was given back into the glad hands of its old-time friends. Dr. Battle, one of the new Trustees, was elected Secretary and Treasurer, and, on his recommendation, successful application was made to the General Assembly for $7,500 a year, interest on the Land Grant. With this amount as a beginning and, relying on the University sentiment in North Carolina, he began a movement to reopen the doors of our ancient seat of learning. But, its buildings were decaying, its beautiful campus was growing up in weeds, wreck and ruin were on every hand, and money must be had to put glass in the windows, stop the many leaks in the various roofs, and cut down the weeds in the campus. Confident that the generous heart of North Carolina still beat with love for the University, Dr. Battle appealed to its friends, who gladly answered his call for help, and gave him $18,000 with which to make the needed repairs.

"In September, 1875, the doors of the institution were once more thrown open; sixty-nine students were enrolled; and the University, with face uplifted toward the coming of better days, began its present career of service to the State.

"After the first year it was seen that a President was needed and Dr. Battle, upon urgent solicitation, abandoned a lucrative practice and reluctantly but loyally accepted the responsible post of labor and honor. His Presidency was most successful. Under his wise direction and co-operation the number of students steadily increased, the instruction in all the departments was widened and deepened, the departments of law, medicine, natural history and electrical engineering were added, the number of laboratories was increased from three to five, a gymnasium and memorial hall were built, several literary and scientific societies were organized, the University Railroad was completed, and many other needed improvements were made from time to time. From 1877 to 1885 he conducted the first Summer Normal School in connection with a university or college, which gave a strong impetus to the establishment of graded schools. He also procured from the General Assembly the first annual appropriation ever granted the University, largely increased since.

"In 1891 he resigned as President and was at once unanimously elected Alumni Professor of History, which position he has ever since most acceptably filled. His efficiency as President and Professor has been due not merely to his scholarly instincts and vast fund of knowledge, but also to his large and varied experience in the business world, where, in addition to the offices already referred to, he held the following: Director of the Insane Asylum, President of a successful life insurance company, President of the State Agricultural Society, one of the three founders of the Oakwood Cemetery in Raleigh, N. C., Director and one of the founders of the Citizens National Bank, Raleigh, N. C., Alderman of the city of Raleigh, and Chairman of the Committee of Aldermen which put the city finances in order after the confusion of 1868-'9, and President of the Chatham Railroad during the Civil War, which, as has been mentioned, was built for the purpose of getting coal for the Confederacy.

"As an author Dr. Battle has written many valuable historical papers, pamphlets, and addresses, among which may be mentioned the following: History of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, Trials and Judicial Proceedings of the New Testament, Life of General Jethro Sumner, Old Schools and Teachers of North Carolina, Otway Burns—Privateer and Legislator, etc.

"Every friend of the University and especially those students who have matriculated since the reorganization in 1875, will read with interest this short sketch of Dr. Battle's long and successful service for North Carolina. As a Trustee he has been ever faithful to the University; as President he successfully rescued it from ruin and decay, and brought it back to a life of wider usefulness and deeper scholarship than it had ever known before; and now in the seventy-fifth year of his age, buoyant as a youth, both mentally and physically, with a heart beating proudly with love for his native State, and an indomitable energy ever bent towards finding out the truth of history and exploiting the achievements of the fathers in State and Nation, studious, painstaking, and indefatigable, year after year he has enthusiastically led the flower of our youth to the most authentic sources of historic lore where opinions may be formed without the bias of sentiment or the blindness of prejudice. May many more years of honorable, useful and sympathetic service to his State and people be spared to him."

(Dr. Battle has recently resigned as active Professor of History in the University of North Carolina and has been chosen Emeritus Professor. He is one of the few college professors in the South who have been placed on the list of the Carnegie Pension Endowment. Dr. Battle is now busy reading the proof of his new book, the "History of the University of North Carolina, 1789-1868," and as soon as that comes from the press and Vol. 2, 1868, to the present, is finished, he will begin the Social and Political History of North Carolina from 1830, for which he has gathered material during his long and busy life. Nothing ever comes from his pen that is not wholesome, reliable and good.)

CHARLES LEE RAPER.

The sketch in this number of the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, on the "Finances of North Carolina Colonists," by Charles Lee Raper, will be read by historians and financiers of the State, especially by the latter, with genuine interest. The author has taken great care in the collection of facts relating to the financial and commercial system as used by the colonists, and he has brought into small compass this history during a hundred years.

Professor Raper was born in High Point, N. C., March 10, 1870. He was graduated from Trinity College, N. C., in 1902, with the degree of A.B. At this institution he won the prize for three successive years for highest standing in scholarship.

He received the degree of Ph.D. from Columbia University in 1901-'02, was elected instructor of Greek and Latin in Trinity College, 1902-'03; was elected Professor of Latin in Greensboro Female College, N. C., 1893-'98; received the Columbia University scholarship, 1898-'99; was Fellow in Columbia University, 1899-1900; was lecturer in European and American history in the Barnard College of Columbia University, 1900-'01.

Professor Raper has been head of the Department of Economics in the University of North Carolina since 1901; has created and developed the department, which now offers five courses (10 hours per week) running through the year, and has 175 Juniors and Seniors electing them: has collected for the University a good working library in economics, a branch of education so necessary to success.

Professor Raper was Associate Professor of History in the University of North Carolina, 1901-06. He has been the chief instrument in collecting the great "Ethel Carr Peacock Collection of North Carolina History." He takes great interest in the history of his native State, and has been an important member of the State Historical Commission since 1905.

He has received two small grants from the Carnegie Institution for research in the economic history of North Carolina.

The following is a list of his published works:

(a) The Church and Private Schools for North Carolina.

(b) North Carolina, a Royal Province: pp. 71. 1901; N. C. University Press.

(c) North Carolina, a study in English Government; pp. 260, 1904; Macmillan. This study was received with great favor in this country and in Europe.

(d) The Principles of Wealth and Welfare; pp. 336, 1906; Macmillan. This is being introduced as a text by the high schools, normals, and smaller colleges, in many places.

(e) The South and the Manufacture of Cotton, 1905; a paper in the South Atlantic Quarterly.

(f) Why North Carolina at first Refused to Ratify the Federal Constitution, 1906; a paper in the American Historical Association Reports.

(g) The economic Future of the Negro, 1906; a discussion, in the American Economic Association Publications.

Professor Raper is a versatile writer and has contributed a number of short papers to the local newspapers; has written a number of book reviews; has frequently been asked for lists of books and for opinions on economic questions, by students in the schools and colleges and by men of affairs in many of the Southern States; has given a number of popular lectures on economic problems before the Southern schools and colleges.

Professor Raper's travels in Europe and in the eastern part of the United States have so enlarged his observations on economic and social conditions that he is considered an excellent authority in this line of education.

The article written by him for the North Carolina Booklet (September, 1903), on "Social Life in Colonial North Carolina" throws much light on that period of our history, laying a foundation for a fuller account for the future historian who may rescue from old documents and other sources not yet attainable but which, through the North Carolina Historical Commission, will doubtless be found in the private letters and records of the old families of the State. The possessors of such documents should co-operate with the Commission in its efforts to preserve and render available such material.

Professor Raper's literary and historical work so far is an augury to his future usefulness and reputation.

WILLIS GRANDY BRIGGS.

Willis Grandy Briggs, writer of the article on "Joseph Gales, Raleigh's First Editor," in this issue of The Booklet, is the postmaster at Raleigh, N. C.

Mr. Briggs was born October 9, 1875, and comes from the family of Hunters and Norwoods, pioneer settlers in Wake county. His great grandfather, John Joyner Briggs, helped clear the forest for this fair city, built some of the first houses in Raleigh and died here at the advanced age of ninety-six years. He was one of the founders of the Baptist church here, an officer in the first local temperance society and a man of great piety. Together he and Joseph Gales served on the city patrol,—for the white males were then divided into squads of five for this duty.

His younger son, Thomas Henry Briggs, a building contractor and merchant, was successful in business and left a name the synonym of honesty. When his death occurred, August 4, 1886, the citizens held a mass meeting in the city hall and paid tribute to his memory. Though a modest quiet man, he was loved as has been given to few men to be loved here. His eldest son, Thomas Henry Briggs, second, father of the contributor to The Booklet, is one of Raleigh's best citizens, successful in business and a leader in Christian work.

Mr. Briggs' mother was formerly Miss Sarah Grandy, daughter of the late Willis Sawyer Grandy, who served in the Confederate army. She is a descendant of Caleb Grandy, Revolutionary soldier and first representative from Camden County; Colonel Peter Dauge, who was granted a large tract of land in 1794 "pursuant to an act of the General Assembly entitled an act for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Continental line and in consideration of the signal bravery and personal zeal of Peter Dauge, a lieutenant colonel in said line;" William Ferebee, (1722-1783) of Currituck; Colonel Samuel Ferebee (1761-1845), of the War of 1812, last survivor of Fayetteville convention, 1789, which ratified for North Carolina the Constitution of the United States, and Dr. Enoch D. Ferebee, who lived in the old brick home on Lynhaven Bay. Dr. Ferebee (1797-1876) offered his negroes their freedom, which they declined, many years before the Civil War. His sons were in the Confederate army.

Mr. Briggs graduated with honors in a class of thirty-one at Wake Forest College in 1896. He was awarded the senior oratorical medal given by Thomas Dixon, the author. In that year, before he was of age, he aligned himself with the Republican party because of his opposition to "free silver." When a newspaper was established here in January, 1897, to aid in the re-election of Senator J. C. Pritchard, he accepted the position of city editor and retired from the business in which he had begun. The same year he was made United States Jury Commissioner, the youngest man, it is said, appointed to this position. He was connected with Raleigh papers and correspondent at the State capital for outside dailies until appointed postmaster by President Roosevelt Sept. 1, 1906.

He has made a number of contributions to the press on historical subjects. His sketch of Joseph Gales is written with appreciation of this great editor's work and cannot fail to be read with interest.

One among the many contributions to the press, published in The Raleigh Times of July 27, 1901, entitled "The Guardians of the Peace," was a comprehensive review of the early government of the city of Raleigh from 1792 to 1901, with biographical sketches of many who helped to frame the laws for the peace, security, prosperity and happiness of this community. This paper was of unusual local interest and great historical value.

When Postmaster C. T. Bailey retired from office, in 1906, Mr. Briggs was tendered the place by the President, which position he has filled with credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the public; and more than this, he is the youngest man that has risen in this city to this most responsible position. Mr. Briggs is now in the prime of vigorous manhood, and with such character and qualifications as to command the regard and respect of the citizenship of his native city.

PATTIE WILLIAMS GEE.

Miss Pattie Williams Gee, the author of the "Ode to North Carolina," which enriches this number of The Booklet, is a native of North Carolina, born in Halifax County March 10, 1867. On the death of her mother and grandmother, at the age of five years she was transferred to the home of her maternal aunt, Mrs. Richard C. Badger, of Raleigh, N. C., under whose care she grew to womanhood. She was educated in a private school and at St. Mary's School in Raleigh. Early in life, feeling the necessity of earning her own living, she went to New York and studied at Packard's Business College, receiving a diploma in a partial course. Thereafter she was employed in various lines of clerical work. She reported the proceedings of a three days' session of the North Carolina Senate Committee with reference to a railroad commission. She worked for the Winston-Salem Land Improvement Co.; was employed by the Democratic State Executive Committee of North Carolina; worked for the Mercantile Association of the Carolinas at Wilmington, N. C.; for Samuel J. Tilden (nephew of the late Governor Tilden, of New York) in connection with his pharmaceutical factory at New Lebanon, N. Y.; for Orlando M. Harper, a commission merchant of New York; for the United States Book Company, and many affiliated companies then in the hands of a common receiver; for the law firm of Armoux, Ritch & Woodford, of 18 Wall Street; for Bowers & Sands (one of the oldest and best known law firms in New York City), and finally was private secretary for Mr. B. Aymar Sands, a member of the above firm. In 1905 she resigned this position and is now living at a cottage at Harsbrouck Heights, New Jersey. Having run the gamut of lucrative endeavor she has found her work, she has struck the keynote in unison with a poetic nature, and here in her own little cottage she is enjoying a well earned competency, pursuing the vocation of student, poetess and genealogist.

Her pen is ever busy "still pursuing, still achieving" thus giving the exceptionable promise of even more exquisite achievement.

In 1905 she issued a small volume of forty poems entitled "The Palace of the Heart," which attracted the attention of lovers of genuine poetry. It was critically noticed by many papers. Below is the appraisement of two which are worthy of reproduction. The Boston Transcript said: "The verses in this volume are largely of spiritual import reflecting a hopeful look upon life and revealing a depth of thought and a command of literary technique not usually found in collections of modern poetry."

The New York Times Saturday Review of Books, said: "The Palace of the Heart" is conspicuous chiefly for the strong, religious feeling, simple and fervent in its expression, that inspires the greater number of poems. An air of devotion suggesting Fra Angelica, or even Cimabue gives the archaic forms of such songs as these, 'The Sinner and the Violets,' 'Orate pro Me,' and 'Mother Love in After Years,' a grace of spirit altogether lovely." A Newark paper has this to say of another of her poems: "Unquestionably the finest poem in the volume is 'Mater Mea Carolina,' wherein the part played by North Carolina men in the Civil War is commemorated. Miss Gee is a native of that State and her poem is evidently inspired by a deep and abiding love for it. Her father fought in the Confederate army and her uncle, Major Sterling Gee, lost his life before Richmond. It is natural that she should write with feeling. She sings of the 'hundred thousand men and twenty thousand beardless boys' that Carolina sent forth to the fray, and her verse rings with exultant pride to be followed by a note of mourning. 'Mater Mea Carolina' is true poetry and whenever Miss Gee's subject inspires her as in this, her verse rises to real excellence. Elsewhere she needs the diligent practice in the technicalities of her art. But the thought is always sweet, and wholesome and winning."

Since she has given up clerical work she will overcome the slight faults in her verse and no doubt will win laurels fitting for a victor's crown.

Miss Gee is secretary to the Genealogical Mss. Company, 150 West Forty-sixth Street, New York, and is the inventor of the Medallion Genealogical Register which has been patented both in America and Europe.

GENEALOGY OF GEE FAMILY.

Pattie Williams Gee is the daughter of Dr. Charles James Gee and Tempie Williams (Austin) Gee his wife, of Halifax County, N. C. Dr. Gee was educated at the University of Virginia, was a graduate of Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and member of the Secession Convention of 1861. Served as surgeon in the Army of Northern Virginia of First North Carolina State troops.

Miss Gee is a granddaughter of Sterling Harwell Gee and Mary Temperance (Williams) his wife. She is a great granddaughter of Nevil Gee and wife Elizabeth (Harwell) Gee, and she is great-great-granddaughter of Charles Gee, of Virginia, who was a descendant of Thomas Gee, of Boston, Mass.

Miss Gee is ninth in descent from Richard Warren of the Mayflower; eighth in descent from Richard Warren II.; seventh in descent from Anne Warren and Dr. Thomas Little; sixth in descent from Bethia Little (sister of William Little, Colonial Chief Justice of North Carolina) and Thomas Barker. (The Barkers and Littles were old families from Massachusetts. They came to North Carolina in 1713. The Barker family have been traced back to the year 1200.) Fifth in descent from Thomas Barker II., who married first Perebee (Savage) Pugh, widow of Colonel Francis Pugh, of the Revolution, and second the distinguished Mrs. Penelope (Pagett) Craven, president of the famous "Edenton Tea Party of 1774." There were no children by this second marriage. Mr. Barker was a lawyer of considerable distinction, was one of the committee appointed to revise the laws in force in the colony for adoption by the newly formed State.

Miss Gee's descent from Thomas Barker and his first wife Ferebe (Savage) Pugh is interesting as she is connected by marriage to Penelope Barker the second wife of Thomas and the lady so famous as head of the Anti-Tea Drinking Society of Edenton, to which reference is made in this article. It may be of interest to the readers of The Booklet to know that Miss Susan Barker Willard, a descendant of the Barkers, lives at Hingham, Massachusetts. This lady has in her possession many letters from Penelope Barker dated July 22, 1788, Edenton, N. C. Pertinent to the above is the intention of the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution to place a tablet at the capitol of North Carolina at an early day, in honor of those patriotic women. When all facts relating to that event will be fully brought forth and these valuable letters may be loaned for the occasion.

GENEALOGY OF WILLIAMS ANCESTRY.

Miss Gee is sixth in descent from Samuel Williams and Elizabeth (Alston) his wife (see will of W. W., first, dated 1704, Secretary of State's office, Raleigh, N. C.) married about 1725 to 1728. Fifth descent from Colonel William Williams and Mrs. Elizabeth (Whitmel) Blount his wife; married 1746. Fourth descent from General William Williams and Elizabeth Williams (second wife), daughter of Capt. Solomon and Tempie (Boddie) Williams. Third descent from Tempie Williams and Colonel Andrew Joyner, Lieutenant Colonel First Regiment of North Carolina, organized August, 1814. Second descent from Martha Williams Joyner who married first Archibald Alexander Austin, and second to Colonel Frank P. Haywood. First in descent from Tempie Williams (Austin) and Dr. Charles James Gee. Miss Gee is also descended from John Haywood Colonial Treasurer, etc. (—1757) and his wife Mary Lovat.

She is also descended from Rev. Thomas Burges, a clergyman and a pioneer of the Church of England in the colony.

She is also descended from Archibald Alexander Austin and Martha Williams (Joyner) his wife.

A rather interesting descent is that from Robert Alexander who belonged to the clan of McAlexander or McAlister, which is the same. He was a graduate of the University of Dublin and taught the first classical school west of the mountains of Virginia of which the present Washington and Lee University is the lineal descendant. Dr. Archibald Alexander, the first professor of theology at Princeton and the author of many religious works, was a descendant of his brother. This family has been noted for its scholarly attainments for many generations.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Sixth Volume began in July, 1906.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VII. JANUARY, 1908 No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS
IN NORTH CAROLINA
HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

Page

General Robert Howe - - - - - - - - 165
By Hon. John D. Bellamy

Early Relations of North Carolina and the West - - 193
By William K. Boyd

Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear - - - - - - - - - 210
By W. B. McKoy

Biographical Sketches - - - - - - - 236
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

The BOOKLET will be issued QUARTERLY by the NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY OF THE DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, beginning July, 1907. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME VII.

1. North Carolina in the French and Indian War, Colonel Alfred Moore Waddell
2. Colonial Newspapers, ... Dr. Charles Lee Smith
3. Finances of the North Carolina Colonists, Dr. Charles Lee Raper
4. Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry, Judge James C. MacRae
5. Schools and Education in Colonial Times, . Mr. Charles L. Coon
6. Joseph Gales, ... Mr. Willis G. Briggs
7. General Robert Howe, ... Hon. John D. Bellamy
8. The Resolution of April 12, 1776, . Prof. R. D. W. Connor
9. Our First State Constitution . . . . Dr. E. W. Sikes
10. Permanent Settlement of the Lower Cape Fear, (1725-1735) Mr. W. B. McKoy
11. Colonial Edenton, . . Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D.
12. The Quakers of Perquimans, . . Miss Rebecca Albertson

The BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

The BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscription to the BOOKLET for Vol. VII, are requested to give notice at once.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,
"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"
Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VII. JANUARY, 1908. No. 3

NORTH CAROLINA STATE LIBRARY

The NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MISS LOUISE PITTINGER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VII JANUARY, 1908 No. 3

GENERAL ROBERT HOWE*

BY HON. JOHN D. BELLAMY.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives:—During the present session of this Congress I introduced a bill (H. R. 17356) for the erection of an equestrian statue at Wilmington, N. C., to the memory of Maj. Gen. Robert Howe, of the American Revolution. I can not expect, in the closing hours of this session, when the congested state of the Calendar will preclude the consideration of many important measures, which are entitled to precedence, to secure the adoption of this resolution, but I do hope to bring to the attention of the country many of the incidents of the life and character of this remarkable man, in the hope that the next Congress will be possessed of sufficient patriotism to pass it.

In this centennial era, when we are commemorating the important events which have made this Government a great and powerful nation and enabled it to attain a century's growth, we should not alone seek to celebrate its material advancement, but should at least endeavor to perpetuate in some enduring form the memories of the great men whose wisdom and valor contributed so powerfully toward making the American Revolution successful, and thereby establishing the first great representative government that has ever been vouchsafed to mankind.

*This Address was delivered by Mr. Bellamy before the 57th Congress.

Carlyle has truly said that hero worship exists forever and everywhere; not loyalty alone; it extends from divine admiration to the lowest practical regions of life, and yet hero worship has never been a salient feature in the character of the average American citizen. A government whose basic principles are liberty and equality, and whose powers are not derived by divine inheritance and centered in a single individual, but emanate from the free consent of the people governed, has in it dogmas which tend to lessen reverence, yet it can never suppress the natural and spontaneous feeling of veneration for that which is truly great, for the true hero, be he philosopher, poet, priest, man of letters, warrior, or ruler.

There has always existed among all people and in all ages a special admiration for the warrior whose deeds of daring have worked good for his people, and the American people form no exception to this universal rule. The fame of Washington, the general, embalmed forever in the hearts of his countrymen, has been further perpetuated in statues of bronze and marble, that future generations may emulate his virtues and be inspired by his patriotic example. But few indeed of the great generals who aided Washington by their counsel, who shared his confidence, and who won glory and renown on many of the fields of battle which secured our independence, have been honored by their countrymen. Major-Generals Howe, Baron Steuben, Lincoln, Schuyler, and others performed their part in the great struggle equally with Washington, and achieved renown and fame excelled only by their leader. Some of them were leaders in the movement originating and precipitating the Revolution, and all prominent in consummating it with their sword and their talent. The Government, then an experiment, has become a Government respected and honored as the equal of the oldest and most permanent and stable governments of the world.

It is but just and proper then that these great generals should at least be remembered by a posterity which has reaped untold blessings from their patriotic efforts. It is with the view of rescuing from the oblivion into which it has fallen the life and services of one who possessed more eminently, if possible, the confidence of General Washington than any of his compeers that your speaker has offered this resolution to have Congress erect a monument to his memory in the city of Wilmington, near which he was born and lies buried.

Among the brilliant men of the Revolutionary period who have not been awarded the praise to which their patriotic services entitle them stands Maj. Gen. Robert Howe, of Brunswick, N. C. Of his early history little is preserved save that which is handed down by tradition in the vicinity of his birth. He was born in the precinct of Clarendon in the year 1732 in the present limits of Brunswick County, N. C. He was the son of Job Howe, a well-educated, influential, and wealthy rice planter, who resided at his palatial home on the Cape Fear River and spent his summers on the coast near the city of Wilmington. Like the Southern gentleman of that day, and for generations afterwards, this home was the seat of hospitality and refinement, and in this atmosphere of culture Robert Howe was partially reared. His grandfather had come over to America with the Yeamans colony in 1665, which was planted first on Old Town Creek, but afterwards moved to Charleston, S. C. His father, Job Howe, came to the Cape Fear region from Charleston with Col. Maurice Moore, his kinsman, who assumed charge of the lands of Sir John Yeamans abandoned in 1690.

Robert Howe was connected by blood and marriage with the best families in North and South Carolina. He was the lineal descendant of Sir John Yeamans, and was the grandson of Mary Moore, the daughter of James Moore, the governor of the two Carolinas in 1670. At an early age, as was the custom in those days among gentlemen of wealth, Robert was sent by his father to England, and there had the advantage of the social life of the best London circles, and received the benefits of a solid and refined English education. He spent a good number of years in Europe, and did not return until a short time previous to his father's death, which occurred at his summer home on the coast in the year 1748. It appears from the will of his father, recorded in New Hanover County, that Robert had two brothers and two sisters, and although they lived in that vicinity, on fine plantations devised to each, yet in the early part of this century the name of Howe became entirely extinct, and is no longer found except occasionally among a few old family servants, negroes, who to-day alone retain the name.

In 1763 we find Robert Howe settled on his rice plantation at the mouth of Old Town Creek, the site of the first English settlement under Sir John Yeamans. He lived, like his father, in affluence, with his broad acres around him, his slaves, his library well stored with the best books of the day, which was always an indispensable requisite to the well-furnished home of the southern country gentleman. At that day the English Government had a well-fortified fort at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, known then and ever afterwards as Fort Johnston. Robert had an ambition to lead a military life. The royal Governor Tryon had partaken of his hospitality and had formed an attachment for him. A vacancy occurring in the position of commandant of the fort, he was appointed to it by the governor. In a letter dated July 29, 1766, at Old Brunswick, addressed to the Right Hon. Lord Burrington, secretary of war, Governor Tryon says:

"Capt. John Dalrymple, commandant of Fort Johnston, in this province, died the 13th instant in said fort. As the above command was from His Majesty, I have issued a new one to Robert Howe, a gentleman of this province, to succeed him." * * *

This is the first act of a public nature recorded of Robert Howe, and it was doubtless this appointment and the exercise of its duties that gave him a taste for the military life he was afterwards to lead. He held the position for a few years and was succeeded by John Abraham Collett. It was about this time that Robert met, wooed, and won the heart and hand of Sarah Grange, the daughter of Thomas Grange, a respectable planter on the Upper Cape Fear River, and they were afterwards married; and although they lived happily together for a number of years, they became, for some reason, eventually estranged and were afterwards peaceably separated, as appears from a deed providing for her support, recorded in the year 1772. They were never reunited.

In January, 1772, Robert Howe entered political life. He offered himself as a candidate from Brunswick County for the general assembly of the province, which was to meet that year in November, and was duly elected by the people. Josiah Martin was then governor of the province, having about two years previously succeeded Governor Tryon. Governor Martin was not so suave as Tryon, and was not generally popular. He was a man of a firm and obstinate disposition, and by his indomitable will doubtless widened the breach and precipitated the conflict which was soon to follow between the people and the Crown. The royal governors in colonial times were invested with the most absolute and arbitrary powers. They had entire control over nearly all appointments to office and almost as much power in the regulation of the elections themselves, and had also the right to convene, prorogue, and dissolve the assemblies at pleasure. Soon after the assembly met and organized Robert Howe introduced a resolution to regulate the elections and to have triennial meetings of the legislature. This bill was aimed at the curtailment of the governor's prerogatives, and was defeated through the instrumentality of the governor and his council, and a short time afterwards the governor dissolved the assembly. But by the resolution itself was exhibited a bold and fearless spirit in its author, which characterized him through life and was a faculty so necessary to fit him for the important part he was soon to play in the history of that momentous period.

A like spirit of opposition to the encroachments of the Crown and its officers had begun to prevail in the other colonies. Josiah Quincy, of Massachusetts, was prominent as a leader in the movement. He set out for a voyage through the Southern colonies for the purpose of having a conference with the Whig leaders. While on this expedition, on the 29th of March, 1773, Quincy paid a visit to Cornelius Harnett at Hilton, in the old mansion formerly standing there. Of this visit tradition informs us with some details. It is said that Mr. Quincy had no previous acquaintance with Harnett. On arriving at Harnett's residence he asked to be accommodated with a night's lodging, which was cordially granted him by his hospitable host. After supper, thinking Harnett might be a Tory, and it would be unsafe to advert to any political topic, Quincy specially avoided it, but in the course of the conversation, Harnett ascertaining in some way the cause of Quincy's appearance in the South, immediately began to express his views very positively and boldly concerning the tyrranical and oppressive course of the King toward his colonies. It is said that Quincy was so greatly surprised at finding Harnett so much in accord with his own views that he could not withstand embracing him upon discovering such a kindred spirit.

The whole night was spent in conversation, and the next morning, upon Harnett saying to Quincy—which Quincy already knew—that in the immdeiate vicinity was a bold, intelligent, and determined man in full sympathy with their own views, Robert Howe, he was sent for and repaired thither without delay; and then and there, at Hilton, on the Cape Fear River, these three men, closeted together in the deepest of deliberation, concocted and agreed upon the scheme for the American Revolution. While on this journey Mr. Quincy kept a diary of the events of the day, and it is quite interesting to note the estimate of Howe by this sagacious and discerning patriot and of the incidents of this visit. In Quincy's Memoirs he records:

"March 26, 1773.—Spent most of the day in public and private conversation with Col. Robert Howe, a leader and active member of the general assembly. Fine natural parts, great feeling, pure and elegant diction, with much persuasive eloquence, a Crown officer with a lucrative post, a staunch Whig and colonist. I received much information in provincial politics and great pleasure from his relation. Zealous in the cause of America, he relished the proposed Continental correspondence, promised to promote it, and write to me by the first opportunity.

"March 28.—Yesterday was a most delightful day. Fort Johnston is as delightful a situation. The commander, Col. Robert Howe, is a happy compound of the man of sense and sentiment with the man of the world, the sword, and the senate.

"March 30.—Spent the night at Mr. Harnett's. Robert Howe, Harnett, and myself made the social triumvirate of the evening. The plan of Continental correspondence highly relished, much wished for, and resolved upon as proper to be pursued."

Well might Hilton be termed the birthplace and cradle of American liberty, as it was so termed by Vice-President Henry Wilson, in a speech from the portico of this building, delivered in 1872. On departing from the Cape Fear region, Quincy bade his friend Howe adieu, each hoping to meet again and pledging each other to urge on the cause of independence, Captain Howe giving to Mr. Quincy a letter of introduction to Governor Tryon, who had then become governor of New York.

The legistlature of 1772 was dissolved by Governor Martin in the early spring, as he desired to have members elected who would support his administration. But, notwithstanding the opposition fomented by the governor against him, Robert Howe was again returned to the assembly, which met the same year at New Bern on December 4th. At this session the speaker of the House of Commons laid before that body letters from several provinces requesting the appointment of a committee to inquire into the encroachments of England upon the liberties of the American people. The house passed a resolution—

"That such example was worthy of imitation by which means communication and concert would be established among the colonies, and that they will at all times be ready to exert their efforts to preserve and defend their rights."

The committee was appointed, and after the Speaker's name, as chairman, stands next in order the names of Robert Howe and Cornelius Harnett. It was chiefly through the influence and exertion of these two men that this committee was chosen, and thus was recorded the first act of a legislative character that led to the revolution.

During this session the House had passed an act prohibiting the sheriffs from collecting that portion of the poll tax devoted to the payment of the public debt. The governor commanded the sheriffs to enforce the collection, and a direct clash arose between the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The judicial branch was silent, as the courts were closed. The governor forbade the further meeting of the assembly. Whereupon among the Whig leaders it was decided to call a general congress to meet at New Bern August 20, 1774.

The governor called upon the council to concert measures to prevent the election of members as delegates to this meeting of the congress, but the people were thoroughly excited, and in spite of the governor's strenuous efforts to the contrary the congress assembled at New Bern on the 25th of August, pursuant to the call. Among the delegates sent was Robert Howe, of Brunswick County, and his learning and eloquence were felt in this body. Among the many important resolutions passed were those claiming the right of a citizen to trial by a jury of his vicinage, and denounced the sending of Americans to England for trial in criminal cases, and that no subject should be taxed without representation. They approved of the conduct of the people of Massachusetts, and resolved not to import tea or any British manufacture, or export their own products to Great Britain unless their grievances were redressed. On the 11th of February, 1775, Colonel Harvey called another congress to meet at New Bern on the 3d of April. As a delegate to this congress and also to the general assembly, which was to meet at the same time, Robert Howe was again elected from Brunswick County.

Governor Martin issued his proclamation against the assembling of this congress, and finding his voice unheeded, on the morning of the meeting of the assembly he issued another proclamation commanding them to desist from the proposed convention. But men determined on the attainment of the liberty for which they were striving would brook no opposition, and the convention was held in the very face of the governor. Governor Martin still persevered in his course. On the meeting of the assembly he went before that body and addressed them at length. He told them that he looked with horror on the proceedings of some of the colonies; that the meetings and committees had injured the rights of the Crown and insulted its officers; that they were in duty bound to prevent the meeting of the congress; that it should be the care of the assembly to lead back the people to their allegiance; that Parliament was at that very time deliberating for the good of America, and they should await the result.

The assembly did not like the tone of the governor's address and immediately proceeded to the appointment of a committee to reply to it. Robert Howe, for his peculiar fitness, was selected as its chairman. On the 7th of April Robert Howe wrote and reported an address which, as a justification for the action of his people, as well as a refutation of the charges of the governor, stamps him as a clear, forcible and logical writer, than whom the colonies had no superior. Captain Howe said:

That they contemplated with horror the condition of America, involved in difficulties and distressed by invasions of ancient rights and immunities. In this way the colonies had been driven to measures which, however extraordinary, were still warranted by necessity. The appointment of committees in counties and towns had been adopted to resist unconstitutional encroachments, and the assembly was convinced that no step had been taken in that direction which was not salutary and proper. It was not to be controverted that all British subjects had the right of assembling and petitioning for a redress of grievances, and any attempt to deny or abridge this privilege was in direct conflict with the constitution. It was the least of their desires to prevent the objects and session of the provincial congress, then in session, or to join his excellency in his injurious epithets in its disparagement.

They further stated:

That they would gladly aid in the establishment of a proper court system, but declined any provisions for Fort Johnston.

This reply was so very distasteful to the governor that the next day he dissolved the assembly, and this was the last held under royal auspices in North Carolina.

Captain Howe returned to his home, and as the clouds of war were gathering thick and lowering over his country he immediately began to prepare for action. Having no trained soldiers he employed himself drilling the people and training them to arms. While thus engaged the governor issued a violent proclamation at Fort Johnston on the 16th June, 1775, against the people of the colony. A meeting of the district committee of safety was held at the court-house in Wilmington on the 20th June, with delegates present from Brunswick, Bladen, Onslow, Duplin, and New Hanover counties. Robert Howe appeared as a member from Brunswick.

Immediately a committee was appointed, with Robert Howe as chairman, to answer the proclamation which was ordered to be published. Captain Howe prepared the address, which, like his former addresses, was a masterly production. He said among other things:

"In order to prevent the pernicious influence of the said proclamation, we do unanimously resolve, that in our opinion his excellency Josiah Martin, Esq., hath by the said proclamation, and by the whole tenor of his conduct since these unhappy disputes between Great Britain and the colonies, discovered himself to be an enemy to the happiness of this colony in particular, and to the freedom, rights, and privileges of America in general. And in reply to Lord North's resolution, introduced into Parliament, concerning America, which his excellency alluded to, 'Resolved, That this was a low, base, flagitious, and wicked attempt to entrap America into slavery.

and which they ought to reject with contempt which it deserves.' "

News of the battle of Lexington and Bunker Hill had now reached the Cape Fear, and the people began to prepare with increased exertions for the emergency. It became apparent that as Fort Johnston was the key to the entire Cape Fear country it must be held by the colonies, and on the 18th of May, after due preparation, Col. John Ashe, in command of a body of troops, among whom was Captain Howe, attacked, set fire to, and partially burned Fort Johnston, right under the English fleet then in the harbor.

About this time, also, another meeting of congress was called for August 21, 1775, at Hillsboro. Thither Robert Howe again went as the chosen delegate from Brunswick County. The meeting of this congress was alike denounced by Governor Martin from his place of refuge on a British man-of-war. But the congress, to his denunciation, voted to bear their part of the expense of a Continental army, and organized one of their own by providing for the immediate formation of two regiments of 500 men each, and appointed James Moore as colonel of the first and Robert Howe as colonel of the second regiment. By this same congress, on September 8, Colonel Howe was also appointed one of a committee, with William Hooper as chairman, to prepare an address to the people of the British Empire, declaring the views of the body as to the existing state of affairs. This was the last act of a civil nature in which Colonel Howe was engaged until the close of that great struggle which was to terminate in the establishment of the greatest constitutional republic the world has ever seen.

Colonel Howe, as we have seen, was prominent in every step which led to the Revolution. He was ever ready, with his broad and liberal views, to advance the cause of his country. He had with his pen, by his persuasive eloquence on the hustings, and his debates in the legislative halls, as well as his votes, shown himself a true statesman, born as it were for the occasion. But it is not for us to regard him alone as a statesman, for he was great as a soldier. No sooner had the Hillsboro congress adjourned than Colonel Howe began to form his regiment, and continued training his soldiers. In this he was engaged when he was informed of the efforts of Lord Dunmore to raise an army at Norfolk, and of his emissaries to incite an insurrection among the slaves in the Albemarle region of North Carolina. He immediately, in December, 1775, proceeded with his regiment to Norfolk to engage the British and to rescue his people from the threatened insurrection. He arrived at Norfolk on the 11th of December, two days after the skirmish between Lord Dunmore and the Virginia troops at Great Bridge, but found that Lord Dunmore had only withdrawn to Norfolk and was then in possession of the town. Colonel Howe, being the officer of highest rank, assumed command of the American troops, and, an engagement ensuing, drove Lord Dunmore and his entire force from the country, and on the 14th of December took possession of the city.

Lord Dunmore on retreating betook himself to the British fleet, and on January 1, 1776, attempted to recapture the city. He opened a severe bombardment on the town from the fleet, and with such terrible results that nine-tenths of all the houses were reduced to ashes, and the fire raged for several weeks. But Colonel Howe successfully repelled the assault, and Lord Dunmore retired from the country.

At this point Colonel Howe remained until after the 1st of March, when, for his gallantry and good conduct, he was promoted by the Continental Congress to the rank of brigadier-general in the Continental Army and ordered to the Southern Department, under Major-General Charles Lee.

On May 4, 1776, the State Congress, through its president, addressed General Howe, and returned to him a vote of thanks "for his manly, generous, and war-like conduct in these unhappy times, and more especially for the reputation our troops acquired under his command." General Howe thus endeared himself to his own countrymen, but had become exceedingly obnoxious to the British.

So great was this aversion that on the 5th day of May, 1776, Sir Henry Clinton, then in command, issued a proclamation against committees and congresses, and invited the people to return to the royal standard, and offered and promised pardon to all the people of North Carolina who would submit, "except Robert Howe and Cornelius Harnett." On the 12th of the same month Cornwallis, sent by Sir Henry Clinton, with 900 men ravaged and burned General Howe's plantation at Old Town Creek and took away a few bullocks and a number of slaves. Major-General Charles Lee was now on his way to take charge of the military affairs in the South. While in North Carolina he was joined by General Howe and the two North Carolina regiments under Col. James Moore and Alex. Martin, the latter appointed to succeed General Howe, promoted.

These two regiments arrived at Charleston on June 11, 1776, and these, under the command of General Howe, participated in the brilliant victories of Forts Sullivan and Moultrie, which occurred on the 28th of June. At this battle the Americans had only one-tenth as many guns as were brought to bear on them, and yet they won the day. Of the soldiers General Lee said: "No men ever behaved better or ever could behave better." Here the North Carolina troops fought with conspicuous bravery and added new laurels to their own fame and that of their commander.

General Lee, in a report of the battle made to Edmond Pendleton, of the Virginia convention, said:

NORTH CAROLINA STATE LIBRARY

"I know not which troops I have the greatest reason to be pleased with, Muhlenberg's Virginians, or the North Carolina troops. They are both equally alert, zealous, and spirited."

During the month of July, General Lee, with General Howe and Colonel Moultrie, left Charleston for an expedition against Florida, but when they arrived at Savannah General Lee was recalled by General Washington, and in October following Howe was placed in command of the southern department, with headquarters at Charleston. In retaliation for incursions from Florida, General Howe, at the head of 2,000 Americans, militia from North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, attempted the capture of St. Augustine. He met with little opposition before he reached the St. Mary's River, where the British had erected a fort called Tonyn, in compliment to the governor of the province. On the approach of Howe they destroyed the fort and, after some slight skirmishing, retreated toward St. Augustine. But the Americans were driven back from Florida by a plague of fever which swept away nearly one-fourth of their number and rendered their retreat absolutely necessary.

It was while at Charleston that occurred the dispute between Colonel Gadsden and General Howe, which led to the duel between them on the 20th of August, 1778. As the duel was an episode in his life of so remarkable a character and our historians have been so inaccurate in their references to it, I deem it of so much interest as to here give a detailed statement of it, taken from an account of the duel in The South Carolinian and American Gazette, dated September 3, 1778, three or four days after its occurrence:

The dispute arose out of a conflict of authority between the States and the Continental Congress—a question of conflict of authority which agitated and seriously affected the Confederacy in the late civil war, and which was never clearly and permanently settled in the United States between the States and the General Government until the adoption of the Constitution:

"On the 29th October, 1776, General Howe published in his orders the promotion of Colonels Gadsden and Moultrie, and assigned them to their respective commands.

"On the 23d of August, 1777, General Gadsden resigned his command into the hands of General Howe. General Howe sent the resignation to Congress with a letter explaining it, and Congress, accepting it without comment, wounded Colonel Gadsden's feelings. To this letter Colonel Gadsden replied in an open letter to Congress. This letter was the cause of the duel. General Howe says that about four months before the date of his letter, that is, about the 1st of May, after he had been about six months in undisputed command of the post, General Gadsden desired to know by what right he commanded, and claimed that he himself was the natural commander in South Carolina. General Howe explained to him his right, and showed the error into which General Gadsden had fallen respecting claims of right. General Howe replied that as he had no doubt respecting his own right he would express none, but if the other desired it he would communicate those doubts to Congress as his, and this was assented to.

"At a subsequent interview a few days afterwards General Howe was led to believe that General Gadsden was now satisfied as to his right, and the letter was not written. One day in August they met at the house of President Lowndes, and General Gadsden inquired whether the letter had been written as agreed, and on General Howe replying in the negative, and giving his reasons for not having done so, General Gadsden said the matter should be brought before the South Carolina assembly. Shortly afterwards a motion was made by William Henry Drayton inquiring into the nature of General Howe's command in that State. This motion was promptly rejected, and General Gadsden immediately resigned his commission into General Howe's hands. General Gadsden gave an explanation of the matter and says:

" 'On the 11th of August I received by the General's aid-de camp a long expostulatory letter, with a demand for satisfaction at the close unless I made him reparation for the expressions I had made use of relative to him in my letter of the 4th of July. I wrote for an answer next morning that I was ready to give him any satisfaction he thought proper, when and where he pleased; that I thought him the aggressor in having wrote such an unnecessary detail of that matter in it, omitting my principal objection, and especially for not letting me, whom it so nearly concerned, have a copy of it; and that he had nobody to blame but himself; that I never saw his detail, which had such immediate effect, for ten months after the date of it.

" 'Three letters from him and two from me passed before the matter came to a point. In his he gave me assurance that he did not mean in anything he said to reflect upon or injure me, and as to the breach of promise I accused him of he declared he really understood me as he had set forth; so that if there was a fault, his understanding and not his integrity was to blame; and had he imagined I wished to see his letter he should most cheerfully have sent it to me; that he had not the least wish to conceal it from me. My friends, Colonels Elliott and Horry, who were the only ones who had the least hint of the affair from me, seemed to think this a great occasion, and required some notice or apology on my side, and our friend, Colonel Pinckney, who was the General's second, appeared to be of the same opinion. But I, looking upon it only as personal and private to me, and whereas the expressions of me he particularly referred to related to the manner of a public act, I determined to make no concessions, but to meet him in any manner he pleased.'

"Accordingly on the 30th of August the hostile meeting took place, and the following account given of it: 'After the generals met and ourteously saluted eah other, General Howe desired his second to acquaint his friends, in case he should fall, that it was his earnest request that they should not prosecute General Gadsden beyond the formality of a trial, and General Gadsden desired both the seconds to acquaint his friend in case he should fall, that he entirely forgave General Howe and earnestly begged them not to prosecute him, and he particularly enjoined Colonel Pinckney to charge his son not to intermeddle in the affair at all. General Howe's second then stepped off the distance then fixed upon by him and Colonel Elliott—18 short paces—and the generals being placed, Colonel Elliott said:

" 'Gentlemen, we have marked out your distance, leaving you to act as you please, not doubting but that, as this is an affair of honor, you will act consequently with the strictest rules of honor.' General Howe then said to General Gadsden, 'Fire, sir.' General Gadsden said, 'Do you fire first?' General Howe replied, 'We will both fire together.' General Gadsden made no answer, but both presented. There was a pause for a few seconds, and General Howe said with a smile, 'Why will not you fire, General Gadsden?' General Gadsden replied, 'You brought me out, General Howe, to this ball play and ought to begin the entertainment.' General Howe fired and missed. General Gadsden after a short interval fired his pistol over his left arm, about at right angles from General Howe, and then called out to General Howe to fire again. General Howe smiled, and at the same time dropping his hands with his pistol in it said, 'No, General Gadsden, I can not after this.'

"General Gadsden's second said he was glad to see so much honor in the generals; that he did not think General Gadsden could have made a handsomer apology or General Howe have shown a higher sense of honor than in acting as he had done. Then General Gadsden went up to him and said, 'Now, General Howe, I will mention to you what I could not before, as my letter was a public one, and the words contained in it seemed to me proper, and as yours was a private one, the parts in it which, in the opinion of my friends, left an opening for an apology I could not take notice of; but I told my friends in the carriage before I came on the ground that I intended to receive your fire, and though I may, perhaps, talk this matter over again, I assure you I shall never in future make use of any harsh expressions concerning you.' General Howe said that it was very agreeable to him that the matter terminated in this way, and that he was happy that he had missed him. General Gadsden's second said he hoped that the difference that had caused this duel might now subside and be left on that spot. The generals, then, in token of this reconciliation shook hands and parted."

We rarely see such chivalry displayed in the duel; and although it is intended for the healing of wounded honor among gentlemen, yet as a practice to be condemned, if it must be resorted to, no finer example could be given of what ought to be observed as the rules of the code. General Gadsden was wrong in this matter, but, as it is said, "he was gloriously wrong," and General Howe was completely vindicated.

The unfortunate, but gifted Major André, of the British army, who was afterwards executed as a spy, wrote a humorous account of this duel in eighteen stanzas, set to the tune of Yankee Doodle, which was published as one of the humors of that day. It is thus given:

"ON THE AFFAIR BETWEEN THE REBEL GENERALS HOWE AND GADSDEN.

"Charleston, S. C., September 1, 1778.

"We are favored with the following authentic account of the affair of honor which happened on the 13th of August, 1778. Eleven o'clock was the hour appointed for Generals H. and G. to meet. Accordingly, about ten minutes before eleven—but hold! It is too good a story to be told in simple prose.

It was on Mr. Percy's land,
At Squire Rugeley's corner,
Great H. and G. met, sword in hand,
Upon a point of honor.

Chorus: Yankee doodle, doodle doo, etc.

G. went before with Colonel E.,
Together in a carriage;
On horseback followed H. and P.
As if to steal a marriage.

On chosen ground they now alight,
For battle duly harnessed;
A shady place, and out of sight,
It shew'd they were in earnest.

They met, and in the usual way
With hat in hand saluted;
Which was, no doubt, to show how they Like gentlemen disputed.

And then they both together made
This honest declaration,
That they came there, by honor led,
And not by inclination.

That if they fought, 'twas not because
Of rancour, spite, or passion;
But only to obey the laws
Of custom and the fashion.

The pistols then, before their eyes
Were fairly primed and loaded;
H. wished, and so did G. likewise,
The customs were exploded.

But as they now had gone so far
In such a bloody business,
For action straight they both prepare
With mutual forgiveness.

But lest their courage should exceed
The bounds of moderation,
Between the seconds 'twas agreed
To fix them each a station.

The distance stepp'd by Colonel P.
Was only eight short spaces;
"Now, gentlemen," says Colonel E.,
"Be sure to keep your places."

Quoth H. to G., "Sir, please to fire";
Quoth G., "No, pray begin, sir";
And truly we must needs admire
The temper they were in, sir.

"We'll fire both at once," said H.;
And so they both presented;
No answer was returned by G.,
But silence, sir, consented.

They paused awhile, these gallant foes,
By turns politely grinning:
'Till, after many cons and pros,
H. made a brisk beginning.

H. missed his mark, but not his aim;
The shot was well directed.
It saved them both from hurt and shame;
What more could be expected?

Then G., to show he meant no harm,
But hated jars and jangles,
His pistol fired across his arm
From H., almost at angles.

H. now was called upon by G.
To fire another shot, sir;
He smiled and, "After that," quoth he,
"No, truly I can not, sir."

Such honor did they both display
They highly were commended;
And thus, in short, this gallant fray
Without mischance was ended.

No fresh dispute, we may suppose,
Will e'er by them be started;
And now the chiefs, no longer foes,
Shook hands, and so they parted.

Chorus: Yankee doodle, doodle doo, etc.

After this encounter and toward the close of December, 1778, we find General Howe at Savannah, Ga., sent by General Washington to command the defenses around that town, to prevent the threatened attack of the British. On arriving he immediately bestowed as much labor on the fortification as he could command men and means to give. But Governor Houston, of Georgia, denied his right to command at that post, as the governor himself claimed to be commander-in-chief and entitled to precedence of rank on Georgia soil. But General Howe as commander of the continental forces under Washington could not concede this to the State authorities. He deemed it his duty to point out to the legislature of Georgia and to the governor, in the strongest expressions of which he was master, the want of proper defenses, and asked for men to throw up the fortifications.

But owing to this friction between Governor Houston and General Howe over the precedence to command the legislature refused to take any action whatever. Governor Houston still continued to dispute his right to command; and when the British forces sailed in the river Savannah was without means of defense. General Howe, having under him only about 900 men, without fortifications, was unable to prevent the landing of the British force, nearly four times as large, with heavy guns and ammunition, and consisting of thirty-five hundred men, under Colonel Campbell, from New York, and a like number under General Prevost, from St. Augustine, among whom was the regiment of royalists, chiefly from North Carolina, under the command of Col. John Hamilton, of Halifax.

The North Carolina Continentals here fought face to face against their brothers, the Loyalists. A battle took place, with great loss of life, the Continental troops being attacked both in the flank and front by so great an excess in numbers that, notwithstanding the bravery and gallantry with which the Continentals fought, they were driven from their position, and the British carried the day. The valor and patriotism of the Americans could not prevail over the immense number of the British. General Howe incurred here the resentment of Governor Houston over this dispute as to whether the State or Continental authorities had the right to control and direct the management of the affairs of war, but this disaster showed how necessary it was to concede this power to the Continental Congress, as it was through the want of the cooperation of Governor Houston, or, rather, his opposition, coupled with the paucity of numbers of the Americans, that led to the defeat at Savannah. But the whole conduct of the battle showed in General Howe the highest marks of generalship.

After this, at the instance of Governor Houston, a court-martial, presided over by Maj. Gen. Baron Steuben as president, with Brigadier-Generals Knox and others, to investigate the conduct of General Howe on the charges of having sacrificed the Georgia troops and leaving the country exposed, but the court held him not guilty, and, in the language of the Court, "We do acquit him of both charges with the highest honor." In the early part of the year 1779, General Howe was transferred to the North, and on the 15th of July was ordered against Verplanck's Point, subsequently to Ridgefield. He also cooperated with General Wayne in his attack on Stony Point on the Hudson.

About this time the city of New York was evacuated by the Americans, and the British under Sir Henry Clinton took possession. The American Army withdrew into the interior of the State. The position of West Point, on the Hudson, was considered by General Washington as the key to the Army's position. And so great was Washington's confidence in the military ability and courage of General Howe that to him was intrusted the command of that department, and on the 15th of May, 1780, he was instructed by Washington to increase his rank and file to 2,500 men, if not now that large, from General Clinton's New York Militia. General Clinton was then Governor of that State and commander-in-chief of the militia. Howe was soon joined by part of Clinton's brigade and latterly by a division of the Connecticut troops, when he was ordered by General Washington to dismiss the militia, having then 2,500 Continental troops.

General Clinton doubtless took offense at the dismissal of his State's militia, and immediately began with Benedict Arnold and others to plot for the removal of General Howe. General Arnold made immediate application for the position, whether then with a treasonable design we can only conjecture, but he alleged "that his wound would not allow him to remain in the field," and that was his ostensible reason for seeking the appointment. Arnold secured the influence of Mr. Robert R. Livingston, then a member of Congress from New York, to assist him. Mr. Livingston wrote to General Washington on the 22d day of June, 1780, and stated that General Howe (probably on account of his dismissal of the New York militia), would not inspire the confidence in them essential for engaging their efficient service, and said: "If I might presume so far, I should beg leave to submit to Your Excellency whether this post might not be safely confided to General Arnold, who is the favorite of the militia, and who will agree perfectly with our governor."

On the 30th of June, General Arnold visited the camp at West Point. General Howe wrote that day to General Washington, "I have taken General Arnold round our works, and he has my opinion of them and of many other matters. I have long wished to give it to you, but I could not convey it by letter." General Howe had always, to a most extraordinary degree, enjoyed General Washington's esteem and confidence, and upon the solicitation for the appointment of Arnold he refused to make it, except that General Howe might prefer to resume his position in the line of the army. General Howe signifying his preference, General Washington acceded to the importunities of Arnold's friends, and on the third day of August, 1780, Major General Arnold was ordered to take command of West Point and its dependencies. And scarcely a month passed before Arnold was guilty of his base treachery and Major André was captured. The result is well known. He was tried by a court-martial, of which General Howe was a conspicuous member, and was convicted and hung.

General Howe was then placed in command of a division on the east side of the Hudson, where he remained until January 10, 1781. At this time a mutiny broke out among the Pennsylvania troops, and by order of General Washington he was sent with five battalions to quell the disturbance. A similar occurrence took place in the New Jersey line on the 22d, and General Washington dispatched General Howe to Ringwood, in that State, to quell the mutiny there. Both of these missions were performed with great promptness, and a few of the leaders having been so speedily and fairly tried, condemned, and executed that a vote of thanks was returned by General Washington, in behalf of the country, to General Howe and his troops, and Congress likewise passed resolutions thanking him for these services.

On the 21st of July, 1781, while still in New York, he was ordered to reconnoiter the enemy's position at King's Bridge, which task was performed entirely to the satisfaction of General Washington. The long struggle of America for freedom was now drawing to a close. Lord Cornwallis, finding it impossible longer to withstand the aggressive movement of the Americans, surrendered his sword to Washington on the 19th of October, 1781, at Yorktown. And on the 18th of the following month, Major Craig and his forces left the Cape Fear, and with him disappeared the last vestige of British dominion in North Carolina. General Howe still remained in the service of the Government. The Continental Congress was in session in Philadelphia in June, 1783. Owing to the failure of Congress to levy revenue, which was due to the want of power, a defect in the Articles of Confederation, the Congress, while in session, was attacked by a clamorous mob and compelled to disperse.

For their protection, General Howe was sent with five battalions to suppress the mob. This was successfully accomplished, and was the last act performed by him of importance while in the Army. Soon afterwards he was mustered out of the service, holding then the rank of major-general of the Continental Army. On September 23, 1783, Congress passed a resolution of thanks to General Howe and the officers and soldiers of his command. Before retiring from the Army he took an active interest in forming the Order of the Cincinnati, and was one of the general officers designated at the Cantonment of the American Army June 19, 1783, to establish that society, and he was the first officer of the North Carolina Chapter which he afterward formed.

He had given six years' continued service to his country, and during all that time he never asked or accepted one moment's recess. To use his own language: "For this service I have sacrificed all other considerations, however interesting, endearing, or heartfelt they might have been." In the spring of 1785, he returned to his home on the Cape Fear, ripe with honors and the gratitude of his country. At Fayetteville he was received with public ovation, and the popular homage extended him was unparalleled in that day, except in the single instance of that given to George Washington. He immediately applied himself to his former occupation of tilling the soil, but was not long allowed to remain quiet at his home. During the summer of the year 1785 he was elected by his people to represent them in the legislature, where he took his seat at New Bern on the 19th of November.

On the 17th of March, 1786, he was sent to select a site for a lighthouse on the Cape Fear River, and, with Mr. Benjamin Smith and the commissioners of pilotage, fixed the location at Baldhead. Again during this year he was a candidate for the legislature from Brunswick. At this time in North Carolina the judiciary was in great disrepute. At Wilmington a court was being held by Judges Spencer, Ashe, and Williams. In the words of Mr. Archibald McLean, a brilliant lawyer of that day "the most shameful partiality disgraced the bench." The question of the extent of pardon which should be granted to the Loyalists, who had lately been in arms against the Continentals, or adhering to the British, giving them aid and comfort, was greatly agitated among the people, especially in reference to the confiscation acts. General Howe, being a man of broad and liberal culture, favored magnanimity and advocated the restoration of the Loyalists to their property rights and granting general amnesty. He warred against proscription, which filled the air. He met with violent opposition at the polls from the narrow-minded and illiberal.

In a letter written by Archibald McLean to James Iredell on the 3d August, 1786, he says:

"General Howe will, I believe, be returned from Brunswick, though opposed with great assiduity. He openly avows the most liberal principles and execrates the judges and other officers."

Notwithstanding the opposition he was triumphantly elected, thus establishing the fact that the conservative spirit existed and was in the ascendancy among the people of North Carolina even in that day, and for which they have ever been and are still justly renowned.

The legislature was to convene at Fayetteville on the 18th

November, 1786. General Howe set out for the capital, and on his way was taken sick. He stopped at the residence of General Thomas Clark, his old friend and comrade in arms, on the Cape Fear River. He became ill, and there continued in declining health until he died. On the 14th December, 1786, Judge Alfred Moore, one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, wrote to James Iredell that "General Howe is at the very verge of the grave; it is supposed that he will die in a few days; he has only got as far as General Clark's." A few days afterwards he expired, at the age of 56 years, and was buried on Grange Farm, now a portion of Columbus County, N. C.

Not even a stone marks his last resting place, and nothing but a small hillock exists to show that even a grave was ever there. What a commentary upon the gratitude of his countrymen!

Thus ended the career of one who did more to bring about the crisis which caused the Revolution than any one man in North Carolina.

He was possessed of versatile talents. He was the life of social gatherings. On these occasions it is said of him that his imagination fascinated, his repartee overpowered, and his conversation was enlivened by strains of exquisite raillery.

He was of noble impulses and liberal views. He was an eloquent speaker and logical debater. He was a power in politics and was great as a soldier, and having attained the highest rank in the American army, he is easily distinguished as the greatest man North Carolina furnished to the American Revolution, and one of the most aggressive leaders for liberty and independence in all the colonies, in the preservation of whose fame every American citizen should take a just pride, and the American Congress should cheerfully erect a monument to make the name of Robert Howe immortal, that his example may be emulated by all future generations.

Grange Farm belonged to his wife's family.

EARLY RELATION OF NORTH CAROLINA AND THE WEST.

BY WILLIAM K. BOYD, PROFESSOR OF HISTORY IN TRINITY COLLEGE.

There are two well defined types of political and social development in our colonial history. In one the predominant influences were European; the thirteen colonies were founded by Europeans, the institutions and customs of the seventeenth century were, to a large extent, those of the old world, and even the physical features of their populations reminded careful observers of their kinsmen across the seas. In the eighteenth century, however, a new type appeared; the founders of twelve colonies had passed away and their places were taken by men of native birth; untrammeled by recollections of Europe, a new generation faced and solved the problems of life on this continent in ways distinctively its own, and thus created an American heritage for modern Americans. The place of North Carolina in the first of these types has been made familiar by many incidents, some of which have been described in the Booklet. Its relation to the second is not so often emphasized; but no movement in all the colonies better illustrates the nascent Americanism of the eighteenth century than the migration of groups of men and women from North Carolina to the country beyond the Alleghany mountains, and the political experiments and social conditions established there. In this movement are revealed all the features of that continuous American expansion by which new country has been converted into territories and States, and of that spirit of democracy which, in the Jacksonian era, revolutionized American politics.

Toward the middle of the eighteenth century the colonies of the Atlantic seaboard were well advanced. While there were some strips of unoccupied territory between the various settlements, the land itself had become almost completely disposed of in numerous grants to individuals or corporations. The next wave of colonization must therefore cross the Alleghanies and possess the country between the mountains and the Mississippi. The British authorities were well aware of this problem. In 1748, the Board of Trade reported "that the settlement of the country lying to the westward of the great mountains would be for His Majesty's interest and the advantage and security of Virginia and the neighboring colonies;" in 1756, Sir Thomas Pownall wrote that "the English settlements as they are at present circumstances, are absolutely at a standstill; they are settled up to the mountains and in the mountains there is nowhere together land sufficient for a settlement large enough to subsist by itself and to defend itself and preserve a communication with the present settlements;" consequently in the negotiations which resulted in the Treaty of Paris of 1763, England took the western country as spoils of the war with France in preference to Guadaloupe and Canada, the alternative choice offered by the French.

But how should the new territory be colonized? There are two very suggestive answers. In the same year that the treaty was signed, the British authorities forbade the colonial governments to make any new settlements beyond the western frontiers of the colonies, and by a series of treaties with the Indians south of the Ohio prepared the way for a peaceable occupation of the new country. Evidently the occupation was to be made by the initiative of British rather than colonial authorities. This is confirmed by some interesting evidence. Several applications for land grants in the new country were filed. Most significant of these was that of the Vandalia Company, whose agent was Benjamin Franklin. It asked for 400,000 acres of land which would include all of present West Virginia and Eastern Kentucky. This vast territory was to have a proprietary government, with some features similar to the government of Massachusetts. In 1775, a charter corresponding to these terms was drawn up and passed through the preliminary legal processes and was ready for the royal seal, but the events which preceded the Revolution prevented its completion. Evidently it was the purpose of the British government to colonize through proprietary grants and had Franklin applied a few years earlier, fourteen instead of thirteen colonies might have participated in the Revolution.

In the meantime the Americans, especially those in the western part of the Southern colonies, had taken into their own hands the problem of expansion. Without the permission of either British or colonial authorities they began to cross the mountains by individuals, families, and groups of families. The movement was spontaneous and seems to have been the result of discontent with the political and social conditions in the colonies as well as the land hunger common to all Americans of the eighteenth century. Since the days of Bacon's Rebellion the people in Western Virginia had shown discontent with the tidewater region, and this was re-enforced by the advent of the Scotch-Irish toward the middle of the eighteenth century; in upper South Carolina there was similar discontent which found expression in local associations for the enforcement of order and justice independent of the colonial authorities; and in Western North Carolina the War of the Regulators was the culmination of social and political discontent. In contrast to the ills at home were the rude plenty, the freedom, and the charms of adventure in an unknown land; by hundreds the choice was quickly made and the migration resulted in the States of Tennessee and Kentucky.

The territory first settled was the broad valley between the Cumberland Mountains on the west and the Great Smoky and Unaka ranges on the east. Through it flow the Holston, the Watauga, the Nolachucky, the Clinch and the French Broad rivers, which finally combine to form the Tennessee. The earliest settlements were made by Virginians at Wolf Hills, on the Holston River, the present site of Abingdon, Va. Gradually the settlers extended southward into the valley of the Watauga, but here they were gradually outnumbered by emigrants from the Carolinas, especially from North Carolina.

The beginnings of the North Carolina migration to Watauga are veiled in obscurity. The first recorded expedition was late in 1768 or early in 1769; one of its leaders was Daniel Boone, who was then living on the Yadkin River, but his aim was to reach the farther western country and his relation to Watauga does not extend beyond this exploration; shortly after a company of Virginians and North Carolinians crossed the mountains and brought back good reports, and in 1770, the most important figure in the early history of Watauga appears. This was James Robertson, a native of Virginia, but a resident of Wake County, North Carolina. He was a man of unusual native ability; "he had a sound mind, a healthy constitution, a robust frame, a love of virtue, an intrepid soul and an emulous desire for honest fame." He was born in Brunswick County, Virginia, in 1742. Eight years later he removed to North Carolina. He seems to have had friends among Regulators, at least he was well acquainted with the conditions in the western counties and was probably seeking a refuge from them. His wife was a woman of some education and from her Robertson learned his first lessons in books. His first journey to Watauga was made alone; there he met a settler named Honeycutt, made a crop, and then started back for his wife and child. On the journey he lost his way; he was forced to abandon his horse; his provisions were exhausted and he could not secure game because his powder was ruined by rain. Tradition says that he wandered fourteen days in this condition; at last on the point of starvation he was relieved by meeting two hunters. These adventures did not discourage him. Soon after his return he again went to the Watauga Valley, this time with his wife, family, and sixteen others, all of whom made homes there. This was in the spring of 1771, whether before or after the battle of Alamance is not certain. The following year the second prominent man in the early history appeared, John Sevier, of Virginia, who later was so prominent in forming the State of Franklin.

The rate of settlement and the population of Watauga in these early days are not known, but in 1776 one hundred and thirteen names were signed to the petition for annexation to North Carolina. The people were mostly of Scotch-Irish descent; except for the more reckless and daring individuals, the settlements were made in groups. A fort or stockade was erected with surrounding cabins; here all assembled in times of danger, while in times of peace the cabins or farm houses on the plantations were inhabited. The life was simple; each farmer made his own tools and harness; the neighborhood co-operated in corn husking, house building, and log rollings. Gradually the wilderness was reclaimed, homes were filled with rude plenty and settlements extended to the Nolachucky and Carter's Creek. The landmarks of these early Watauga settlements are chiefly in the vicinity of Elizabethton, Tennessee.

Two problems soon presented themselves that tested the good sense and character of the people. First of these was that of government. They went into the new country believing that it belonged to Virginia, but in 1771 a surveyor, Anthony Bledsoe, discovered that the Watauga region was south of the Virginia line and within the limits of North Carolina. As many of the people had come to Watauga seeking refuge from conditions in North Carolina, they did not care to appeal to the parent colony for protection, but decided to look to themselves for laws and organs of government. No contemporary records of their action have been preserved, but according to tradition and later accounts the people of Watauga and the neighboring communities met in a convention at the home of Robertson. They chose thirteen representatives, probably one for each of the groups of settlers. These representatives then chose a court of five commissioners to whom was entrusted the administration of affairs. These five men performed practically all the functions of government, they recorded wills, issued marriage licenses, made treaties with the Indians, decided cases at law according to the laws of Virginia, punished criminals, and even supervised the morals of the community. Justice, especially criminal justice, was speedy; once a horse thief was arrested on Monday, tried on Wednesday, and executed on Friday, and certainly some unruly citizens committed the unpardonable crime of fleeing to the Indians rather than submit to Watauga justice.

This Watauga Association, as it was called, was the first government established west of the Alleghanies; it was also the first organization for government created by native-born Americans. Its characteristics are therefore suggestive of the political ideals of the eighteenth century. Suffrage, which seems to have been universal, unrestricted by property qualifications, the absence of religious tests, the convention of the people, the representative body, and the powers delegated to the executive, all these seem to forecast the kind of government which became universal after independence from England was secured. This political activity, however, was not the result of any self-conscious political theory, but of political experience in the colonies, for the people of Western Virginia, Western North Carolina and upper South Carolina had been accustomed to taking the administration of law into their own hands; discontented with the inefficient colonial administration, they frequently formed associations for regulating their affairs, especially for the suppression of petty crimes and misdemeanors. From such associations the Regulator movement in North Carolina derived its name. So the people of Watauga were simply applying more extensively methods and principles that had been in use for some time. This habit of self-help, the solution of problems without reference to the legally constituted bodies, is of vast significance; it followed the expansion of the nation in its various stages from the borderland of the original colonies to the far west, and applied to national affairs, it gave rise to a political theory, the doctrine of squatter sovereignty, which had so important an influence in the slavery controversy.

The second immediate problem before the Watauga people was that of relations with the Indians. In 1772, a treaty was made between Virginia and the Cherokees by which the line 36° 30′ was made the dividing line between the western white settlements and the Indians. Alexander Cameron, the Indian agent, thereupon ordered the Watauga settlers to remove, as they were occupying country which the treaty reserved to the Indians; they promptly defied him, but conciliated the Indians by purchasing an eighty years' lease to all lands on the Watauga River. In this negotiation Robertson seems to have been the leading spirit. In celebration of the contract a day of sports was set apart; whites and Indians engaged in races, wrestling matches, and games. But the good will of the occasion was broken in the evening by some lawless whites from the Holston settlements. Lurking on the outskirts of the festivities, they killed a straggling Indian and the Cherokees departed in wrath. Again Robertson came to the front. While Sevier superintended preparations for defense, Robertson, alone, took the trail to the Cherokee villages fifty miles away, and convinced the Indians that the Watauga people were not responsible for the murder and thus prevented war.

In the meantime the mother colonies had drifted into the Revolution. The policy of Watauga and the other settlements beyond the mountains was of vast importance; if they should espouse the British cause, they would not only threaten the seaboard settlements but they would save the country beyond the mountains for the English crown. As most of the settlers had left their former homes on account of grievances which they attributed to the British administration in the colonies, they cast in their lot with the Revolution. The method by which this choice was made is interesting, suggestive of the political ideals and methods of American democracy. "Alarmed by the reports of the present unhappy differences between Great Britain and America on which report (taking the now united colonies for our guide) we proceeded to choose a committee, which was done unanimously by consent of the people. This committee (willing to become a party to the present unhappy contest) resolved (which is now on our records) to adhere strictly to the rules and orders of the Continental Congress, and in open committee acknowledged themselves indebted to the united colonies their full proportion of the continental expense."

The first result of the Revolution was to bring Watauga into closer relations with North Carolina. The exigencies of war made cooperation necessary and in 1776 the Watauga Association applied for annexation. This was granted by the Provincial Council and delegates from Washington District, Watauga Settlement, were admitted to the Provincial Congress at Halifax. The next year Washington District became Washington County, a land office was opened, and a system of land grants similar to that of North Carolina was instituted; yet there was no idea of a permanent union, for the North Carolina Declaration of Rights, in defining the limits of the State as extending from sea to sea, distinctly says that this shall not be so contrued as to prevent the establishment of one or more governments westward of this State, by consent of the legislature. The country developed so much in a few years that two new counties were erected from Washington, Sullivan in 1779 and Greene in 1783, and in 1779 Jonesboro was founded, named for Willie Jones, of North Carolina. It became the county seat of Washington County.

Here, as in the eastern colonies, the Revolution was also a civil war; but the nature of the opposition was a contrast to that in the seaboard settlements. There the royalists were recruited from the property holders, the conservative and educated classes, but in Watauga the royalists seem to have been more extensively members of the disorderly and undesirable class of citizens. Government was severe and drastic. As the newly established North Carolina administration was unable to preserve order, the old self-regulative system was resorted to. Committees were appointed and military companies were organized; these arrested all suspicious persons; the mere fact of arrest was considered proof of guilt; the prisoner who failed to give security was shot, hanged or whipped, branded or drowned. The forger was branded, the murderer was whipped, and the horse thief was hanged.

Sometimes the regularly constituted authorities tried the prisoner; one indictment is against the defendant for toryism, the sentence that he be kept prisoner during the war, and that one-half of his property be confiscated.

The first military problem of the Revolution in the western country was the Indian question. The British administration instructed the Indian agents to make alliances with the leading southern tribes, the Creeks, the Choctaws, Cherokees, and Chickasaws, and turn them against the whites. Such an alliance was only natural for the Americans were constantly encroaching on the homes and hunting grounds of the red men, while the aim of the Indian agent was usually peace and trade. But the British policy was fatal; it aroused great hatred for England among the pioneers and led many to adopt the patriot cause who would otherwise have remained faithful to the king. In 1776 the Cherokees along the Carolina and Georgia frontier were persuaded to make war; they attacked the Americans in two simultaneous movements, one against the Holston, the other against the Watauga settlement. In both they were repulsed by the mountaineers while retaliatory operations against the Cherokees by troops from North Carolina under General Rutherford has already been told in this series.

The most noted service of the Watauga people to the Revolution, however, was their victory over the British and Tories at Kings Mountain. That, also, has been planned for a future article; a service equally important, often obscured by the more dramatic military events, was their part in furthering the westward expansion of the American people, in the conquest of the wilderness which lay beyond. In this work the interests of North Carolinians were closely concerned. Richard Henderson was, like many of his contemporaries, affected with the fever for western lands. Probably as early as 1763, he interested Daniel Boone in the exploration of the west, but not until 1774 were his plans matured. Then he organized at Hillsborough the Louisa Company, later called the Transylvania Company, and in 1775, at Sycamore Shoals on the Watauga River, he bought from the Cherokee Indians a vast tract of land now included in western Tennessee and Kentucky. Neither the British nor the colonial authorities would recognize that the treaty gave rights to the soil, and indeed the claim of the Cherokees to convey title were not so strong as usual, for the country in question was really a battle ground between rival hostile tribes. But migration at once began, from which the first settlements in western Tennessee and Kentucky have their origin. Among the first immigrants was James Robertson, of Watauga. In 1779, he crossed the hills through the Cumberland Gap and established a small colony on the Cumberland River at French Lick, an old Indian trading station. The next year he was joined by John Donelson, of Virginia. They built a block-house on a high bluff, which they named Nashborough, in honor of Abner Nash, who was made Governor of North Carolina in 1780. Four years later Nashborough became Nashville.

The early history of the Cumberland settlements resembles that of Watauga. The first year's crop was a failure, the Indians became hostile and the supply of ammunition ran low. Many wished to abandon the settlement and return to their former homes, but Robertson rallied their courage and alone made a dangerous journey to settlements in Kentucky for ammunition, and on the evening of his return, January 15, 1781, through his natural vigilance, saved the fort from surprise by the Indians. Government also suggests conditions on the Watauga. On May 1, 1780, representatives from various communities met and framed a constitution similar to the Watauga Association. The administration of justice was vested in a court of "Judges, Triers, or General Arbitrators," elected by the votes of all men who were twenty-one years of age, and "as often as the people in general are dissatisfied with the doings of the Judges andTriers—they may call a newe election at any of the said stations, and elect others in their stead." These articles were not only an expression of the popular will, they were also a contract between Henderson and the people, for it was written that "the said Richard Henderson on his part does hereby agree." It was not intended, however, that the Cumberland Association should be a permanent, independent government but a temporary arrangement until a county under North Carolina could be organized. This was done in 1783, when the Cumberland Association became Davidson County, North Carolina, and James Robertson, chosen as delegate to negotiate the formal union with the State, became the county's first representative in the General Assembly. Two years later the General Assembly authorized Rev. Thomas Craighead and others to organize Davidson Academy, which survives today as the University of Nashville.

No review of the causes and character of the early westward migration and of its relation to North Carolina would be complete without some account of the separation of the parent colony and the frontier communities, of how the State lost its sovereignty over the vast region that it had helped to colonize. For this there are a number of reasons. First of all, the remoteness of the new settlements from the State prevented the growth of sympathy and understanding between them. The westerners claimed that North Carolina would not pay the Indians for the lands they vacated, that the administration of justice by the North Carolina courts in the western counties was inefficient, and that the tax rate for lands on the frontier should not be the same as that for lands in more thickly settled regions. On the other hand there was a feeling in North Carolina that the problem of the western country was too large for the State, and also a social cleavage which often exists between frontier communities and older settled regions. Above all was the interest of the nation, the necessity of ceding the western lands as a prelude to that more lasting union about to be established under the Federal Constitution. Therefore, in 1784 North Carolina ceded her claims to the lands beyond the mountains; the members in the Assembly from the western country voted for the cession and one of the representatives from the older counties of the State remarked that "the inhabitants of the western country are the offscourings of the earth, fugitives from justice, and we will be rid of them at any rate."

The act of cession provided that Congress should not take possession for two years and that in the meantime the western settlements should remain under the jurisdiction of North Carolina. But the people felt that something should be done for the better preservation of order and in preparation for Statehood in the new Union soon to be formed also, while the mountaineers had no great love for North Carolina, they were offended at being separated without their advice and consent. Committees from the captains companies of Washington, Sullivan and Greene Counties therefore called a meeting of delegates from the counties at Jonesboro in August, 1784. This body decided to form an independent government, to petition Congress to accept the cession by North Carolina, and called a constitutional convention. The convention met in November of that year but accomplished nothing, for those who favored immediate separation from North Carolina were divided as to methods of procedure while the opposition found strength in two acts of the North Carolina Assembly, one repealing the cession of the western lands, the other establishing a special Supreme Court and a brigadier generalship of militia for the western counties. Several influential men who had been in favor of the Statehood movement now opposed separation; among these was John Sevier himself. But its advocates seem to have gained strength by the action of North Carolina; they secured a majority in a third convention which met in December, 1784, and accomplished their purpose. A constitution was framed whose principal features were taken from that of North Carolina, the name Frankland was given to the new State, soon changed to Franklin, and the first legislature met early in 1785, and in November, a convention of the people approved the work of the constitutional convention, probably with a few alterations in its Constitution. Thus "the new society or State called Frankland has already put off its infant habit. Here the genuine Republican; here the real Whig will find a safe asylum, a comfortable retreat among those modern Franks, the hardy mountain men."

NORTH CAROLINA STATE LIBRARY

There were three questions on which the future of the State of Franklin depended—its relation to the national movement, to other frontier communities, and to North Carolina.

The western country favored the establishment of a strong national government because of the protection it might afford against the Indians and the Spanish in the southwest. Among the acts of the State of Franklin was the reservation of lands surrendered by the Indians as a contribution toward the national debt; and delegates were also sent to a convention of western settlers to provide for the opening of the Mississippi to navigation. One of the first acts was to appoint William Cocke a delegate to the Federal Congress to lay before that body the interests of the State of Franklin. But his mission was without result; no official recognition could be secured and Benjamin Franklin, for whom the commonwealth had been named, advised that separation from North Carolina should not be pressed.

But the co-operation of other frontier communities and the enlargement of territory might prove a means of securing recognition in national affairs and permanent independence. This seemed possible in two directions: first, in western Virginia there was discontent with the State government similar to that in the western counties of North Carolina. Colonel Arthur Campbell, an officer of Washington County, Virginia, declared that the people would take up arms rather than submit to continued unjust taxation and two petitions were sent to the Virginia Legislature asking that a new State be created in the west, whose boundaries should include the State of Franklin. But the Legislature had no sympathy with the movement; in 1785 it declared any attempt to form an independent government within the limits of the State without the consent of the Virginia government to be high treason. In the meantime expansion southward was prepared for by negotiations with the Indians. Treaties were made with some of the Cherokee chiefs which were ineffective, as all the chiefs would not agree and their lands had been guaranteed to them by North Carolina; an expedition was then sent to the bend of the Tennessee River, at Mussel Shoals, to make occupation under titles from Georgia and negotiations were opened with that State to begin war on the Creeks. All of these measures failed, for the Indians became hostile and also the Federal Government appointed three commissioners, one from each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia to settle Indian affairs on the frontier.

So the State of Franklin was left to face the North Carolina authorities alone. The Constitution of 1776 had looked forward to the establishment of two or more governments west of the mountains; both Governor Martin and Governor Caswell were willing for a legal separation but the people of Franklin had acted independently, without the consent of the North Carolina authorities. Moreover, in 1784 the Assembly, dissatisfied with the negotiations for a federal union, repealed the cession of western lands. Governor Martin thereupon issued a manifesto, in which threats were made against the new government if the people did not return to their allegiance to North Carolina. Governor Caswell, his successor, was more conciliatory, but there was no hope for recognition, for the Assembly in 1786 decided to reassert its sovereignty over the country. North Carolina officials were sent into the western counties and pardon was offered to all who would return to allegiance. Conflict of jurisdiction between two sets of officials followed and the political issue threatened to widen into civil war, for John Sevier, after at first opposing separation from North Carolina, had been drawn into the movement and became Governor of the State of Franklin, while John Tipton, his personal rival, adopted the North Carolina cause. The extent of disorder is unknown; in one conflict twelve men were killed. But the danger of war was averted by the conciliatory policy of Governor Caswell. In 1787 he sent Evan Shelby to Franklin to open negotiations for a return to allegiance. Sevier was persuaded to sign articles of agreement in March, which promised a reference of all matters to the North Carolina Assembly. The following month he repudiated the agreement and declared that he would maintain the independence of the State of Franklin. This seems to have been due to distrust of the Assembly. War between the parent State and the colony seemed imminent, for Shelby urged sending troops to force submission; but Governor Caswell, in a broad-minded address, urged all parties to submit and unite against possible Indian hostilities and promised eventual separation. This seems to have won the day. The Franklin Legislature authorized the election of representatives to the North Carolina Assembly; Sevier's term as Governor expired in 1788 and no successor was chosen; after his retirement he promised to do all he could for an amicable readjustment. Thus the State of Franklin collapsed. North Carolina's sovereignty was recognised until her claims to the western country were ceded to the Federal Government in 1789.

Bibliography: Roosevelt, Winning of the West; Haywood, Civil and Political History of Tennessee, written by John Haywood, of North Carolina, who went to Tennessee in 1810; he collected many traditions and facts from the pioneers. Ramsay, Annals of Tennessee, has many documents; Phelan, History of Tennessee, the standard State history; Turner, Western State Making During the Revolution, in American Historical Review, Vol. I., is very suggestive. Alden, The State of Franklin, Amer. Ibid. Vol. VIII.; State Records of North Carolina, Vol. XXII., has interesting documents relating to the State of Franklin.

INCIDENTS OF THE EARLY AND PERMANENT SETTLEMENT OF THE CAPE FEAR.

BY W. B. McKOY

The study of history turns up many obscure and buried facts, but with them grow up the tares and weeds of fancy and imagination, and all must be reaped and winnowed to separate the true grain. Therefore, it is well to continue the good work, and the results that follow may be of use.

It is not generally admitted that the first explorers of the Cape Fear were the French. In 1624, however, Giovanni da Verrazano[1], a Florentine, left Dieppe in France under direction of Francis I of France to find a passage to Cathay. On January 24 he sailed westward from Madeira with one ship, the Dolphin, and says: "On the 10th of March we reached a new country that has never before been seen by any one within ancient or modern times." He described the shores as "covered with fine sand about fifteen feet thick, rising in the form of little hills about fifty paces broad, several arms of the sea which made through inlets washing the shores on both sides as the coast runs. An outstretched country appeared at a little distance, rising somewhat above the sandy shore in beautiful fields and broad plains covered with immense forests of trees more or less dense, too varied in color and too delightful and charming to be described. They are adorned with palms, laurels, cypresses and other varieties unknown to Europe, that send forth the sweetest fragrance to a great distance." He entered the Cape Fear and sailed up as far as the present site of Wilmington. Although Cabot had, in 1497, found the continent, he only sailed south as far as 38 degrees north latitude, and though Sir Humphrey Gilbert came near being wrecked off Cape Fear, he did not enter the harbor, and all the five attempts of Raleigh to colonize Virginia were north of this place. In the grant of this country to Sir Robert Heath by Charles I, October 30, 1629, he called the country "this our New Carolina." Notwithstanding that this grant was forfeited by their failure to settle the country, still a number of New Englanders settled on the point now called Federal Point, in 1660, to raise cattle, but soon abandoned the place, and only a post with a notice on it warning adventurers against the country, marked the occupancy.

In the first charter of King Charles II to the Lords Proprietors, March 20, 1663, and which, by the way, was the most princely gift ever conferred on subjects by a monarch, the name Carolina was retained as the name of a conquered province, named for Charles IX of France. The proprietors divided the province into North and South Carolina, making the Cape Fear River the boundary line. They gave to the counties north of the Cape Fear their own names of Albemarle, Bath and Clarendon to South Carolina. Settlers had already come into Albemarle from Virginia, but the first venture of the Proprietors was to form a colony at Cape Fear in Clarendon. The New Englanders had abandoned the point of land on the Cape, but still claimed the right to settle and maintain a colony there. On August 25, 1663, the Proprietors made a proposal[2] to settle the first colony on the Clarendon or Charles River near Cape Fear, and John Vassal and others, in behalf of the New Englanders and the people of London, petitioned for the privilege and set up their previous occupancy and right of possession. At the same time Col. Madyford, with several people of the Barbadoes, petitioned for the privilege of settling there.

In a letter to Sir William Berkley[3], the Proprietors, in September, 1663, mention the proposal of the New Englanders but hope to find "more fassell[3] people who may settle upon better terms for us," yet he was not to deter the planting of the colony there. On Monday, Oct. 12, 1663, the Barbadoes Commissioners came to anchor in Cape Fear Roads to spy out the land, took the meridian, altitude of the sun, and were in latitude 33 degrees 43 minutes. Their description and report reads as if it were a fairy land, and indeed it must have appeared so to them. The "scandalous[4] writing" left by the New Englanders appears to us now in a new light, it apparently having been their intention to keep others off. Capt. Hilton and Long found the cattle still there, and the Indians brought them very good fat beef, also fat and very large swine. Yet, in November, 1764, John Vassal, who, by the way, claimed the country through Samuel Vassal as assignee of the Robert Heath[5] Patent, obtained the appointment for his cousin Henry[6] Vassal as agent, and he was made Surveyor General[7] of the Cape Fear in the county of Clarendon. They carried a colony there, and settled[8] at Charles Town at the upper side of the mouth of Town Creek on the Charles River, under license from Governor Berkley of Virginia.

In January, 1665, the Proprietors entered into the articles of agreement with the Barbadoes explorers and appointed Sir John Yeamans governor. These colonists arrived at Cape Fear November, 1665, and found there a colony "newly begun[9] to be peopled," and Captain Edward[10] Stanyon with a vessel on his way to Barbadoes. The New Englanders craved the use of the sloop to visit the Northern settlements, which was refused. Yeamans returned to Barbadoes and left the colonists under Robert Sanford; they planted the lands along Town Creek, and it has not yet become a notable fact that they were the first to cultivate cotton in North America.[11]

In June, 1666, Robert Sanford, with Capt. Stanyon's frigate, which had returned from Barbadoes, set out to find a more favorable place for settlement, as the New Englanders and the Barbadians did not live together in harmony, and later Sanford removed with part of the colony to Port Royal.[12] Clarendon at that time consisted of eight hundred[13] souls. Later that year, Henry[14] Vassal, who signed himself sole agent at Cape Fear, complained that one Sir John Yeamans had been preferred to him, yet hopes to retain the colonists at Cape Fear.

October, 1667, John[15] Vassal bewails the breaking up of the colony, though they had two years provision of corn on hand. After the abandonment of the settlement by Vassal and the New Englanders, the river was infested with pirates who became a menace to the other settlements.

Lawson, Surveyor General of both Carolinas, traveled through this country in 1700, and found whites all along the route trading with the Indians. He tells us that Sapona is the Indian name of the Northwest Cape Fear. Thomas Smith, one of the Landgraves[16] of Carolina, received from the Proprietors a grant of land on the Cape Fear including the Cape Island at the mouth of the river. In his will, proved 30th of August, 1738, he wrote, "I give my four sons my Cedar Island (which is called now Smith's Island), at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, containing 800 acres, also the remainder of the Cape Fear lands." Other grants were issued for land along the south side of the Cape Fear River by South Carolina. In the fall of 1711, John Lawson, Surveyor General, was burned to death in a most horrible manner by the Tuscarora Indians, and then followed a bloody massacre of whites. Col. John Barnwell crossed the Cape Fear at the point where the town of Brunswick was afterwards established, quelled the insurrection and returned the same way in July, 1712. In the fall of 1712, James Moore, Jr.,[17] with a party crossed the Cape Fear and defeated the Indians at Taw River with great slaughter. The notorious pirates, Steed Bonnett and Richard Whorley, blockaded the port of Charleston and broke up their commerce, and in September, 1718, Col. Wm. Rhett sailed for Cape Fear, entered the harbor, boarded the pirate and captured the sloop; carried Steed Bonnett, with his crew, to Charleston, where he and thirty others were hanged. We may observe from the above that the ever drifting sand dunes on the restless shores of the main are permanent memorials of our first explorers' report; that the name Carolina is handed down through Charles I who claimed to be by the Grace of God, King of England, France, etc., and we yet cling to it instead of our English name Virginia. We find the names of the counties which the Proprietors attached still with us as a proof of our lineage; though Clarendon and Charleston drifted southward with the Barbadians, Cape Fear and Old Town are here memorials of the New England settlers. The cotton-wool[18] here first cultivated was a distinct species. This was the beginning of the Sea Island, Barbadoesian, or black-seeded cotton, bearing a pure yellow blossom with a reddish purple spot in the base, and is the longest staple in the world, called "Gossypium barbadenses" by Linnaeus. We observe in the settlement of this country two classes of people who preceded the cultivators of the soil or permanent settlers, traders or adventurers and cattlemen who chose the wild, uncultivated life with the natives, traded and raised their stock on chosen spots far from the settlements. Those who accompanied Barnwell, Moore and Rhett on their several expeditions sounded the praises of the fertile lands of the Cape Fear and particularly their adaptability for the cultivation of rice on the lowlands of the river.

In 1720, the Proprietors, who felt the heavy loss by reason of the Indian war, became more exacting and imposed a heavy tax for the increased expense of the government, which was resented[19] by the people. A revolution had taken place in South Carolina and the people had declared their independence from the proprietory government, and attempted to set up a royal government under the Crown, and the Proprietors' tenure became a matter of serious concern. North Carolina had had no regular appointed governor for several years but was under the rule of the Presidents of the Council, when, in 1724, George Burrington, Esq.,[20] of the county of Devon,[21] who had been appointed Governor, opened his commission on Jan. 15. He immediately set about developing new settlements; he observed the approach of settlers on the Cape Fear from the South. Maurice Moore, a deputy of one of the Lords Proprietors, who had come from the southern colony in 1719 and had settled in Chowan, knowing the advantages of the Cape Fear, had induced his brothers and friends to make a settlement there as early as 1722,[22] and from the South came Roger and Nathaniel Moore, William Dry, Eliezer Allen, Thomas Clifford, Job Howe, Henry and Edward Hyrne,[23] John Moore's widow[24] and many others, bringing their families[25], slaves and cattle, and means to cultivate the land, and became permanently settled there. Burrington seeing the advantage of having the Cape Fear within the[22] northern colony[26] undertook to develop this section; he purchased an old grant issued in 1711, for a tract in Onslow County[26] at New River, and formed a colony of about 100 poor people upon the land, and offered as inducements large grants of land to settlers on the Cape Fear. In 1725, the town of Brunswick was laid out by Maurice Moore. John Porter[27] was granted, July 14, 1725, a tract of 640 acres adjoining Maurice Moore below Brunswick, and in 1726 conveyed it to Geo. Burrington. This is called Sturgeon Point or Governor's[28] Point on the old charts. Burrington,[29] in 1733, in speaking of his labors to develop the Cape Fear section said: "It cost me a great sum of money and infinite trouble." The first winter he went there he endured all the hardships that could happen to a man destitute of a house to live in, above a hundred miles from a neighbor, obliged to have all provisions brought by sea at great charges to support the number of men he carried there, whom he paid and maintained at his own expense; he sounded the inlets, bars and rivers, discovered and made known the channels of the Cape Fear River, Port Beaufort and Topsail Inlet. However, in 1725, Burrington was succeeded by Sir Richard Everard as Governor, and retired to the Cape Fear to improve his estates. He returned[30] to England about 1730. We have many grants from Everard for lands on both sides of the Cape Fear, even as far south as Waccamaw River and Lockwood's Folly[31] and the impetus to build up this section was in no way impeded. On October 22, 1728, Pleasant Oaks was granted to Justina Moore,[32] widow of John Moore.

In July 1729, the Governor and Council made a new precinct of Bath County, which they named New Hanover,[33] but the representatives were not admitted to sit, nor was the Act creating the county ever legally passed.

In 1729, the Act of Surrender[34] enabled[35] the Proprietors[36] to transfer to the Crown seven-eights of Carolina on September 29th,[37] for 17,500 pounds and the colony became a Royal Province.[34] This change of government became of great benefit to the colonists. The reform of the tariff system, the removal of export duties on manufactured goods and import duties on raw material encouraged an extensive traffic.[38] After 1730, rice was exported to southern Europe; a bounty was allowed on naval stores, tar, pitch and turpentine, and the duty on lumber, staves and shingles was removed. The colonists were even permitted to ship other goods and products to England, place them in bond and pay the tax when sold or to re-ship without tax; rice, cotton and indigo culture was greatly developed; saw mills were on every tributary stream, and the forests of pine appeared inexhaustible. The live oak was found to be far superior for ship-building to the English oak; ship-building being one of the early enterprises on the river. Just below Newton, Michael Dyer had, near the Oaks, a ship-yard and a grist mill, and at the foot of Church Street[39] in Wilmington, Joshua Grainger, Jr.'s ship-yard is still used. Grainger did an extensive business and brought out from Philadelphia Ebenezer Bunting, John Hands, Richard Hands and others. Archibald Corbett built a vessel here for Beard & Walker,[30] of Glasgow. James Wimble, Master of the brigantine Penelope also was a ship-builder and surveyor.

Governor Johnston[41] informed us that during the year ending December 12, 1734, forty-two ships went out of the Cape Fear loaded, and in 1754, Governor Dobbs said: "Above one hundred[42] vessels annually enter this river and their number is increasing; there were sixteen in the river when I went down." Small craft came into the Sound at Cabbage Inlet, near the head of Topsail Sound from the northward, and conveyed the goods over the narrow strip of land opposite the town of Brunswick called the upper and lower haul-over. This land in 1736, was owned by Col. Thomas Merrick,[43] who bought it of Landgrave Thomas Smith. Topsail derived its name from the fact that the Spanish Privateers sailing along the coast would observe the masts of the small craft over the banks and would land to pillage them. The trade of the colonies extended to Spain, Portugal and New England, as well as England. Before this, Virginia imposed an import tax on North Carolina tobacco. Trade later, was extended to Jamaica, St. Thomas, Barbadoes, Leeward Islands and Madeira, but was more frequent with the northern colonies. Labor[44] was high, carpenters demanded twenty to thirty shillings, and ordinary laborers twelve to fifteen shillings.

In 1733, a large colony[45] of Irish were settled in the upper part of South Carolina and spread along the coast northward towards Cape Fear. C.R. 3 p. 344

Burrington, in 1732, said: "A multitude of people have come into this county to settle last winter. Some have very great American fortunes. I now think there are men here to make up a creditable council." In Burrington's instructions, he is recommended to encourage the purchase of negro slaves.

George Burrington, who had been Governor under the Proprietors, was appointed by George II, first Royal Governor 29th of April, 1730, and sent over on February 25th, 1731. He was a man very violent in his temper, true and loyal to his cause. He was by no means popular, in fact historians have given him a very bad character, but when we read what has been said of the men of those times in the colony, we must either take them all as a sad lot, if we accept the severe charges made about them in our records, or treat their writings as villifications of men who were fighting in opposing factions. Can we believe all that has been said about Governor Eden and Everard, Moseley and Porter, Harnett, Maurice, James, and Roger Moore? They all had their share of abuse in letters of opponents. In a dispatch to the Colonial office in 1731, Burrington said: "About twenty[46] men are settled on the Cape Fear from South Carolina, among them are three brothers of a noted family whose name is Moore. These people were always troublesome where they came from and will doubtless be so here." We observe that immediately upon entering into office Burrington again became interested in the Cape Fear settlement, and determined to make it a part of the northern colony and devoted his personal attention to this project. He and his associates prevailed[46] upon the settlers[47] from the south to see the advantage of his claim. He directed Edward Moseley to make a survey[48] and map of the coast, the Cape Fear and Waccamaw River, and agreed not[48] to disturb grants already made by the Southern province. He demonstrated that it was to their private interest to be near the seat of government. Moseley made a chart and hydrographic survey of the Cape Fear and gave the depth of water on the main bar as eighteen feet, and James Wimble's map in 1738, makes it twenty-one feet. What was called New Inlet later, was opened by a storm in 1761. Early maps show that a small inlet had previously opened there and closed again. In several of Burrington's letters, we observe that there was little money in the country, and that the people barter and trade; he stated that fresh pork was one and one-half pence to one shilling per pound. Less than twenty shillings of goods bought in England sold for fourteen pounds fourteen shillings. A bushel of wheat sold for six pence worth of English goods. Burrington[49] appeared before the Board of Trade with Sir Robert Johnston in the matter of the boundary line and secured the boundary at a distance of thirty miles south of Cape Fear, and exhibited to them Moseley's map. Adherents of the once powerful Puritan party in England in 1625, had come to America to avoid persecutions under the reign of Charles I, and planted seeds of discord that have yielded a vast harvest in America. The attempt of Charles I, through Sir Fernando Gorges and Mason, to counteract their influence and power in New England fanned the flames of rivalry between Separatists and Churchmen. The prejudices of a persecuted people become in their offspring, race distinctions that in later generations have become more pronounced.

This province was peculiarly independent and difficult to restrain; here the people revolted against ancient laws and customs if they conflicted with their ideas of liberty of conscience or freedom of action. Here occurred the first revolution in 1719, against the government of the Proprietors, and here in 1765, on the Cape Fear, was the first armed resistance to the Stamp Act. Neither Churchmen, Separatists nor Quakers could prevail or enforce their views upon a people who chose to reason for themselves. Here force met resistance, persecution engendered hatred, which gave them advanced ideas of their constitutional rights in the revolution against England.

The most thickly settled part of Clarendon County was along Old Town Creek, and we find settled there William and Joseph Watters, John Dalrymple, John and Nathaniel Rice, John Lewis, William Lewis, Thomas Hill, Thomas Asope, Patrick Doran, Jerry Bigford, John Jean, in 1744 Collector of His Majesty's Customs. Between 1722 and 1730, there came quite a number of persons from the Albemarle section, Robert Halton, Provost Marshal of Bath County;[50] Col. James Innes, Martin Holt and wife, Mary Holt,[51] of Beaufort County; Cornelius Harnett, Sr., who had been bred a merchant in Dublin, Ireland,[52] and had married Mary, daughter of Martin Holt; his second wife was an Adams, of Bladen County; William Smith, Chief Justice; John Baptista Ashe, John and Nathaniel Rice, John Porter, John Maultsby, Edward Moseley, Surveyor General, and others, and received grants for large tracts of land from Governors Everard and Burrington. We have a tradition that bad blood was aroused between these new comers and the southern settlers in their eagerness to settle the most desirable locations. Burrington entered Stag Park and Hawfields; C. Harnett, Sr., settled near Hilton and established a ferry there but later kept the ferry at Brunswick. In the neighborhood of Wilmington settled also Robert Halton and John Maultsby on the North-east River. William Smith, Chief Justice, back of the present site of Wilmington. Martin Holt went to Brunswick, where he kept the ferry and a tavern; Maurice Moore and Roger at Orton; Nathaniel Moore at York, just below Brunswick; Allen at Lilliput, and Ashe on Town Creek.

In Burrington's instructions, we observe that public schools were provided for, but they direct that no schoolmaster[54] be permitted without license from the Bishop of London, and teachers in the province to be licensed by the Governor. William Wright was teacher in Brunswick. Education in the South[55] was of a higher type[56] than in the more northern settlements. The planters' sons were trained in the English schools and universities; were admitted to the English bar and were gentlemen in retirement, and imparted their manners and bearing to those about them. We find as early as 1712, a school teacher named Mashburn was in Albemarle. In 1750 George Vaughan,[57] an Irishman, writes from Lisburn, in Ireland, and offers to establish in the province at his own expense a seminary of learning. In 1756, the Assembly appropriated six thousand pounds for public schools but this fund was used in the French War[58] though refunded in 1760. In 1764, the public school committee appointed by the Assembly were Starkey, McGuire, Johnston and Harnett.

Burrington[59] remained in North Carolina until the arrival of his successor, Governor Gabriel Johnston,[60] at Cape Fear, October 27, 1734.[59] Governor Johnston was sworn in November 2, 1734, at the court-house in Brunswick. He was a Scotchman, a graduate of the University of St. Andrews and formerly professor there of Oriental languages, later a physician, and had received his appointment as Governor through Spencer Compton, Earl, of Wilmington, the Speaker of the House of Commons, with whom he lived while in London on intimate terms. He was received with delight by the people and great inducements were offered to have him make his residence in the northern part of the colony, which he at first acceded to. He married and settled at Salmon Creek, but subsequently returned to Cape Fear, where most of the Council resided, and attempted to make Wilmington the seat of government.

September 22, 1736, Governor[62] Johnston, in a speech before the legislature, both houses, called attention to the lack of Divine worship in many parts of the province; he deemed it essential that all rational creatures should pay due homage to the Supreme Author of their being[63] and that it is always regarded as a matter of the greatest consequence to peace and happiness to polish the minds of our young people with some degree of learning, and to early instill in them the principles of virtue and religion; that the legislature had not taken care to erect schools that deserve the name in this country was a misfortune. He proposed the use of the powder money[61] for the purpose but this was opposed. In Johnston's administration, this settlement rapidly developed, enterprising settlers came from many parts with retainers and slaves; they acquired extensive tracts of land and such as were best adapted to agriculture; and with fertile soils, abundant slave labor, they were easy and comfortable, with leisure to cultivate their mental faculties. They were eager students of history, literature, and the science of government, many were educated in England and broadened by foreign travel. They acquired a refinement of manners, which induced them to gather libraries and other comforts of home life; ease and abundance invited hospitality and social pleasures. Their daughters, gentle in their manners, shone with natural graces which developed docility with independence. The restlessness of the face, the hurried gait, the quick voice and business air were wanting in their manners. It was not their part to fight in the holy cause of temperance of mankind, reformation of religion, labor or suffrage rights of women, but on the contrary their lot was that of devoted, honoring wives and mothers, filled with the spirit of the Lord, devoting their highest thoughts to the moral upbuilding of their offspring. Men yielded to them with pride and delight their prerogatives and privileges, but their rights were never considered or dreamed of; and though human nature through all ages has been stamped with vices, sin and passion, these people maintained a high ideal of woman which permeated through all classes, and with jealous care they guarded their wives and daughters until the restraint under which they were held from public intercourse became the palladium of their virtue and engendered a respect and honor from men which became a benison to the race. The wives of the wealthy planters, as well as the poorer classes had ample cares to occupy both their time and their thoughts; not only the household duties but the providing for their slaves in sickness and in health, and the preparing of their clothing and the distribution of food fell upon them.

As early as 1734, there were fine brick houses at Orton, Kendall, Blue Banks and Brunswick. The dwellings of the planters were not large but commodious, and had a remarkable capacity for having room to spare for the passing stranger and in them they entertained on occasions many friends and visitors. Many houses had the overhanging Dutch roof and were shingled both on roof and sides; ample open fire places extended across the end of the rooms, large enough to sit within, fire dogs holding the logs of wood. The fire filled the room with warmth, and a glow of light more cheerful and comfortable than our modern method of lighting a house. Massive mahogany furniture, waxed and polished, but innocent of varnish, pewter and brass, chests of drawers, tables and chairs were imported from England. Their kitchen chimneys were hung with spits and chains for hangers, trammels and pot hooks, spiders and ovens where bread was baked for each meal; a modern cook might marvel how the savory meats and sweet breads were made. The dusky blacks toiling in the fields were dressed in bright dyed cotton clothes, women with red bandanas served about the houses, and at night they assembled about their cabin fires chanting weird and plaintive songs that called to the mind the pathetic lays of the daughters of Israel. Slaves were made mechanics, and there was little room for free labor.

Among early merchants we note Richard Quince & Sons, of Ramsgate, England, who owned several large ships; John Ancrum, from Hill House, near Frome in Somerset, England, secretary of the council, who purchased Old Town Plantation of Maurice Moore and resided there; Richard Morecraft and Thomas Merrick, from the Isle of St. Michael; William Dry, of Goose Creek, South Carolina; Rush Watts, of Lisbon, Portugal; Thomas Clark, a Captain of a Regiment of Foot in 1749.

Here in Brunswick, lived Matthew Higginbotham, the surveyor; Dr. Fergus, surgeon from a British Man of War, whose lot adjoined the town; Andrew Stewart, printer, who moved to Wilmington; Dr. Samuel Green, educated at Edinburg University, and Jonathan Ogden, the cordwainer. We note in deeds, the chair-maker, the block-maker, the baker, the tailor, carpenters and brick-makers, ship carpenters, tavern keepers, vintners, weavers, and periwig makers. There were settled on the river many whose names are hardly remembered; they came from many parts and were active in developing the settlement. Isaac Kilpatrick, of Londonerry; Thomas Carson and Michael Sampson, of Lisburn, and Waddell, of County Down, Ireland; Robert Walker, of New York; Joshua Gabourell, of the Isle of Jersey; James Murray, of London; Jehu, John and William Davis and William Hill, from Massachusetts; Dunbibin, Monk, Hogg and DuBois, of New York; John Watson, whose father had early established a botanic garden in Charleston; Mills, LeGeere, James Smallwood and Laspeyre, of South Carolina; DeRosset, from Lyme, England; William Bartram, the botanist; Dr. Roger Rolfe and wife, Ann, who owned the Rock Spring lot and St. James Square in Newton; Lord George Anson, for whom Anson County was named, the friend of Governor Johnston, who circumnavigated the world and was stationed a long while here in the man of war Scarborough. Here came James Hasell with his wife and son, a Yorkshire gentleman, who first settled in Philadelphia and came here in 1735, bringing into the colony thirty-five persons and for these he received grants for 1,750 acres. He purchased a tract on Town Creek and one of his grants was a tract on the coast at Cabbage Inlet about opposite the town of Brunswick. He was for forty years in public office in the colony, justice of the inferior court, chief justice, member of the council, president of the council, and several times acted as governor. "All these were there, and many others more, whose names and nations were too long to tell."

Before the arrival of Johnston the raftsmen on the Cape Fear refused to carry their tar, timber and naval stores down to the town of Brunswick, because of the open and exposed waters in front of that town, and as early as 1729, stopped at a place called the Dram Tree, where the merchants came up to trade; and many plantations up the river had their own wharves where vessels were loaded. Finally a settlement was made and a tavern erected for their accommodation and a town laid out by James Wimble, John Watson, Joshua Grainger, Michael Dyer and others. This place was known by several names: New Town, Newton, Carthage, New Liverpool and finally through the influence of Governor Johnston incorporated under the name of Wilmington, in honor of his patron. We find the names of many forgotten streets on record of this old town, Nancy Street, King Street, Middle Market Street, Middle Street, Hannah Street, Coney Street. Finally by the removal of the Custom House, Court-house and Jail the town of Brunswick saw its downfall impending, and a hard fight was made at each move. The Governor called a council meeting there, and on May 18, 1735, organized the first Court of Exchequer[65] in the province, which he directed to be held at Newton, October 2, 1736, an act was passed making the town of Newton a township[66] to be called Wilmington, and the Assembly met there in 1741. Wilmington can not be called an offspring of Brunswick, but a rival settlement which finally absorbed the old town. The fight continued until February 25, 1740, when in the council, Allen, Nathaniel Rice, Edward Moseley and Roger Moore opposed[67] the Wilmington bill claiming that by the Act of 1729 Brunswick was made a township and empowered to build a court-house, jail and church; good houses had been built there by several people before Newton was established; that the custom house was too far up the river; while Robert Halton, Matthew Rowan and James Murray and William Smith contended that Brunswick was unhealthy, surrounded by ponds, and the people would not live there. The tie was broken by Chief Justice Smith[68] casting the second vote as chairman. December 17th, of that year, the Governor wrote that he hoped to get all public business done there. However, it is to Brunswick that our earlier traditions cling though it was never destined to be a large town and only contained about forty families and in 1754, twenty families, while Wilmington then had seventy families.

The town of Brunswick was laid out on a tract of 320 acres granted to Maurice Moore and incorporated in 1729, and was divided into blocks with lots 80 feet front of a half acre each, about sixty lots fronting the river. The first street near the river with wharves in front was called Bay Street, the next in the rear Second Street, transverse streets were referred to as the streets where some person lived. In the town, the courts were held, merchants had their store houses and places of business, but they resided on plantations. The first minister[69] of the established church who resided in Brunswick was Rev. John LaPierre;[69] he came from Charleston in 1729, and remained nearly four years. His plaintive appeal to the Bishop of London, October 9, 1733, tells us of the sad plight of a missionary minister. He had no church, no provision made for salary, neither glebe nor house but was maintained by the contributions of a few. He speaks of a Mr. Chubb's[70] writings which leads his flock astray. He was succeeded by Rev. Richard Marsden,[71] both minister and merchant, who supported himself by trade, made voyages to Lisbon and England, owned a vessel and preached without pay. He was there till July 7, 1735, having been there in the colony[72] near seven years. Rev. James Moir came next in 1742, and March 26, 1745, tells us he lodges in a garret a little house which serves as a chapel Sundays and a school house during the week. He eats at the tavern among a rough set and his slave cooks his own food out of doors in all weather. Mr. Moir left Brunswick[73] in 1746. Rev. Mr. Bevis arrived in 1746, and was there two years; preached at the court-house; had much to suffer, neither a home provided nor parish laws observed. Then came Rev. Mr. Cramp and Rev. John McDowell. The latter, in his will, directs[73] that he be buried[74] at the east end of the church near the grave of his wife, Sarah, and leaves his infant son to the care of the Governor and his uncle, John Grange, and requests that he be brought up under Mr. Richard Quince and his sons as a merchant.

The church at Brunswick was erected in 1751, and its walls still remain in very good condition. Cedar trees have sprung up within with spreading boughs which call to mind the arches of some gothic temple over which is spread a leafy canopy. Standing within the walls, one can well exclaim with the prophet: "Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God," for here it is verily true.

The church appears to have been built due north and south by an accurate astronomical observation. The building is seventy-six feet long by fifty-four feet and three inches wide, windows fifteen feet high by seven feet wide, walls two feet and nine inches thick, and the height thereof is twenty-four feet and four inches. There are eleven windows and three doors, and the floor was a tesselated pavement made of square Dutch tiles. Notwithstanding that there is a graveyard around the church, most of the dead are buried at the plantations, for the Act of 1741 required the owners of every plantation to set apart a piece of land for burial of dead Christians, free and bond.

In 1760, an Act called the Lottery Act was passed to raise funds to furnish the churches at Brunswick and Wilmington, and appropriated the proceeds of the sale of the pirates into slavery, and their personal effects captured in 1748, for the same purpose.

The minister and his family now resided in the town. On Sundays, court days, or holidays, the planters and their wives and families came to town either for religious service or social pleasures, business or friendly intercourse with neighbors. Sunday laws were read in the churches twice a year by the minister, clerk or reader, under a penalty for neglect of twenty shillings for the benefit of the parish. Among the tombs near old St. Philip's we still find some worthy of notice for they will eventually crumble into dust like their inmates. The Hon. William Dry, Jr., who moved here from Goose Creek, South Carolina, in 1736, was collector of the port and a member of the council, died June 3, 1795. Rebecca McGuire, daughter of William Dry, Jr., and wife of Thomas McGuire, Attorney-General. Jane Quince, wife of John Quince, died in 1765. John Lord, a native of the town of Brunswick, died August 28, 1831, aged 66 years. William Hill died August 23, 1783, and his wife, Margaret, died November 3, 1788. John Guerard,[75] "for many years an inhabitant of Cape Fear, snatched by a sudden stroke of fate from life April 25, 1789." Elizabeth Guerard died June 30, 1775, aged 18 years. Elizabeth Eagen died June, 1785, aged 60 years. Benjamin Smith, "of Belvidere, once Governor of North Carolina, died January 10, 1826." Mary Jane Dry, wife of William Dry, Jr., born January 21, 1729, died April 3, 1795. Mary Quince, wife of Richard Quince, died 1762. Elizabeth Lord died February 26, 1847. Mary Bacot died August 29, 1838, aged 75 years. Peter Maxwell, of Glasgow, died at Wilmington September 23, 1812, aged 59 years, and wife, Rebecca Maxwell, died February 12, 1810.

In 1736 and 1746, vessels with Scotch Highlanders came but were advised to move to the up country where land was cheaper and better. It is said that their queer costumes, braw manners and shrill pipes unsettled the nerves of our Wilmington people.

In 1740, war was formally declared between England and Spain. Governor Johnston was active in raising troops to invade the Spanish colonies. Even as early as June, 1739, letters of mark and reprisal were issued to privateers. November 5, 1740, transports left Brunswick with four companies of troops for Florida, and early the following year they arrived at Jamaica, joined Admiral Vernon and sailed for Carthagena, but we have scant reports of their fate. We know that Col. James Innes, Robert Halton and Lieut. Benjamin Heron were on the expedition and that the latter returned home by way of England. We also find numerous deeds of assignment of prize money during the following years, among them Isaac Lewis, Owen Jones, James Small, Robert Page, George Chapman, Gideon Stubbs, James Hardy, John Brown, William Purdie and other mariners.

In 1743, South Carolina asked the assistance of troops to meet the Spanish invasion from Cuba, and a thousand men were promised on condition that they should be commanded by an officer of this province, and Colonel Maurice Moore was chosen to command.

October, 1745, a squadron[76] from Havana entered the Cape Fear and burned the town of Brunswick.

In July, 1747, the Council directed[77] a fort to be built, and the Island[78] north of Oak Island was selected, and in September South Carolina offered[79] them ten pieces of ordnance, nine and twelve pounders and ammunition.

In 1745, an Act was passed to encourage the rebuilding of the town of Brunswick, also an Act which recites[80] that in view of the well known depth of water of the Cape Fear and its defenceless condition, a fort was ordered to be built to be called Fort Johnston to contain at least twenty-four cannon, and Governor Johnston, Nathaniel Rice, Robert Halton, Eliezer Allen, Matthew Rowan, Major John Swann and George Moore were appointed commissioners to erect the same.

September 17, 1747, John Ellis[81] in an affidavit at Brunswick stated that he sailed in June on the brigantine John Williams, Thomas Corbett Master, and that they were captured by the Spanish privateer, St. Gabriel the Conqueror, and sent to Hispaniola but retaken and sent to St. Simons; that the brigantine belonged to Rev. Richard Marsden.

November 8, 1748,[82] two pirate ships came up the Cape Fear, trained their guns upon the town of Brunswick and threatened to sack the town unless a ransom was paid. The inhabitants, without means of defense, were demoralized and fled to the woods, but the town was saved by the explosion of the magazine in one of the vessels, and the people taking courage boarded[83] the other vessel and captured it. The prisoners were sold into slavery and with the proceeds of the sale of their personal property there was realized a fund which by an Act was afterwards applied to finish the churches of St. Philip and of St. James. An "Ecce Homo"[84] still hangs in the vestry room of St. James Church, at Wilmington, taken from this pirate ship, supposed to have been from the plunder of some Spanish church.

From stray leaves of records of the old Court of Common Pleas of the town of Brunswick, 1738, we observe that the court was presided over by Nathaniel Rice, Matthew Rowan, Eliezer Allen, Robert Halton, James Innes and Cornelius Harnett and others. Deeds were proved before the court and among them a power of attorney from George Burrington to his wife, Mary. Nicholas Fox produced a license to practice as attorney in the province from the governor. Complaint is made of citizens obstructing public docks and landings with lumber in front of the town; beef brought to market without exhibiting ear marks and brands complained of; keeping hogs and swine in town was forbidden. Several persons warned against selling liquor in the town and county at exorbitant price to the great damage of artificers and laboring men. Tax levied to build court-house and jail. C. Harnett made sheriff. Rev. Mr. Marsden ordered to appear before the court for building his cellar in the street, and erecting an oven in the street, fails to appear and sends certificate from Dr. Roger Rolfe, of Wilmington, that he is ill.

Governor Johnston died July 17, 1752. Nathaniel Rice, the president of the council, succeeded but died January 25, 1753, and Matthew Rowan succeeded till the appointment of Governor Arthur Dobbs, who was sworn in at New Bern, October 15, 1754. He was an Irishman and formerly a member of the Irish Parliment and a man of education. He fitted out a galley[85] sent to discover the northwest passage. He was a correspondent of the Geographical Society and of Rev. William Wetstein,[86] chaplain of his R. H., the Prince of Wales, and wrote several letters upon the course of the Gulf stream.

"O, what an endless work I have in hand," as well count the sea's abundant progeny as continue longer on this theme. More could be told of John Dalrymple, commander of Fort Johnston, Governor Dobbs and Governor Tryon, the Stamp Act, Governor Martin, formerly Lieutenant Colonel 86th[87] Regiment of Foot; the proclamation of George II, as King at Brunswick, of Cornwallis and Clinton, Harnett and Ancrum, of Howe, Ashe, Waddell and Moore, of the remains of the old houses, ruins of St. Philip's Church, the tombs and marble slabs with inscriptions that not only bespeak the memory of the dead but their intelligence and refinement, and may the inscription on the grave of young Rebecca McGuire "quisquis hoc marmor sustulerit ultimus suorum moriatur" adjure us to guard these ancient ruins and the traditions and memories of all who lived there as monuments of our race.

AUTHORITIES CITED IN THE FOREGOING ARTICLE.

[1] World's Discoverers, by Wm. H. Johnson, with Verrazano's map, p. 185.

[2] Col. Rec., N. C., Vol. I, p. 43. Proposal of Lords Proprietors.

[3] Col. Rec., I, p. 53.

[4] Term used by Barbadoes Explorers, 1663.

[5] Col. Rec., I, p. 35. Samuel Vassal, Assignee.

[6] Col. Rec., I, p. 161.

[7] Col. Rec., I, p. 73. John Vassal, Surveyor-Gen. Cape Fear.

[8] Col. Rec., I, p. 56. Landed at Old Town (Charlestown) 29th May, 1664.

[9] Col. Rec., I, pp. 119 and 116. Sanford, etc.

[10] Col. Rec., I, p. 120.

[11] Col. Rec., I, p. 154. Cotton, etc.

[12] Professor Rivers some time ago earnestly denied this, but we have not agreed with him.

[13] Col. Rec., I, p. 165. Souls.

[14] Col. Rec., I, p. 145.

[15] Thomas Wentworth Higginson, in allusion to the monument of a Madam Ann Vassal, widow of John Vassal, at Cambridge, says:

"At her feet and at her head Lies a slave to attend the dead."

Another of these adventurers has left a record. In Suffolk, Mass., Probate Records, Vol. I, p. 536, is a will of George Davis, dated December 7, 1664, proved September, 1667; says he is bound for Cape Fear, mentioned his sons Benjamin and Joseph, his five daughters, when they come of age, his wife and brother, Wm. Clark of Linn. Probate records give inventory of goods of George Davis, lately deceased at Cape Fear.

[16] New Hanover Co. Records, C, p. 74. Smith grant mentioned.

[17] This family of Moores are said to be descended from Roger Moore, leader of the Irish Rebellion in 1641. James Moore came to America, settled in Charleston, and was Governor of South Carolina in 1700.

[18] Col. Rec., I, p. 154. Also mentioned by Lawson, p. 269, who said: "We have clothes of our own manufacture of cotton, wool, hemp and flax of our own growth." Hon W. B. Seabrook, in an address before the South Carolina Agricultural Society, December, 1843, mentions this as the first recorded evidence of its cultivation in America. We also find that M. Le Page Du Pratz, 1758, in his History of Louisiana, p. 323, refers to the cotton raised in that country as the Siam or Turkey cotton, which is a green-seeded cotton, and this also was attempted in Virginia, but with indifferent success.

[19] Acts 1711 and 1715, to raise money by duties on liquors and other goods.

[20] Col. Rec., II, pp. 480 and 481.

[21] Col. Rec., II, p. 596.

[22] Col. Rec., XI, p. 128. Gents. Magazine, 1756.

[23] Col. Rec., ... Records A, p. 102, New Hanover County.

[24] Rec. New Hanover Co., A, p. 93.

[25] Col. Rec., XI, p. 128.

[26] Col. Rec., II, p. 596.

[27] Records New Hanover Co., D, pp. 512 and 403; Col. Rec., III, p. 63.

[28] See Wimble's Map.
[29] Col. Rec., III, p. 436.
[30] Col. Rec., III, pp. 63 and 30.
[31] Everard to John Bell, N. H. Co., p. 172; Lockwood's Folly and A, p. 93.
[32] I am of the opinion that she was the Widow Moore for which Moore's Creek was named. She was Justina Moore, sixth child of Landgrave Thomas Smith 2nd, and who married John Moore, seventh son of the first Governor Jas. Moore.
[33] Col. Rec., III, p. 575, Acts Assembly 1736, chapter 8.
[34] Revised Stats. N. C., Vol. II, p. 21.
[35] Rev. Stats. N. C., II, p. 466.
[36] Gentleman's Magazine, 1756.
[37] Acts 1729, 34 Geo. II.
[38] A valuable table of exports and imports of Carolina from 1663 to 1773 will be found in the American Museum, Nov. 1789, pp. 400, 401.
[39] New Hanover Co., A, p. 342.
[40] New Hanover Co., D, p. 403.
[41] Col. Rec., IV, p. 6.
[42] Col. Rec., V, p. 158.
[43] New Hanover Co., A, p. 313, and Col. Rec., XI, p. .....
[44] Gents. Magazine, 1756.
[45] Col. Rec., XI, p. .....
[46] Col. Rec., XI, pp. 128 and 148.
[47] Col. Rec., XI, p. 18, and Col. Rec., III, p. 137 and 147.
[48] See 47.
[49] From two deeds of lease and release in New Hanover Co., dated 10th and 11th April, 1754, "Geo. Burrington, late Governor, etc., now residing in the Parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the County of Middlesex," conveyed to Samuel Strudwick his lands on Northeast Cape Fear, called "Stag Park," of 10,000 acres, and lands on the Northwest Cape Fear called "Hawol Fields" (Hawfields) of 30,000 acres. This deed mentions that by letters patent dated 29th April, 1730, he had been appointed Governor with a salary of 700 pounds per annum, to be paid quarterly by John Hammerton, Esq., Receiver-General; that he was still in arrearage 3,325 pounds, and in consideration of advancement by Edw. Strudwick, the father of Samuel Strudwick, of Mortimer street, in the Parish of St. Mary Le Bow, in said County of Middlesex, he makes that conveyance. It is acknowledged before the Lord Mayor in the Mansion House, April 11, 1754. His wife was Mary Burrington, and proved a deed in Brunswick County. Moseley speaks well of Burrington. Col. Rec., III, p. 137.
[50] Since March 25, 1739, called Sheriff. Acts 1738, chap. 3.
[51] Her will (New Hanover Co., C, p. 328,) mentions her grandson, C. Harnett, Jr.
[52] J H. Wheeler in South Atlantic, 1879.
[53] .....
[54] Col. Rec., V, p. 1137.
[55] Encyc. Brit., 9th Ed., under United States, p. 177.
[56] Other references as to Education may be found in Col. Rec., V, pp. 288, 289, 298, 280, 281, 1160, 1225, and Col. Rec., VI, p. 477.
[57] Col. Rec., V, pp. 144b and 306.
[58] Col. Rec., VI, p. 477.
[59] Col. Rec., III, pp. 642, 633 and 626.
[60] Gents. Mag., 1733, and Col. Rec., III, p. 630.

[61] Col. Rec., IV, p. 375—Thomas Clifford, receiver of powder money at Brunswick.
[62] Col. Rec., IV, pp. 226 and 271.
[63] First Masonic Lodge at Brunswick, 1733, No. 113, called "King Solomon Lodge."
[64] Col. Rec., IV, p. 338.
[65] Col. Rec., IV, p. 44, Wilmington.
[66] Col. Rec., IV, p. 235. See Acts 1736.
[67] Col. Rec., IV, p. 456.
[68] Col. Rec., IV, pp. 424 and 415.
[69] Col. Rec., III, pp. 350 and 391.
[70] At that time a prominent deist in England.
[71] Col. Rec., III, pp. 350 and 391; New Hanover Co., C, p. 62.
[72] Col. Rec., IV, p. 10.
[73] Col. Rec., IV, p. 875, and Vol. III, pp. 391 and 350; New Hanover, C, p. 62.
[74] Col. Rec., IV, pp. 755, 605, 606, 608.
[75] Col. Rec., I, p. 242; a Normandy family.
[76] Moore's Hist. N. C., Vol. I, p. 41, Vol. 4. p. 1306.
[77] Col. Rec., IV, p. 700.
[78] Col. Rec., IV, p. 702.
[79] Col. Rec., V, p. 38.
[80] Acts 1745, chap. 6.
[81] New Hanover Co., C, p. 133.
[82] Col. Rec., V, pp. 38 and 72.
[82] Col. Rec., V, pp. 38 and 72. Also Gents. Mag., 1749, in an account of this attack says one vessel escaped, and that 60 were blown up, 20 killed, 37 taken prisoners. One American—a pilot—missing.
[83] Col. Rec., IV, pp. 991, 1284, 922, 1300, 1306.
[84] See History of St. James Church.
[85] Gents. Mag., 1749, June.
[86] Gents. Mag., Dec., 1749.
[87] London Mag., 1764.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEOLOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

JOHN DILLARD BELLAMY.

Born in Wilmington, March 24, 1854; graduated at Davidson College, N. C., 1873; B.L.; University of Virginia, 1875; married December 6, 1876, Emma M. Hargrove. He served as City Attorney of Wilmington, 1881; was a member of the State Senate, 1891; delegate to National Convention of the Democratic party, 1892; member of Congress, 1879-1903, Sixth North Carolina District.

Mr. Bellamy's painstaking elaboration of the life and services of Gen. Robert Howe will be read with interest, as the life and sacrifices of the distinguished man have not received heretofore the just amount of notice that should have been accorded him. Since the great revival in historic interest and research, many important facts have been secured from musty documents, old letters, and other data. North Carolina is awaking to her duty. The ignorance that has prevailed as to the facts of our colonial settlements is being dispelled by our educators. A North Carolina Day has been established by act of General Assembly, and for the last six years an appropriate program has been arranged, treating of some especial section; its settlement, and brief histories of the distinguished men of the period. This pamphlet was compiled with great care by the Superintendent of Public Instruction and sent out to the public schools with the hope of inspiring the children with a new pride in their State and a new enthusiasm for the study of her history. The subjects treated followed the chronological order of the State's history. THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, from its first inception in 1901 has had in view the emphasizing and putting into convenient form great events in the State's history. It is acknowledged that this publication is doing as much for the education of the public in a historical way as any magazine in the State. The financial support of the public is solicited.

In addition to the above, and in this connection, I must not fail to mention the activities of the State Literary and Historical Association, which is doing such steady and efficient work collecting and preserving our State literature and history. Its object is the encouragement of public and school libraries; the establishment of a historical museum; the inculcation of a literary spirit among our people; the correction of printed misrepresentations concerning North Carolina; and the engendering of an intelligent, healthy State pride in the rising generation. Under the control of an active, intelligent, painstaking Board of Managers, this Association is advocating the establishment of a State Archives and Hall of Records.

WILLIAM KENNETH BOYD.

William Kenneth Boyd, author of "Early Relations of North Carolina and the West," was born in the State of Missouri in 1879, the son of Rev. H. M. Boyd (Presbyterian) and Mary Black Boyd. In 1888 his family removed to Western North Carolina, in search of a better climate, and located at Weaverville. His preparatory education was secured at Weaverville College, and in 1897 he graduated from Trinity College with the degree of A.B., and received his A.M. degree in 1898. He was then Master in History and Latin in the Trinity Park High School for the first two years of its existence (1898-1900). In 1900 he entered Columbia University as Scholar in History; in 1902-'03 he was Fellow in European History, in 1903-'04 Fellow by Courtesy, and in 1906 received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In 1904-'05 Mr. Boyd was a member of the editorial staff of the Encyclopedia Britannica (Tenth Edition), in 1905-'06 he was Instructor in History in Dartmouth College, and in 1906 he accepted the Chair of History in Trinity College, where he had formerly, for one year (1901-1902), been Adjunct Professor of History.

Besides the present article, Mr. Boyd has contributed the following studies in North Carolina history and biography: "John S. Cairns, Ornithologist," "Dennis Heartt," "William W. Holden," "Nathaniel Macon in National Legislation," "Advalorem Slave Taxation," "Letters of Bedford Brown."

All of these have appeared in the Papers of the Trinity College Historical Society (Series I-VI). He will also contribute the sketch of William Gaston to the forthcoming Library of Southern Literature, with which Prof. C. Alphonso Smith is connected as associate editor. He has promised a study of the Battle of Kings Mountain for a future number of THE BOOKLET.

Besides these North Carolina studies, Mr. Boyd has published a monograph, "Ecclesiastical Edicts of the Theodosian Code," (Columbia University Studies in History, Economics and Public Law, 1906), and has contributed the following articles to The South Atlantic Quarterly: "Alfred the Great as Legislator," Vol. I, No. 1; "Southern History in American Universities," Vol. I, No. 2; "Christian Persecutions and Roman Jurisprudence," Vol. II, No. 1; "Theodore Mommsen: His Place in Modern Scholarship," Vol. III, No. 3; "Dunning's History of Reconstruction," Vol. VI, No. 4.

Mr. Boyd, though not a native of North Carolina, has imbibed that spirit of research which is now pervading this section of the South. The day has passed when men are more ready to handle the sword than to wield the pen; conditions have changed, the hand of the educator has grappled the pen, old dusty manuscripts are being brought to light, the many stories of traditional lore of her unparalleled record are being corroborated by documentary evidence, and simple truth will be thus enthroned, which is the highest ambition of patriotic North Carolinians.

WILLIAM B. McKOY.

Author of the article, "Incidents in the Early Settlement of the Cape Fear."

Wm. B. McKoy was born in Wilmington, N. C., December 24, 1852; went to school in Wilmington; graduated at the College of New Jersey (Princeton) in 1876; studied law under Hon. Geo. V. Strong in Raleigh, N. C.; licensed to practice law in 1879; sworn in as a member of the bar at Rockingham, Richmond County, N. C., same year; since practiced law in Wilmington. He is from a long line of ancestors loyal and patriotic. His paternal ancestor in America was John McKay (now McKoy), who was sent out of Scotland after 1746 as an active adherent of Prince Charlie; settled in Bladen County; moved thence to Iredell County. On his maternal side his earliest ancestor in America was Col. Wm. Rhett, of Charleston, S. C. He is also a descendant of James Hasell and Charles Berry, two Chief Justices of the Province of North Carolina.

District Attorney Chairman Democratic Party

Mr. McKoy is Senior Grand Warden of the Grand Lodge of Free Masons, a place he fills with great ability.

Mr. McKoy having been a life-long resident of Wilmington, the chief town of the Cape Fear, he is familiar with its history and traditions. No more patriotic people ever lived than those of this section, and this patriotism has descended from generation to generation, dating from the first permanent settlements made in 1663. Mr. McKoy, like many others of this present day of educational awakening, is discharging a conscientious and patriotic duty to his State by publishing an article additional to what has heretofore been published concerning the history of this section.

The long struggle of this American colony on the shores of North Carolina, dating from 1554 to 1775, is hardly equaled by any other; but those days were not without their good results. It was the formative period in moulding the character of the people, and to-day there is no State that can boast of a purer Anglo-Saxon race (having the smallest percentage of foreign born citizens of any State in the Union), and a people more devoted to their State and its history. Though long in asserting her rightful place as one of the leaders in colonization and in achieving independence, her great citizenship is now awake to the importance of writing her history. This great renewal of interest in North Carolina history may be attributed to the publication of the Colonial Records, that admirable work ordered by the State and undertaken by Col. William L. Saunders.

Colonel Saunders, as Secretary of State, saw too plainly the necessity of collecting and preserving full and complete records of North Carolina, therefore he took upon himself this self-imposed task from love for his native State.

At a period somewhat prior to his death in 1891, these Records, reaching from the beginnings of the Province, 1662, down to and inclusive of the year 1776, filling ten large folio volumes, were suspended. In 1893 the Trustees of the State Library invited Judge Walter Clark to assume the continuation of the work. This he has done, beginning from the year 1776, completing the period to 1781, as authorized by The Code, and continuing under the title of State Records, filling sixteen large folio volumes, including the laws of the the Province and State from 1663 to 1791, and also an index.

To Colonel Saunders and Judge Clark the State owes a debt of gratitude beyond estimation. These Records are of immeasurable value to the student of history and a capital source of stimulation to the young. THE BOOKLET has a promise of an article on this gigantic work.

Even the women of this Commonwealth, through their historical organizations, are awaking to the duty of impressing upon the youth of our land the part they must perform in order to perpetuate our history. It was a noble work of the Colonial Dames of North Carolina in erecting, in 1907, on a public square in Wilmington, a monument to "Cornelius Harnett and the Colonial Heroes of the Cape Fear." In Vol. V, No. 3, of THE BOOKLET, may be found an interesting sketch of Cornelius Harnett, the pride of the Cape Fear, who was styled "the Samuel Adams of North Carolina," written by R. W. D. Connor. It is well to mention here that THE BOOKLET contains other articles of great historical value relating to this part of North Carolina, Colonial and Revolutionary, as follows: Vol. I, No. 3, "Stamp Act on the Cape Fear," by Hon. A. M. Waddell; Vol. II, No. 10, "County of Clarendon," by John Spencer Bassett; Vol. III, No. 11, "Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge," by Prof. M. C. S. Noble; Vol. VI, No. 1, "A Colonial Admiral of the Cape Fear," by James Sprunt. All of which can be obtained from the publishers except No. 3, of Vol. I, which is out of print.

The North Carolina Booklet

A QUARTERLY PUBLICATION ISSUED UNDER
THE AUSPICES OF THE

"NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION"

THIS PUBLICATION treats of important events in North Carolina History, such as may throw light upon the political, social or religious life of the people of this State during the Colonial and Revolutionary periods, in the form of monographs written and contributed by as reliable and painstaking historians as our State can produce. The Sixth Volume began in July, 1906.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

One Year, One Dollar; Single Copies, Thirty-five Cents.

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E. E. Moffitt, Editors, Raleigh, North Carolina.

Registered at Raleigh Post-office as second class matter.

Notice should be given if the subscription is to be discontinued. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

All communications relating to subscriptions should be sent to

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton,
Midway Plantation, Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VII. APRIL, 1908 No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

GREAT EVENTS IN NORTH CAROLINA HISTORY

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY
BY
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

CONTENTS

	Page
St. James's Churchyard (A Poem) - - - - - By Mrs. Lula Clark Markham	245
The Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry - - By James C. MacRae	248
The Expedition Against the Row Galley, "General Arnold" --A Side-light on Colonial Edenton - - - By Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D.	267
The Quakers of Perquimans - - - - - - By Julia S. White	278
An Early Peace Society in North Carolina - - By Marshall DeLancey Haywood	290
Biographical and Geneological Memoranda - - By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt	301
Abstracts of Wills Previous to 1760 - - - By Mrs. H. DeB. Wills	310

SINGLE NUMBERS 35 CENTS $1.00 THE YEAR

ENTERED IN THE POST-OFFICE AT RALEIGH, N. C., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

The North Carolina Booklet.

Great Events in North Carolina History.

THE BOOKLET will be issued quarterly by the North Carolina Society Daughters of the Revolution, beginning July, 1908. Each BOOKLET will contain three articles and will be published in July, October, January, and April. Price, $1.00 per year, 35 cents for single copy.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VOLUME VIII.

1. John Harvey.....Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
2. An Early North Carolina Peace Movement, 1819-1823.
   Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
3. The Historical Movement in North Carolina.
4. North Carolina Women of the Revolution.....Dr. Richard Dillard.
5. Battle of Kings Mountain.....Dr. William K. Boyd.
6. Convention of 1835.....Judge Henry G. Connor.
7. General Thomas Person.....Dr. J. G. de Roulhac Hamilton.
8. Schools and Education in Colonial Times, Dr. Charles Lee Smith.
9. Reprint of Reverend George Micklejohn's Sermon before Tryon's Army—May, 1771.
10. General Jethro Sumner.....Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
11. Historic Duels of North Carolina.....Mr. F. M. Harper.
12. Our Colonial Historians: Hakluyt, Lawson, Brickle, Williamson
    Rt. Reverend Joseph Blount Cheshire, D.D.

THE BOOKLET will contain short biographical sketches of the writers who have contributed to this publication, by Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

THE BOOKLET will print abstracts of wills prior to 1760, as sources of biography, history and genealogy, by Mrs. Helen DeB. Wills.

Parties who wish to renew their subscriptions to THE BOOKLET for Vol. VIII, are requested to give notice at once.

Address

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON,

"MIDWAY PLANTATION,"

Raleigh, N. C.

Vol. VII. APRIL, 1908. No. 4

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MISS LOUISE PITTINGER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VII APRIL, 1908 No. 4

SAINT JAMES'S CHURCHYARD.

BY MRS. LULA CLARK MARKHAM.

A bit of ancient England dropped adown
Amid these alien streets,
Where 'neath the soft, blue, Southern sky, there beats
The throbbing life-tide of the crude New World:
The old gray church keeps guard, o'erblown
By winds of many winters; here have been unfurled
The sunset banners of an hundred years;
On these old, leveled, grass-grown graves the tears
Were dried a long, long century ago.

With stately step and slow,
O'er the smooth velvet of this grassy aisle,
Perchance the proud Cornwallis walked, the while Pondering his lofty dreams of power and fame
And thinking of the waters, vast and gray,
Which stretched their stormy leagues between
This untamed land and his loved island, fair and green;
It may be that a grim
Foreboding came of sore defeat and shame
To cloud his haughty brow, an augury
Of dire disaster waiting him
At Yorktown far away.

Past these gray walls the Redcoats marched one day
With measured step and glittering swords aglow,
Unwitting that for them the end was nigh
Of weary warfare; that they marched to meet
In one last test their scorned, provincial foe,
To lay their proud swords at those ragged feet.

And here to-day one lies
Wrapped in his garb of glory for a shroud.
The careless, bubble-seeking crowd
Goes idly by, and recks not that the eyes
Here closed in sleep once flashed with ardor bright
To lead the blind young nation to the light:
The lofty brow that long has turned to dust
Wrought in its fervid brain the daring dream
Of liberty triumphant in a proud, august,
Great nation born of great souls like his own.
He was the White Knight of undimmed renown;
Patriot, soldier, statesman, not a gleam
Of wealth or fame allured him, and he swerved
Not from his chosen path although it led Through sacrifice and loss, through doubt and dread,
Content if but his country's cause were served.

We can not tell to what far distant stars
His bark of life was steered so long ago;
On what high embassies he has been sent, what holy wars
For truth and right awaited him; we know
That here each flower, each crystal drop of dew
Is a white message from the heart of him,
Each buoyant breeze that sweeps in from the sea
Is whispering of his golden dreams come true,
Each radiant star that lights the evening's blue
Forever keeps his name from growing dim.
And while yon marble finger silently
Points to the heaven which claimed him for its own,
While one leal, Southern heart holds on its throne
The love of country and of right,
The fearless scorn of tyrrany and might,
Cornelius Harnett lives and can not die.

And so, year after year, till ages have gone by,
These ancient graves will wait the mighty word,
When with his trumpet blast, the Angel of the Lord,
With one foot on the sea and one upon the shore,
Proclaims "Time was, time is, but time shall be no more!"
And those who sleep below so tranquilly
Through their hushed hearts will feel the thrill of birth
Which wakes to find new heavens and new earth.

THE FAYETTEVILLE INDEPENDENT LIGHT INFANTRY COMPANY.

BY JAMES C. MACRAE,
(Dean of Law School, University of North Carolina.)

"He that hath no stomach for this fight let him depart."

The last decade of the Eighteenth Century was a time of trouble and perplexity to the young Republic which had so recently achieved its independence and taken place among the Nations.

Indeed, from the peace of 1783 to the defeat of Packenham, some thirty years later, the permanent existence of the United States was an unsolved problem. Threatened on the one side by the ill-concealed enmity of its former sovereign, and urged, on the other, by the officious efforts of its former friend and ally to embroil it in foreign wars. With no standing army, a long and unprotected coast line, and a small, though gallant, naval armament, its hope and reliance was upon its citizen soldiery.

North Carolina was, at the end of the century, one of the strongest States in the Union, with all the elements of future prosperity. It had no cities nor large towns in its borders, but it had a population filled with the spirit of liberty. It was in those early days when the life of the Republic seemed threatened with foreign wars that the town of Fayetteville on the twenty-third of August, 1793, called its young men together to organize a volunteer military company.

Robert Adam, a young Scotch merchant, was elected Captain, John Winslow, Lieutenant, and Robert Cochran, Ensign. These were leading citizens of Fayetteville in their day, and up to the present time their successors have been the worthiest representatives of their community.

This sketch is largely made from an address delivered on the occasion of the Centennial of the Company, with such addenda as may embrace some reference to the very important public services rendered by the Company since the close of its first century. A history of the organization would require much larger space than has been allotted to this paper, but the archives of the command contain full records and rosters, and one may find in several instances five generations of Fayetteville men upon its rolls.

The characteristic of this organization from its inception may be summed up in the word, duty. Its leaders and promoters were men of intelligence and position.

It was not formed for the simple purpose of giving grace to holiday pageants, but for the defense of the people in their rights and liberties.

It realized the true conception of a citizen soldiery; for its members were citizens as well as soldiers.

The same spirit which induced them to submit to discipline, that they might become efficient soldiers, led them also to take up the responsibilities incident to citizenship, without the bearing of which there can be no real enjoyment of the benefits of good government.

So, they were the upholders of law and order, and in times of agitation were ever ready to preserve the peace.

The strength and value of a military organization in a community, under the direction of cool and intrepid men (for with any other leaders they become a firebrand and a source of anxiety and of danger), can only be fully appreciated by those whose business it has been to execute the laws.

In times of excitement, when there is danger of some outbreak of popular violence, the advantage of an organized body of disciplined men, under proper officers, to be called out in the last resort, is simply incalculable.

The community whose foremost men constitute such a body is comparatively safe from intestine trouble.

The machinery of the civil law is ordinarily all-sufficient in itself.

A very large majority of the people are obedient to law, and it is an easy matter, when public sentiment is rightly directed, to administer the same for the welfare of all concerned.

But men, taken collectively, are sometimes, like the individual, overborne by passion; and while under its impulse they may break down the barriers which ages of exertion and sacrifice have built up around their liberties.

It is on occasions of such temporary bursts of lawlessness which are liable to occur in human society that it becomes necessary, under our system, to call in the citizen soldiers to assist the civil arm.

The great efficiency of the State Guard of North Carolina to-day is attested by the fact that it is so seldom necessary to bring them into actual aid of the civil authority.

So potent is their influence that the bare knowledge that such an organization is in existence and ready for action at a moment's warning, is sufficient in general to prevent any serious outbreak. Such has been the happy case of this community for all these hundred years.

For most of this period there have been other military companies here just as good and just as true, which, in the mutations of time, have risen and flourished and passed away, but this old company has lived through every change.

With the exception of those occasions when it was absent in active service, and when, in the overpowering calamity which fell upon us all, we were deprived of our arms, it has ever been the bulwark of these people's safety and the nucleus around which they might rally for defence.

It was organized in those unsettled times when the States of the American Union, having just emerged from the seven years struggle for freedom, each found itself face to face with the great problems of government which, pending the conflict, had been held in abeyance; political feeling ran high; the spirit of peace had not yet calmed the passions of the recent combatants; and it seemed that the new and scarce formed nation was about to face as enemies those who had been its recent friends and allies. The first apparent necessity was the establishment of an armed militia for protection against all foes, both foreign and domestic.

It was then, before the laws which were soon after passed for its organization, that this company was brought into existence.

And on July 23, 1807, when a second war with England was imminent and the President had warned the militia to be in readiness for an emergency, this company tendered him its services in the following resolution which was communicated to the President:

Resolved unanimously, That we very much admire, and highly approve of the dignified, manly and independent sentiments contained in the proclamation of the President of the United States; and having observed that he has ordered the raising of 100,000 militia, to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning, and it is his pleasure to accept Volunteers to compose a part thereof.

Resolved unanimously, That the Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry Company, officers and soldiers voluntarily tender their services, with this declaration that although as citizens, they highly appreciate the blessings of peace, yet, as citizen soldiers, they are ever ready to avenge an insult offered to their country by any nation whatever, and pledge themselves to be ready, whenever called upon, for the defense of such measures as may be adopted by the Government.

In acknowledgment of this tender Mr. Jefferson, under his own hand, wrote as follows:

To Captain John McMillan and the Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry Company:

The offer of your services in support of the rights of your country merits the highest praise. And whenever the moment arrives in which these rights must appeal to the public arm for support, the spirit from which your offer flows, that which animates our nation, will be their sufficient safeguard.

NORTH CAROLINA STATE LIBRARY.

To the legislature wil be rendered a faithful account of the events which have so justly excited the sensibilities of our country, of the measures taken to obtain reparation and of their result; and to their wisdom will belong the course to be ultimately pursued.

In the meantime it is our duty to pursue that prescribed by the existing laws, toward which should your services be requisite, this offer of them wil be remembered.

I tender for your country the thanks you so justly deserve.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

WASHINGTON, July 31, 1807.

In 1813, when the enemy threatened to make a landing on our coast, it promptly marched to Wilmington, and there was the special bodyguard of Governor Hawkins, the Commander-in-Chief of the North Carolina forces. Upon the conclusion of its tour of service it was relieved from duty in the following communication:

To Lieutenant WM. BARRY GROVE.

SIR:—I am commanded by his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief of the state of North Carolina, to express through you to the officers and privates of your company, the very high approbation which they merit, and which they have met with, for their prompt and soldier-like march to one of the vulnerable points of our state when it was invaded. And to his Excellency it is a high gratification that all composing your company have done all that could be expected from officers and soldiers. Stimulated by this laudable example, it is confidently hoped the militia of the state of North Carolina will derive much benefit.

On your arrival in the town of Fayetteville you will dismiss from duty the members composing your company. I am, with much regard,

Your obedient servant, F. N. W. BURTON, Aid.

In 1825, it attended LaFayette upon his visit to Fayetteville, the name of this town having been changed in 1784 from Cross Creek to honor the distinguished soldier who had done so much to achieve for us our liberty.

In 1846, when North Carolina was called upon to send a regiment to Mexico, while it was, of course, impracticable that this company, composed as it was of the leading business and professional men of the town should go on foreign service, it sent out a noncommissioned officer, Sergeant W. E. Kirkpatrick, to take command of the Cumberland Company, F, of the North Carolina Regiment, as its Captain, advanced him to the same rank in its own company, and at the close of the Mexican war received him with distinguished honors.

In those peaceful days which followed, it continued to be the pride and glory of the town, ready in every emergency; foremost on every festive occasion—making casual visits to its brother commands in other towns, and keeping up its own esprit du corps by a generous rivalry with the other companies of the town.

On the 15th of April, 1861, after the Confederate States had been formed by the resumption of the sovereignty of the State of South Carolina and those to the south of her, President Lincoln issued his proclamation calling upon the States for 75,000 troops "to put down these combinations," and this was the declaration which brought about the war between the States.

Immediately upon the publication in Fayetteville of this proclamation, on the 17th day of April, the Independent Company unanimously tendered itself to the Governor of North Carolina to serve in opposition to the coercion policy of the Federal Government of which North Carolina was still a part.

Its tender was accepted, and its first service, in conjunction with the other companies of the town and county, was the taking possession of the United States Arsenal at Fayetteville, where it remained as guard until May 7, when, being relieved, it went into camp on Harrington Hill, and on the morning of the 9th of May, 108 strong it went to Raleigh, whither it had been preceded by the LaFayette Light Infantry, a magnificent company, with which it was at once embodied into the First Regiment of North Carolina Volunteers; and on the 20th of May, 1861, when the ordinance of secession was adopted by the people of North Carolina in convention at Raleigh, it was already tasting the never-to-be-forgotten hospitality of the people of Richmond in camp at Howard's Grove in that famous city.

Though it had offered itself for ten years or the war, it had been mustered in for six months. It served its term on the Peninsula; its regiment, having taken a leading part in the engagement at Big Bethel, received the name of the Bethel Regiment, which was retained by its successor, the 11th North Carolina Troops.

Upon the return of the company home at the end of six months, while its organization was retained, its members, many of them having been fitted for command by their service in the ranks, became officers in other companies and regiments and on the general staff.

Many entered the ranks of other commands and there illustrated the effect of the fine discipline to which they had been subjected under the tutelage of their old Regimental Commander, D. H. Hill.

A remnant remained at home and kept up the organization. Too few to form a separate company in the field, they performed a tour of duty at and near Fort Fisher, as part of the Clarendon Guards. For a few years after the close of the war they were not permitted to bear arms, but they kept their organization, meeting each year upon their annisary for that purpose. It was not long, however, before the federal troops were withdrawn, and the days of reconstruction were over, and at once they were re-equipped and armed.

In 1876 this company with its distinguished guests to-day, the Washington Light Infantry of Charleston, S. C., was part of the Centennial Legion, and assisted in the opening of the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, and before its return visited Boston by special invitation, where its officers and men were treated with marked consideration.

For some years it constituted the first company of the Second Regiment of the State Guard and attended the annual encampments, but upon the adoption by the Guard of a distinctive uniform for all its members, this company having been allowed by special legislation to select its own uniform and preferring to retain that which it wears to-day, became by order of the Commander-in-Chief, the late Governor Fowle, an unattached company of the North Carolina Troops.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA, GENERAL HEADQUARTERS, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
RALEIGH, May 3, 1890.

GENERAL ORDER NO. 6.

Company A, Second Regiment North Carolina State Guard, is allowed to withdraw from the State Guard and is restored to its former status as an independent Company, to be designated as the Fayetteville Light Infantry Company, under the Act of the General Assembly of 1819. It will be subject only to orders from the Commander-in-Chief.

It will retain the arms and equipment now in its possession, but the overcoats heretofore issued to it whilst a member of the State Guard will be returned to Col. F. A. Olds, Quartermaster General, who, upon receipt of the same will deliver to said Company the bond executed by said Company for said overcoats.

By order of the Commander-in-Chief.

JAMES D. GLENN,
Adjutant-General.

Recently it became again a company of the State Guard, and the question has arisen as to its right to wear the Confederate gray and is still unsettled.

No wonder, then, that with its record of long and faithful service, this ancient and honorable corps has become well known in North Carolina and beyond its borders. No wonder that it has been the recipient of marks of special regard from time to time at the hands of the Legislature.

In 1819 a joint resolution was passed by the General Assembly giving to its commanders the rank of Major and to its Lieutenants that of Captain "so long as the corps shall continue to hold itself armed and equipped agreeably to the tenor of its rules and regulations." As I had occasion to say in an address to this company on its 81st anniversary, in the year 1859 an act was passed to encourage this company, by the terms of which its officers and men were exempted from the performance of jury duty; but this favor was unanimously declined upon the ground that its duty as soldiers did not and ought not to relieve its members from any of the duties incident to citizenship.

Thus was evinced the high spirit of the corps and the devotion of its members to the performance of duty.

Could I recount to you the pleasant traditions and some of the peculiar customs pertaining to this company it might afford you some amusement, but they are already perpetuated in successive addresses which have been delivered on the former anniversaries.

Some day, and it is to be hoped at no great distance, your historian will gather them into a book and hand them down the line, that those who come after you may, like you, partake of the spirit of the fathers.

The last public act performed by this company was a few weeks ago in Raleigh, when it followed the remains of the great man who had been the President of the Confederate States, as they passed to their place at Hollywood, testifying the respect of its members for his memory, and seeking participation in whatever may be awarded of praise or blame to him who was the embodiment of all that was left of their common cause.

If by any strange mischance the career of this company was closed with its century of service, what an honorable end it would have reached before giving up its arms and passing into history, that its last act should have been to follow the bier of Jefferson Davis as it bore him to his eternal rest.

Organized, as this company was, a few years after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States by the State Convention assembled in this town, of the circumstances of which adoption, the fierce and bitter contest, the thorough discussion, and the guarantees of personal freedom and State autonomy required before final action, we have all been made quite familiar by the recent celebration in this place of its centennial, and the splendid oration there pronounced by Senator M. W. Ransom, and the impromptu speech of great merit by Senator Vance, the officers and men were thoroughly imbued with the first principles of loyalty to the State, which was its sovereign, except as to certain powers and jurisdictions for special purposes granted to the general government. They have ever been true to these traditions, and, recognizing certain changes tending to strengthen and perpetuate the union of sovereign States brought about by the submission of the question in dispute to the ultimate arbitrament of arms, they are, as ever, true and steadfast in their devotion to North Carolina and the Constitutional Union of which she now forms an independent and indestructible part.

No call has ever been made by the State authorities which this company has not obeyed with alacrity.

Distinguished among, and not above, its comrade companies by reason of its great age and repeated services; the last public relic of the hallowed past, except the venerable University which is its senior in years but is perennial in its strength and in the renewal of its youth; surviving the old Constitution, the best ever made for a free people; surviving the old judiciary system and the executive and legislative departments, for they all gave place in 1868 to the new ideas and forms of government begotten of the last revolution, it ought to have some mark by which it may be known among its fellows.

It might, under the special laws which govern it, have chosen to be recognized by the old uniform of blue and buff which it wore for many years. But when it came to take up its arms again after an enforced suspension, it was thought it might be well to cling to that garb which typified its greatest service to the commonwealth; it was thought that it might serve to teach the coming generations to revere the memory of the fathers who wore the gray; to know that there rests no stain of treason upon those who, clad in the Confederate colors, lost all but honor on the field of battle.

It was thought that it might further illustrate for those who shall see it march wherever duty calls in future years, that they who took the parole of honor to bear faithful allegiance to the United States were none the worse for the struggle they had made to compass the freedom of the State; that their patriotism was in no way weakened, and that the old company could be as instant in discharge of duty to constituted authority in this year of grace, 1893, as they were in the days of '61; that it might serve to bind to the grand future of a united and prosperous nation in the 20th Century the traditions of the no less glorious Confederacy, when the gray-clad soldier marched with Robert Lee and rode in the column where Wade Hampton led.

And so, at the sacrifice of much that was pleasant and companionable and profitable, this company, in no spirit of insubordination, but simply in the exercise of a discretion granted years ago by those who made the laws which govern us, has chosen to retain the gray uniform as an object lesson in the teaching of those things which will serve to lead enthusiastic youth to honor virtue and heroism, whether its reward is victory, or its issue death.

We are honored by the presence at our festival of comrades from Virginia and South Carolina whose splendid companies vie with ours in age and which, like ours, have renewed their youth and yet preserved the traditions of the early days of the Republic.

Each of them, like our own, has been the pride of its State and the honor of its community.

We have already welcomed them to the freedom of the city. We thank them for the soldierly distinction with which they have come to join us in the celebration of our natal day.

The Richmond Light Infantry Blues celebrated its centennial in May; it shares with us the honor of having tendered its services to the President in 1807, and taken part in the war of 1812, and its record in the late war has covered it with glory. And in this connection there is a tender episode in its history which binds it fast in our affections. It was in a gallant defense of the soil of our own State at Roanoke Island on the 9th day of February, 1862, that its peerless young commander fell pierced with the messenger of death. His last words made the battle cry of the command until the scene closed upon the remnant left at Appomattox: "Fight on, fight on, keep cool."

Of all the lifeblood poured out for years on Southern soil there was none that welled from knightlier heart than that of Jennings Wise.

Our kindred and friends, the Washington Light Infantry, from the sister Carolina, have come to us from the citadel of liberty, the city of Charleston.

They, too, have traced their lineage from those early days of our country's history, have added to the glory of South Carolina in all her struggles for constitutional freedom, and we are bound to them by all the ties of a common cause and a common fate. Their record in the war of 1812 and that between the States was worthy of the reputation of their State and city.

To add to the interest of the occasion, they bear with them the crimson flag of the Cowpens and of Eutaw, the banner under which Virginia and the twin Carolinas rushed to victory. Long may this sacred standard remain in the keeping of the brave and gallant men who hold it now.

NORTH CAROLINA STATE LIBRARY

May the friendships formed between the two commands in 1876 ripen now into more intimate knowledge of each other as distance has been so shortened by the new lines of communication between Charleston and our town.

Nothing could have been more appropriate than the participation of these representatives of our neighbor States in the celebration of our centennial.

When each of these commands was formed there was a fresh memory of the heroic campaigns of 1780-81, when the patriot troops of Virginia and the Carolinas dealt the blow to Ferguson at Kings Mountain, which turned the tide that had overborne the State of South Carolina and was intended to crush out liberty in North Carolina and Virginia. With the Maryland Line and Washington's Light Horse they gained a victory at the Cowpens, under Morgan.

And after Cornwallis had been forced at Guilford to turn his course to the sea and abandon his idea of conquest, again they struck at Eutaw such a blow as resulted in the retreat of the invader to the coast, and the virtual redemption of South Carolina.

In all these desperate encounters the men of the three States stood together and the Maryland Line, the Delaware Contingent (the blue hen's chickens) and the Georgia troops, Light Horse Harry Lee and Swamp Fox Marion and Sumter, and old Ben Cleveland and Shelby and Graham and Campbell and Washington raised such a storm as swept the land of the invader and drove Cornwallis to his fate at Yorktown.

How fitting it is that we should meet here on common ground and recount the exploits of the fathers, keep alive their grand traditions and resolve that we shall ever stand together, in war and in peace, as soldiers and as citizens.

The founders of this company have long since gone to their rest.

Fifty years ago there was a day of brave rejoicing. An address was delivered by Ed. Lee Winslow, Esq., an old member of the company which was in itself a complete history of its first half century.

In 1850 on this day you were addressed by Hon. Robert Strange who had been the Major Commandant, a Senator and a Judge. His elegant oration has been printed with Mr. Winslow's and is preserved in the archives.

In 1873, a distinguished South Carolinian, though a native of Fayetteville, Hon. W. S. Mullins, came to join with us in the celebration of the eightieth anniversary and address his former comrades.

Time fails me to call over the list of the honored officers and members of this corps who have passed away.

God rest them in the land of Peace.

It is easier to speak of the olden times, the first years of the organization, because we never knew the actors in those stirring scenes, they were already in the halls of history when we were born.

But when we come to read the names of those who, in the vigor of manhood, took part in the festivities of the semi-centennial, or when we recall the names of those who have since been its members and have gone, we are brought into the visible presence of our fathers and our brethren and the ground is hallowed where we stand in the show of our own memories.

It was an established custom in the olden time that on the 1st of May the company should appear in garments of immaculate white and act as escort of the fair young Queen of the May to the scene of her coronation, and for that day of all the year its fealty belonged to her majesty alone.

In later times, for one day in the year, it is under the orders of the Ladies' Memorial Association in the celebration of the solemn rites which they have instituted over the graves of the Confederate dead.

And for the small service it has rendered her she returns a tenfold devotion. No sacrifice has been too great for her to make in the past for the benefit of this company. Its silken banners are always the workmanship of her fair hands. Its festive board is garnished with her exquisite taste.

But how can I recount the many tokens of her favor? She is here to-day in all her loveliness to grace the festival. If I could express a wish that would include all good to the members of this old company it should be that each one shall be truly worthy of the tender love of one of these fair women.

For the members of the Veteran Corps and those of the dispersed abroad, who are here to join in this most interesting occasion, we have the heartiest welcome. They will rejoice to see that at the entrance of the old company upon its second century it has laid the foundations of an elegant armory, under whose temporary roof we assemble to-day, and which it expects from time to time to enlarge and beautify and embellish until it shall be in itself a history of the corps.

God speed the young men in this undertaking. May they realize that there is something of responsibility in taking up the escutcheon which bears the insignia of the F. I. L. I. upon it.

"He that hath no stomach to this fight, let him depart."

May they live and flourish and uphold the ancient reputation of the Corps and hand it down the New Century with undimned lustre and renown.

So passed into history the first century of the existence of this command and the years rolled quickly on.

The controversy concerning the right of the Company to select and wear its own uniform under the resolution of 1819 was revived and became sharp and decisive.

An order from Governor Carr to the Company in 1893 had required the return of the arms and other public property in its possession and had dropped the Company from the State Guard for failure to parade for inspection dressed in the regulation uniform, although it had been expressly invited by a former administration to resume its place in the State Guard as an unattached company subject to orders direct from the Commander-in-Chief. The order was resented by the Company and itself set right in a long correspondence and after a long report by a committee of leading members of the Company to whom it was referred. This report is spread at length upon the records and reserves forever as a complete vindication of the action of the command under rather trying circumstances.

But the order of the Governor was promptly obeyed, the arms and other property of the State returned, and the Company as promptly armed and accoutred itself and tendered its services to the Governor as an independent volunteer organization of the North Carolina Militia under the law of 1819.

Then came a time of great festivity. The Company was immensely popular, especially with the ladies, on account of its distinctive uniform.

In May, 1894, it had the post of honor on the occasion of the unveiling of the Confederate Monument on Capitol Square in Raleigh, and was treated with distinguished consideration.

In the month of January, 1898, there was a great midwinter fair under its auspices in Fayetteville, which was attended by several of the visiting military companies, and there seemed to be for the community and for the country at large an era of lasting peace and prosperity.

The large and convenient armory was completed, the archives were kept therein, and the walls were adorned with the beautiful banners it had borne in its various service, and with the portraits of its worthy members and commanders.

To appropriate the words of one of its most devoted members and sons, the late Col. John D. Cameron, of Asheville:

> The organization was formed of the best blood of Fayetteville; it was the pride of the sons to succeed the fathers, and such has been religiously observed. Service in such a company has always been esteemed an honor; and, for nearly a century, joining the Independent Company has been almost an essential to the young man of Fayetteville, as a formal declaration of manhood, as the assumption of the toga virilis by the youth of Rome.
>
> Lawyers, physicians, merchants, mechanics, all have taken their turn in the ranks, and in their turn have succeeded to command; the course of promotion is uniform and inflexible; the lowest corporal, if he serves long enough, will in time rise to the rank of Major, but can only do so when those above him have passed through the same course by the rise and withdrawal of those who have attained the highest rank.

By this time the old town, itself scarred all over by fires of war, had begun to look up again; the old landmarks were being removed by the march of progress.

"Camp Adam" on Haymount, named for its first commander, where the beautiful May festivals used to be held, is now ceasing to be a memory. And the old shooting ground on Cross Creek where, after the target firing on the 23rd of August, the long tables groaned with the weight of the feast, and the shady grove resounded with eloquent periods, as the rippling waters made cool the summer air, and the "Foresters Spring" afforded purest beverage, either straight or mixed, according to the taste of the drinker. And historic "Cool Spring" higher up the creek where on whose banks for a century the company was accustomed to halt for refreshments and fire its memorial volley over the grave of old Isaac Hammond, the colored fifer, whose last wish it was to be laid where he might hear the music of the fife and the drum; are not all these things written in the rich chronicles of the old Independent Company?

Even now some of the quaint customs of the grandfathers are preserved. The young member of this company, be it officer or man, who takes unto himself a wife, must sure as fate meet the ordeal for every new-made benedict in the rank and file, a free ride around the company, thrice repeated, on the arms of his comrades at the next regular muster.

But the new century, so full of peaceful promise, had not gone far before in the clear sky rang out the call to arms, and of course the reveille sounded at the armory, and the citizen soldiers without a moment's hesitation took up their duty and responded to the summons, and young husbands and fathers and younger boys, whose furthest thoughts on yesterday had been of battles, were putting on their armor and off to the wars as their fathers had gone before them.

It was an easy matter now to settle the question of uniforms. This company was mustered into service of the United States as company A, Second Regiment, N. C. Volunteers for the Spanish war.

Perhaps because of its being unattached to one of the regiments of the State Guard, or by some other strange mischance, its natural place at the head of the first regiment was filled by others, but it was supposed that North Carolina's two regiments, so promptly tendered and accepted would have been among the first at the front.

The first regiment reached Havana, and the second, delayed by the work of preparation on the part of the government, was held in Raleigh for some weeks and then distributed along the coast awaiting transportation, when by reason of the total destruction of the Spanish Navy and the overpowering rush of the first American troops who reached the field, the war was brought to a sudden determination. And soon the men were at home again engaged in their ordinary avocations. The organization is kept up; the company is now a part of the State Guard of North Carolina and a beautiful arrangement has been made, well-pleasing to all concerned.

There is a battalion, the Gray and the Blue.

For all special occasions the company musters in the colors of the North Carolina State Guard, whatever it may be, blue now, but soon to be turned into some invisible khaki color, possibly gray.

But when the anniversary comes, or Washington's or Lee's birthday, or the first of May, then it is the Gray Company, the old Independent, its commander a major, and all its lieutenants captains.

The armory has been disposed of to the United States, its site is to be occupied by a public building; a newer and a finer armory will soon be provided and the progressive city of Fayetteville will take as much pride in the future of this ancient and honorable corps as the fathers and mothers did in the old company, whose history, like a golden thread, runs through the annals of the municipality and of the State.

THE EXPEDITION AGAINST THE ROW GALLEY "GENERAL ARNOLD"—A SIDE LIGHT ON COLONIAL EDENTON.

BY REVEREND ROBERT BRENT DRANE, D.D.,
(Rector of St. Paul's Church, Edenton, N. C.)

In the year 1781, the American colonies were yet in the life and death struggle for political freedom from England and the southern portion of them was the scene of many important actions. The incident herein treated is not given in the histories, but the fact and its importance to the Edentonians are witnessed to in "The Life and Correspondence of James Iredell," and in certain papers of Josiah Collins, Esq., heretofore unpublished.

Writing in that year to James Iredell, Samuel Johnston, says: "All Europe have their eyes on America, and particularly the Southern States. Much will depend on our exertions and success. The great and sudden fall of the old continental money has occasioned very great convulsions and dissatisfaction in this city and has reduced all paper currency to a very doubtful state, very many refusing to have anything to do with it." And again, "We shall suffer much in this campaign, it will be very bloody, but I hope it will be the last. * * * My hopes and expectations of a favorable issue to our troubles are very sanguine."

Such was the spirit of the leading men of Edenton in the face of the invasion of their region by Cornwallis, both by land and water.

In those days and for long afterward the port of Edenton was much more important than we of today know it, since the development of Norfolk and the railroads has given trade greater facilities than through our shallow sounds. As the "Port of Roanoke" Edenton was entered by many vessels of the foreign trade, and this suggested to the British invader an avenue of distress to the Americans, which they entered.

At the time above indicated and for the cause here specified, many Edentonians sought safety in flight across the sound, particularly to Bertie County; and Windsor was crowded with fugitives, especially women and children, who seem to have made the best of the situation. Familiar letters of those days anticipate for us the scenes of Refugee Life in our "Sixties." Good humour and old fashioned hospitality prevailed. News from the front was continually conveyed by the gentlemen in person, passing and repassing, and through the letters sent by "expresses," or messengers, to their loved ones and their business correspondents. *

Under date of 28th May, 1781, Charles Johnson writing from Edenton to James Iredell gives some particulars relative to one of the most formidable of the British predatory boats in Albemarle Sound, the Row Galley "General Arnold." †

---

*The following subscription paper illustrates this aspect of the life of that day:

"We, the subscribers, being willing and desirous of establishing a Post between this Town [Edenton] and that of Suffolk, in Virginia, for the purpose of receiving the earliest News and Intelligence in the Present Critical times, do agree to pay the several sums affixed against our Respective Names, the same to be paid into the hands of Robt. Smith, Esq., for the purpose of Employing a Rider once a fortnight. Given under our hands this 6th of May, 1775."

Signed for five shillings each by J. Charlton, John Pearson, Charles Bondfield, Arch'd Corrie, George Gray, S. Dickinson, Thos. Benbury, Wm. Hoskins, Roger Pye, Wm. Boyd, Wm. Littlejohn, Geo. Russell, Arch'd Campbell, Jno. Green, Jno. Horniblow, Chas. Johnson, Robt. Patterson (K. Williams?); and for ten shillings each by Jos. Blount, Thos. Jones, Rob. Smith, Michael Payne, Quintin Miller, Jos. Montford, Andw. Little, James Blount, Jas. Iredell, Sam'l Johnston.

† In J. R. B. Hathaway's Hist'l. and Gen'l. Register, Vol. 3, No. 2, page 299, it is made probable that the infamous Benedict Arnold visited Edenton in 1774.

"We last night returned from a cruise, unfortunately not having taken the galley, our principal object; but as we were so happy as to retake Mr. Smith's schooner, in which his whole property was embarked, it gives, as you may conceive, every person concerned in the expedition the most heartfelt satisfaction. Ten of her hands [the Galley's] were taken by about the same number of ours in Mr. Johnston's canoe, after a smart fire on both sides, in which, however, nobody was wounded. We pushed them so close that they were obliged to set fire to Mr. Littlejohn's schooner and, under favor of the night, made their escape. We are now fully employed in fitting out three or four armed boats to go in pursuit, Nelson's brig proving improper for the service, as the Galley can always get in shoal water, where a large vessel can not follow her. If she does not immediately leave the sound, or is not reinforced, which the prisoners seem to expect, I have not the least doubt of our people taking her. The inhabitants, in general, and sailors have, and do, turn out unanimously. I never saw, nor could hope to see, so much public spirit, personal courage and intrepid resolution—it would please you to see it. I am convinced that was the measure adopted of fitting out one or two armed vessels, we might laugh at all attempts of the enemies' plundering banditti.

"I feel for Mrs. Dawson's exposed and unprotected situation. I'm apprehensive this is but a prelude to what we must expect upon return of the enemies' boats from the plunder of James River, but thanks to Providence for the formation of our natural fortifications, which will hinder their small craft being supported by their large ships."

Robert Smith, owner of schooner above happily retaken, a considerable merchant of Edenton, writing to Iredell from Eden House, in Bertie County, says: "I am just going over to town to know the worst. They have given me a pretty little switching, but it might have been worse; they have ruined poor Littlejohn and would have left me nothing had they not have taken fright. * * * I apprehend this visit is only a prelude to many such we are to expect."

Another glimpse of the situation is seen from Mrs. Blair's letter to Iredell: "I think it will be very wrong for my sister to stay below any longer, for though these boats come up to cut out vessels, it is, I think, more than probable they will call at plantations, and those in particular where they see good houses, for there they will expect rich plunder. I believe they seldom want information where the most is to be had. I should think it would be better for Mrs. Dawson also to get out of the way, if it was only on account of the continual dread and uneasiness she will continue to be under."

Judge Iredell, writing to his wife, under date Edenton, 30th May, 1781, adds something: "The boats went yesterday, four of them, under the respective commands of Captain Gale, Captain Bateman, Captain Addison, and Captain Finch, all together having about fifty men, or perhaps more. They are Mr. Johnston's canoe, Mr. Pollok's, the Caswell's barge, and Bonitz's boat, and each, I believe, has a swivel, besides muskets. The men are well chosen, and went with excellent spirits, without any kind of riot or disorder. The Galley, when the last account came, was in the marshes. Two other boats were to go from Perquimans, and two, it was expected, would be fitted out by the Bankers below.* * * * Mr. Smith has lost several of his papers, though not the most valuable, his table and other linen and clothes, and very near seven hhds. of rum.

Littlejohn has lost little, I am told, except his schooner. Two of his negroes are returned."

While such was the agitation in and about Edenton and Mrs. Johnston's friends were advising her to vacate "Hayes," the family seat, just out of town, to follow her friends to Bertie County for safety, her husband, Samuel Johnston, in attendance on the sessions of the Continental Congress at Philadelphia (whence we heard from him, in the opening of this paper) wrote his friend James Iredell: "I am sorry people were in such haste to remove themselves and property from Edenton. I rather could have wished they had thought of defending it, which would have been attended with less risk and expense, in my opinion, for till the conquest of Virginia is effected, which I flatter myself will not speedily take place, I scarcely think you will be molested with any considerable invasion, and if the plundering parties meet with opposition they will grow sick of the business.

"However, every one will, and has a right to, judge for himself on these occasions.* * * Should a few fortunate events cast up in our favor, I hope there will be no more of it after this summer,—if otherwise, God knows where it will end, for America can never submit."

The above quotations from letters and the documents to follow, (now printed for the first time) show us something of the people,—who they were and how they felt, and what they did; that they were not disposed to be "like dumb driven cattle." There is an absence of heroics which saves the situation from being comical; in view of the one row galley of the British, a shallow draught boat, which might have been floated in the barrels and hogsheads of rum listed as captured by her and as provided for sustaining the courage of the various crews of sloop, galley, and dispatch boat fitted out against her. We may suppose that the lack of information concerning her whereabouts and purposes tended to exaggerate the gravity of the situation. For, since the days of Tacitus, "omne ignotum pro magnifico."

At any rate the Edentonians were not going to take any chances on a duel-like encounter with the "General Arnold." They believed in "team play," and they did not scorn the suggestion of auxiliaries from Perquimans, nor even from the distant Bankers whose familiarity with the shoal waters of Currituck and Roanoke should well qualify them to cope with a row galley which affected the marshes.

Fifty-nine men, leading citizens, subscribed £74,500, or $186,250 in their accounts. Lest they should seem to us extravagant in their preparations to give the enemy's row galley a proper reception, let us recall the expense which our government has just now incurred for the war-vessel, North Carolina, $7,000,000, in much better money, too.

The following are transcribed from papers in the handwriting, mostly, of Josiah Collins. There are many interesting autograph signatures:

THE EXPEDITION AGAINST THE ROW GALLEY, GENERAL ARNOLD.

Where as the Navigation of this state will be rendered dangerous unless a stop is put to the depredation of the Enemy by the capture of their Galley now in Albemarle Sound—

For the encouragement of those who are willing to turn out for the purpose, we the subscribers in behalf of themselves and the State in general, which will doubtless reimburse them for all sums they may Advance for a measure of such publick utility, do promise and engage that should they be so fortunate as to make prize of the galley called the General Arnold or any other of the enemies' armed Vessels, the whole of such Vessel or Vessels shall be divided in Just propportions amongst them, and shou'd they retake any Vessels made prize of by the enemy they shall be entitled to the whole of such part as the Law allows in such cases, without any deduction whatever on account of the Boats or Vessels they gain, which Boats or Vessels shall not be entitled to draw any part of such prizes—

It is further agreed that shou'd any person receive A Wound that may disable him shall be entitled to receive three shares over and above as aforesaid and shou'd any person be so unfortunate as to lose his life, his wife and family (if he have any) shall receive four shares, over and above, as aforesaid.

The subscribers promise and agree to the sum of One Hund'd pounds per day for each man who shall engage in this enterprise untill such time as the Cruise is finished, besides being sufficiently provid'd for in provision, Rum, &c., &c.

1. Thos. Benbury.
2. James Neilson.
3. Robt. Hardy.
4. Nath'l. Allen.
5. Chas. Johnson.
6. Mich'l. Payne.
7. Wm. Littlejohn.
8. Joseph Smith.
9. S. Dickinson.
10. Sam'l Cooley.
11. Josiah Collins.
12. Arch'd. Bell.
13. Jos. Blount.
14. Wm. Bennett.
15. Nath'l Allen for Robt. Smith.
16. Wm. Boyd.
17. Will'm Skinner.
18. T. Barker.
19. Chas. Pettigrew.
    Jas. Lutin.
20. Wm. Savage.
21. B'n. Bryor.
22. Ed. Blount.
23. Wm. McDonald.
24. Henry O'Neil.
25. Wm. Roberts.
    Wm. Gardner.
26. Robt. Egan.
    Thos. Bonner.
27. Fine & Scott.
28. Geo. Gray.
29. John Blackburn as for as £1,000.
30. Stephen Cabarrus.
31. Wm. Bonitz.
32. William Cumming.
33. Alex'r. Black.
    Nehemiah Bateman.
34. Jas. Whedbee as far as £1,000.
35. Gavin Hamilton.
36. Wm. Scott.
37. Jno. Horniblow.
38. J. Mare.
39. John Etheridge.
40. Pamburse.
41. Enoch Sawyer.
42. David Meredith.
43. Thos. Ming, £1,000.
44. John Bennett.
45. James Webb, junr.
46. Ditto for Willis Langley.
47. Joseph Underhill.
48. Samuel Black.
49. Chris'r. Clark.
50. Nich's. Long.
52. David Lawrence.
53. Michael Levy.
54. John Baptist Beasley.
55. John Anderson.

LIST OF SUBSCRIBERS ON THE EXPEDITION AGAINST THE ROW GALLEY, GENERAL ARNOLD.

1. Thomas Barker, W. B.	£1,500
2. Thomas Benbury, pd. J. C. & B.	1,500
3. James Nelson, pd. W. B.	1,500
4. Nath'l Allen, pd. J. C.	1,500
5. William Sawyer, J. B.	1,500
6. Genl. Skinner, W. B.	1,500
7. Robert Smith, pd. J. C.	1,500
8. John Horniblow, pd. J. C.	1,000
9. Joseph Underhill, pd. J. C.	1,000
10. John Baptist Beasley, W. B.	1,000
11. Mich'l. Payne, W. B.	1,000
12. Charles Pettigrew, pd. J. C.	1,000
13. Gavin Hamilton, J. B.	1,000

14. William Bonitz, W. B.	1,500
15. Robert Hardy, J. S.	1,500
16. Joseph Smith, J. S.	1,500
17. Willis Langley, J. B.	1,500
18. James Webb, W. B.	1,000
19. Samuel Dickinson, W. B.	1,500
20. Enoch Sawyer, J. C.	1,000
21. Jno. Blackburn, £1,000 pd. J. C.	1,000
22. Thos. Ming, £1,000 pd. J. C.	1,000
23. Roullack, W. B.	1,000
24. David Lawrence, pd. J. C.	1,000
25. Fine & Scott, W. B.	3,000
26. Henry O'Neil, W. B.	1,000
27. Robert Eagan, J. B.	1,000
28. Josiah Collins	1,500
29. Geo. Gray, pd. J. C.	1,000
30. Will'm McDonald, J. S.	1,000
31. Benj'n. Bryce, J. B.	1,000
32. Sam'l. Cooley, J. B.	1,000
33. Arch'd. Bell & Co., J. B.	1,500
34. Alex. Black, pd. J. C.	1,500
35. Chas. Johnson, pd. J. C.	1,500
36. Sam'l. Johnston, pd. J. C.	1,500
37. Joseph Whidbee, J. C.	1,000
38. William Littlejohn, J. B.	1,500
39. Joseph Blount, J. B.	1,500
40. Thomas Bonner, J. B.	1,000
41. William Bennett, pd. W. B.	1,500
42. Christ'r. Clark, pd. J. C.	1,500
43. Nehemiah Long, pd. J. C.	1,000
44. William Scott, J. S.	1,500
45. William Armstrong, J. S.	1,500
46. John Mare, J. B.	1,000
47. John Etheridge, J. S.	1,000
48. Dominique Pamburse, J. B.	1,000
49. Samuel Black, J. S.	1,000
50. John Stewart, J. S.	1,000
51. Edmund Blount, J. S.	1,500
52. Rich'd. Blow, by Wm. Bennett, Esq'r.	1,500
53. David Meredith, W. B.	1,000
54. Stephen Cabarruce, J. S.	1,000
55. Levy, J. S.	1,000
56. Nehemiah Bateman, J. S.	1,000
57. Geo. Wynns, pd. J. C.	1,500
58. William Boyd, pr. W. B.	1,500
59. William Roberts, J. B.	1,000

LIBRARY

A List of Seamen and Marines on board of the Galley Tartar, viz:

William Proby, Cap.	1	*Michael Young	15
†Valentine Nohell, 1st Lu.	2	*John Gucy	16
†Jacob Butler, 2nd ditto	3	*George Jackson	17
†James Luten, Cap. of Marcins.	4	*Frederick Morris	18
*Malvin Moore, Cap. of the Ward Boat	5	Tho. Mann, pilate	19
*Cap. Cannon Master	6	*Jeremiah Johnson	20
*William Heaker	7	*Emanuel Spaniard	21
*Henry Flury	8	*Marino Spaniard	22
*Thos. Oates, Steward	9	*John Moore	23
*Thos. Gaskins	10	*John Fife	24
*David McKinsey	11	*Henderson Luten, Sr.	26
*Abraham Clark	12	*Henry Roads	27
*Moses Gregory	14	*Daniel Leonard	28
		Samuel Twine	29

6 Days Wages on board of the Galley Tartar	29 6
Dollars	174
To Sundry Expenses	7
Dollars	181
To Sundries pr. acct	12⅝
	193⅝
Amt. brot. over	193⅝
Capt. Proby for his trouble over and above his daily pay	6
	199⅝

£52.14
3. 2

£55.16

Received Edenton, August 12, 1782, of Josiah Collins One Hundred Ninety-Nine and five-eighths Spanish Milled Dollars, being in full for the within account. W. PROBY."

The Subscribers to the Expedition against the Row Galley, General Arnold, to Joseph Smith, William Bennett, Joseph Blount, and Josiah Collins, Commissioners appointed by the said subscribers.

1781.		DR.
June 7.	To 40⅝ galls. Rum @ £240	£9,640
	1 Barrel Pork	2,000
	264 lbs. Bread 80d	1,056

† These lines have pen line drawn through names, but numbers remain.

Bags for ditto	480
40 lbs. Sugar, £24	960
20 lbs. Coffee, £30	600
8 lbs. Pork for hands to go over the Sound to fetch Mr. Pollock's Canoe	80
8 lbs. Bread for do. do.	32
Negro hire for do. do.	60
12 lbs. Muskett Balls	360
		15,318
9 days hire of 40 men, £40		36,000
Cash paid the Captains for Sundry expenses while on the Cruises	2,162
5 lbs. Nails	180
14 Swivell Balls	140
Amt. Messrs. Sam'l Cooley & Co., acct.	485
2 Sadles and 2 Worms, 8d	640
2 gin cases.
Error in Cash paid Capt. N. Bateman	362
Cash paid Negro hire going over the Sound with M. Pollock's Canoe	100
Mr. Geo. Gray for Liquor for Sailors	200
Thos. Ming, amt. of his acct	1,920
6 pr. Handcuffs, £320	1,920

The Sloop commanded by Capt. Cross.
The Galley commanded by Capt. Simons.
The Dispatch Boat, Capt. Yeomans.

1782. To JOSIAH COLLINS, Dr.

July 30th—

To 10 gallons rum, 14d	£7.	—	—
To 100 lbs. salted Pork, 8d	3.	6.	8.
To 104 lbs. Ship Bread, 5d	2.	3.	4.
To 10 lbs. Beacon, 8d	—	6.	8.
To 2 Tinn Potts, 12d	1.	4.	—
To 1½ lbs. Tallow	—	1.	6.
To 1⅛ lbs. Nails, ¾		5.	—
To Cash paid 28 Hands for 2 days Hire each at 8d	22.	8.	—
To do. pd. Capt. Yeomans for boat hire	1.	4.	—
	£37.	19.	2.

The effect of all this upon the hostile "row galley" does not appear, so far as this writer has been able to discover.

Lord Cornwallis's surrender to General Washington at Yorktown on the 19th of October, 1781, practically ended the war. The date of the last account above given, 1782, July 30, may suggest a continuance of the expedition much longer than the original subscribers bargained for. The treaty of peace was finally signed at Paris, September 3, 1783. While we are guessing, possibly there was a parallel here with the Americans' victory in the battle of New Orleans, in the later war of 1812, won after the treaty of peace had been signed, of which they knew not. At the least, let us be sure that the event of this expedition justified the means adopted by the people of Edenton and their neighbors to rid their sound and America of such a pest as the Row Galley General Arnold.

THE QUAKERS OF PERQUIMANS.

BY JULIA S. WHITE.

To write of the Quakers of Perquimans County involves almost the complete history of the Friends' Church in North Carolina for the first seventy-five years of its existence. It also involves the beginning of all North Carolina church history; for, so far as known, the first religious gathering in the State was a Quaker meeting. Says the Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire in the North Carolina Booklet of April, 1906, page 261: "Quakerism was the only organized form of religion in the colony, with no rival worship among the people for the rest of the seventeenth century (1672). * * * It drew to itself a number of the intelligent and well-disposed inhabitants, especially of Perquimans and Pasquotank. * * These zealous and self-sacrificing men deserve to be held in honorable memory, who at the expense of so much time, labor, and bodily suffering, cultivated the spiritual harvest in that distant and unattractive field. Quakerism did not begin the work of settlement, and of reclaiming the wilderness for civilization, but it has the greater honor of having brought some organized form of Christianity to the infant colony, and of having cared for those wandering sheep whom others neglected."

The first Quaker in North Carolina was one Henry Phillips, who had been a member of that church in New England previous to his coming to Carolina in 1665; though William Edmundson, an Irish Quaker preacher, was the real instigator of Quakerism among the settlers. This "traveling Friend" after much hardship reached a place probably not far distant from where the town of Hertford now stands, and in a three days stay held two religious services. One of these two was at the home of Henry Phillips, who, with his family, had wept for joy at the coming of Edmundson, not having seen a Quaker for seven years. The second of these services was at the home and by the invitation of one Francis Toms, a justice of the peace, who with his wife had at the first meeting "received the truth with gladness." Edmundson was followed in a few months by George Fox himself, the founder of the church. Fox's carefully kept diary gives much insight into the methods and route of travel as well as the conditions, social and religious, in the infant settlement. No doubt his coming had much to do in fostering and establishing the church, especially by instigating his letters of advice written after his return to England.

Four years later Edmundson returns to Carolina and says, "Friends were finely settled and I left things well among them." All of this occurred in what is now Perquimans County; and from that day to this (1672-1908), a term of two hundred and thirty-six years, Friends have been prominent citizens of that county.

Friends (this term is far preferable to Quaker, though the latter has no longer the opprobrium of its origin) until very recent years included in their church organization four distinct assemblies, viz: the Preparative, the Monthly, the Quarterly, and the Yearly Meeting. The first has now been done away with and all yearly meetings which have adopted what is known as the Uniform Discipline are no longer a court of final appeal or distinct within themselves as in early days, but are subject to the action of the Five-Years Meeting, or rather the consensus of opinion of all the Friends on the American continent.

Of the transactions of their various meetings for business the Friends have been unusually careful to preserve a record, and these manuscripts are now invaluable to the student, giving not only an insight into the social condition of the time, but also the methods of church discipline and authority and the doings of its members. The faithful records of the marriage certificates with the signatures of the witnesses, the chronicling of births and deaths, all give the genealogist a mine yielding rich returns.

The oldest record preserved by the Quakers of North Caroline is a marriage certificate of Christopher Nicholson and Ann Attwood, both of Perquimans, and dating 1682, which it will be noted, is just ten years after the visits of Edmundson and Fox. The regular minutes of the business meetings do not begin till later, and these are rather fragmentary as they were not properly collected till 1728.

The first organization of Friends in Perquimans County was known as Perquimans Monthly Meeting. After 1764 it was called Wells.' This meeting finally set off Sutton's Creek Monthly Meeting and transferred itself to Piney Woods Monthly Meeting in 1794. Piney Woods Monthly Meeting is the only monthly meeting in that county at the present time, and is, as shown, the direct outgrowth of the first organization of Quakers in the State. The Wells' meeting house stood not far from the present town of Winfall, just across the road from the Jessup homestead. A rather interesting episode occurs in the annals of this meeting. It seems that one Jonathan Pearson had for some reason filled up the spring to which Friends of this meeting had had access. He was "churched" in regard to the same and so the spring was opened again.

Almost coequal with the growth and development of Quakerism in Perquimans County was that in Pasquotank County, and the two monthly meetings joined in constituting a superior, or quarterly meeting known as Eastern Quarter. This was done in 1681, and in 1698 the yearly meeting was established, embracing only the one quarter and the two monthly meetings. For nearly three-quarters of a century (till 1757) this was the condition of the church.

Perquimans County continued to be the radiating center for Quakerism for the first century of the State's history; that is, until the great migratory wave of Quakers from Nantucket, New England, Pennsylvania, and other points north had swept into our borders and organized themselves and asserted their powers. Then the Quakers of Perquimans shared their power and a new quarterly meeting was established in the section near where Guilford College now stands, which by way of distinction was called Western Quarter. The migratory spirit was in the air and the old Teutonic blood which had made our sturdy forefathers first cross the Virginia border now impelled many of them to move from the lowlands to the Piedmont section of the State. But for eighty-eight years (till 1786) the yearly meeting of North Carolina (that is the highest authority in the church) was held either at Perquimans or Old Neck or Little River—all in Perquimans County. Then there was a series of years (1787-1812) in which the yearly meeting alternated between Perquimans and Guilford Counties, with four exceptions when Pasquotank claimed the honor. So that it is only in recent years, 1812-date, that Perquimans County has not been a rallying point for the Quakerism of the whole State.

As to what part of the population the Quakers were, there is no means of determining; but this fact is assured, that prior to 1700 the Quakers had things much their own way in church and state and that this "golden age" of North Carolina Quakerism culminated in the appointment of a Quaker governor, John Archdale, who, though giving his time and energy to South Carolina, left an impress and gained much prestige and recognition for his co-religionists in North Carolina.

Early in the eighteenth century the Quakers began to need all the metal which was in them in order to breast the tide of opposition and to remain true to what they believed right. Governor Walker aroused the Church of England in such words as these addressed to the Bishop of London: "My Lord, we have been settled near this fifty years in this place, and I may justly say most part of twenty-one years, on my own knowledge, without priest or altar, and before that time, according to all that appears to me, much worse, George Fox some years ago came into these parts and by strange infatuations, did infuse the Quakers' principles into some small number of the people; which did and hath continued to grow ever since very numerous, by reason of their yearly sending in men to encourage and exhort them to their wicked principles; and here was none to dispute nor to oppose them in carrying on their pernicious principles for many years, until God, of his infinite goodness was pleased to inspire the Rev. Dr. Bray * * * to send in some books * * * of the explanation of the church catechism, etc." * * *

"My Lord, I humbly beg leave to inform you, that we have an assembly to sit the 3rd of November next, and there is above half of the burgesses that are chosen are Quakers, and have declared their designs of making void the act for establishing the church; if your lordship, out of his good and pious care for us, doth not put a stop to this growth, we shall the most part, especially the children born here, become heathens."

This quotation, lengthy as it is, is yet of great intrinsic value. It shows a great antagonism on the part of the writer for the Quakers, and incidentally their origin, growth and present power. That one-half the burgesses were of the Quaker faith is about the nearest approximation we can secure as to relative numbers in their community, and this was in their years of waning power too.

But more than all, it shows us the beginnings of a long struggle between church and state, and the beginning of a protest on the part of the Quakers which has eventually resulted in the existence of many of the civil and religious privileges of today; notable among them is the privilege of affirmation by any individual and in any court of justice, rather than the taking of the legal oath.

That a vigorous effort was made and much legislation secured toward making the Church of England the church of the Carolinas is easily shown by a study of the legal enactments of the time. That the Quakers were for a long time the only organized body of Dissenters must necessitate crediting them with trying to stem in its beginning the current which was about to sweep from us religious tolerance and individual liberty. To be sure in later years (from 1750-) the Presbyterians were much more potent in this struggle, but the Quakers held the fort until that time. As to taking the oath (and the laws of our State have on the face of them seemed lenient toward Quakers), it will hardly be claiming too much to say that the universal privilege of affirmation in any court of justice in our State is an outgrowth of Quaker influence. It must not be overlooked, however, that it was just this matter of taking an oath which first put the Quakers out of politics and which eventually made it a disownable offense for any members of the Friends' Church to hold office under the government. It is only in recent years, very recent years, that Friends have awakened to the fact that they may without being untrue to the tenets of their faith hold office. We are glad to realize that they are again making themselves a part of civic life and doing their part politically, as well as socially, in the great civic awakening which is spreading over our country.

Another point in which the Quakers figure largely in the early law annals of our State and in which the Quakers of Perquimans must have been prime movers, as it occurred in the years when they were the leaders of Quakerism in the State, is in regard to taking up arms. They paid gladly their militia fines which were thrice the usual tax on property; and while these taxes were heavy at times, and long imposed, i. e., till 1783, the Quakers then were even more so than now, it seems, extremely careful to meet all financial obligations, so that there was credence in the old adage, "A Quaker's word is as good as his bond." While today the man who would vouch for the genuineness of an article of production must call it "Quaker Oats," "Quaker Gelatine," etc.

That the Quakers were a large majority of the inhabitants of Perquimans in 1723 can be almost assured from the following data. At that time the law of 1715 was in force which provided "that no Quaker or reputed Quaker shall by virtue of this act (that is of affirming instead of taking the oath) be qualified or permitted to give evidence in any criminal causes or to serve on any jury, or bear any office or place of profit or trust in the government." Now we have a list of jurymen in the various precincts for the year 1723, and while Pasquotank and Chowan have 156 and 142, respectively, Perquimans has only 54, and Perquimans was just as old a province as either of the other two. Furthermore, in this list the surnames so familiar in Quaker records are conspicuously absent. Despite all this, in the formative days of the civil and ecclesiastical history of the Old North State, the Quaker was a very influential individual; and shall we not claim that this wide influence of what Weeks calls the "flower of Puritanism," was the great influence which preserved our State from any dark pages of history, pages which mar the annals of Virginia and Massachusetts, and place us along with Pennsylvania in matters of justice to the Indian and opposition to war?

So much for the Quakers of Perquimans and their relation to the State. It now remains to be told of their workings among themselves. Their records show many points of interest and much which seems to us like an infringement of personal liberty and that the church was overstepping its bounds.

With the special privilege granted the Quaker in regard to the marriage rite, it is matter of much pride to the church that it exercised so much care in this regard. Upon every occasion careful inquiry is made in regard to the life and conversation of the parties wishing to marry, and especially in regard to their freedom from marriage relations; and then the church has its representatives present at the wedding and they must be responsible and report on the good order maintained at the ceremony and produce to the meeting the marriage certificate always very carefully and explicitly written, with the names of many witnesses to the ceremony affixed thereto. The whole thing with the signatures is properly recorded in the church books provided for that purpose.

It might be said on passing that these records which the Friends have always been so careful to keep are one of the fruitful sources for genealogical study before mentioned.

"Marrying out," that is, marrying some one not in membership with the Friends, was a disownable offense; and it was thus that the Quakers lost many members. The church would not grant its permission to a marriage request sometimes, and such a thing as a man's not having paid his debts would hinder no less than grösser evils if such were detected.

Indeed, it has always been a care of the Quakers to keep their outward affairs in proper condition, and in the early days of the Perquimans records, where boundary lines were not marked with sufficient definiteness, one of the principal matters of church record is the settlement by the church of such differences as may arise in regard to land tenure. The manner in which these differences were settled is something like this: the two contesting parties would each name an equal number of individuals to act as arbitrators, and the church would appoint one; and generally such a committee reached a satisfactory conclusion. Should either party appeal to the courts for justice, he was immediately "churched," and if no acknowledgement was made, he was disowned. "Brother goeth to war with brother and that before the unbeliever," had a very vivid meaning to the Quaker fathers.

The Perquimans records show time and again that its members were under surveillance if they were not prompt and exact in the payment of their debts. In 1769 a party is disowned for bankruptcy. This is the actual wording of the inquiry which was made at least once a year, and generally oftener, for nearly two hundred years in the Quaker church: "Do you maintain strict integrity in all transactions in trade and in your outward concerns; and are you careful not to defraud the public revenue?" or something in substance the same.

Other matters which concerned the Quakers of Perquimans in the pioneer days seem trivial only as they give an insight into the social customs of the time and also what the Quakers regarded as right. For example, one Friend asked the church for the privilege of wearing a wig, and the request was not granted; but some years later another request came up and the privilege was granted, with the advice "to wear a plain one."

So soon as a member was known to be "drinking to excess" or "using bad language," he was at once "churched;" and twice the records of Perquimans show where individuals were up before the church for "striking or whipping their wives," and once a Friend is reputed to be keeping a tavern. The committee of investigation is appointed and the tavern keeper, by forsaking his chosen business, is restored into good fellowship.

But these are of the early days. At the present time there are two hundred and ninety-six Friends in Perquimans and Chowan Counties (the latter has only about thirty-five). These all belong to Piney Woods Monthly Meeting, which is composed of Piney Woods and Up River meetings for worship.

Quakerism in Perquimans has long been on the wane. The peremptory way in which Friends have disowned its members make us almost wonder that any at all are left. But it was not disownment any more than migration which brought about the present condition. The Teutonic spirit which made the people first migrate into the State was the same which, working in their descendants, caused them to move further South or over West, seeking new lands and new environment. For there was a decided exodus from Perquimans to points South and also to points in central Carolina. As the Quakers were very careful to take their church credentials with them, it is easy to follow them from place to place as they moved.

The Quaker protest against slavery and war, when he found he could not remove the one from our midst much as he succeeded in getting it out of his church, and when he would not take part in the other—the Quaker's protest, I say, was a very quiet one, that of leaving the State; and the Quakers of Perquimans were among those who so largely settled the free States of Ohio and Indiana. It was this migration which left the Quakers on their original site not a weak body, but shorn of much of its strength.

What the Quakers have been to the county and the community is best shown by stating a few facts. For seventy-two years the Quakers of Perquimans have maintained an academy at Belvidere which has always stood for high grade work and has been, and still is, recognized as one of the most worthy institutions for secondary education in the State. This institution now enrolls about one hundred and thirty pupils per year who are here prepared for any of the leading colleges of our State.

The Total Abstinence Society of Perquimans and Chowan Counties, which claims to be the second oldest temperance organization in the State, dating back to the early part of the nineteenth century, while by no means an exclusively Quaker organization, had as its founders men of Quaker faith and such have always been its ardent supporters, working shoulder to shoulder with the Baptists. This fact is worthy of mention at this time; for in the recent election in Edenton the temperance forces at work there felt and acknowledged the fruits of the work of this pioneer organization.

Shakespeare says, "What's in a name? That which we call a rose, by any other name would smell as sweet;" and on the naming of their places of worship, the Friends had no ear for the artistic or euphonious, but were purely local. This strict adherence to facts is full of hints to the research student, and the hallowed associations are just as sweet as if we had not such names to bring them up as those named below. All of the Friends' meetings, that is, all of the places in which church services have been held in Perquimans County, aside from the private houses first used, are as follows: Perquimans, Wells', Suttons' Creek, Old Neck, Little River, Boice's, Beech Spring, Piney Woods and Up River.

As to the people, the surnames which appear in the Quaker records of these meetings are names still to be found in Perquimans and adjoining counties or are among those transplanted to central Carolina and the middle West. Notable among them are Nicholson, Albertson, White, Winslow, Newby, Toms, Bagley, Elliott, Blanchard, Nixon, Cannon and others equally as important, but the list is already too long. I mention the last for it is not a matter of conjecture, but a matter of history that the present Speaker of the House, Joseph G. Cannon, is not only of Quaker extraction through his mother, but also on his father's side; and that were the Cannons of Guilford County traced back a few generations, Perquimans might come in for a share of the honor, if such there be, attaching to our countryman.

While Quakerism in Perquimans has much to be proud of in its past history and can pride itself in the worthy citizens which it has produced, we believe none in the past can surpass some of the standard-bearers of the present day, and though the outlook in that county might be more hopeful, the outlook for Quakerism in the State was never more encouraging; and we know that much of the brain and sinew of the Perquimans Quakers are only transferred and are now working in other and more aggressive portions of our State, looking steadily to the future, but never unmindful of the past.

AN EARLY PEACE SOCIETY IN NORTH CAROLINA 1819-1822.*

BY MARSHALL DeLANCEY HAYWOOD.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

In these days of The Hague Tribunal, Carnegie peace endowments, and general efforts to substitute arbitration for force of arms in settling the disputes of nations, we of the present time are inclined to claim for our own generation credit for a movement which has gone on, in one form or another, through ages past. Thoughtful men in all times have labored to avert wars or lessen their horrors, and yet some of the bloodiest and most desolating conflicts recorded in history have been carried on in the name of religion. Not only in the Crusades, where Christian fought infidel, has such warfare raged; but even more bloody and bitter still have been the turmoils when princes of the earth really thought they did God an acceptable service by slaying and burning those who differed from them only in a doctrinal way, while fellow-worshippers of Jesus Christ. The altar of military glory and popular applause has had devotees from time immemorial, and will so continue to have until the changing natures of men shall bring forth that brighter day when the nations shall learn war no more.

David Low Dodge, of New York, is generally regarded as the father of the organized peace movement in America. He published, in 1809, a tract called The Mediator's Kingdom not of this World. In 1812 he first proposed the formation of a peace society, and the New York Peace Society was organized at his home in August, 1815. Similar organizations soon sprang up in other States, including North Carolint, where the Raleigh Peace Society was formed in 1819.

*An address delivered before a Conference on Arbitration and Armament in the hall of the House of Representatives at Raleigh, N. C., March 23, 1908.

It was on April 21, 1819, that the Raleigh Peace Society proceeded to organize. We are fortunate in finding in The Star and North Carolina State Gazette, a Raleigh paper of April 30th following, an account of the first meeting, when "a number of respectable gentlemen of the town and its vicinity" met and elected officers, also adopting a constitution, which is given in the same newspaper. The meeting was presided over by William Shaw, as Chairman pro tempore; and Jeremiah Battle, M.D., acted as Secretary. The officers elected were William Peck, President; Richard Fenner, M.D., Vice-President; Kimbrough Jones, Recording Secretary; Jeremiah Battle, M.D., Corresponding Secretary; and Sterling Wheaton, M.D., Treasurer. The preamble and constitution of the Society were as follows:

"We, the subscribers, impressed with the belief that the Gospel is designed to produce peace on earth; and that it is the duty of all good men to cultivate, and, as far as they have power, to diffuse a spirit of kindness, do agree to form ourselves into a society for the purpose of disseminating the general principles of peace, and to use all proper means, within the sphere of our influence, to promote universal harmony and good will among men.

"Article 1st. This Society shall be called the Raleigh Peace Society.

"Article 2d. The officers of this Society shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Corresponding Secretary, and Treasurer.

"Article 3d. Any person subscribing this constitution and paying one dollar annually shall be a member of this Society; or, by the payment of ten dollars, on subscribing, shall be considered a member for life.

"Article 4th. It shall be the duty of the President, or, in his absence, the Vice-President, to preside at all meetings, and to call a meeting at the request of any three members. The Secretary shall record the proceedings; and the Corresponding Secretary shall conduct the correspondence under the direction of the President and Society. The Treasurer shall collect subscriptions, receive donations, and hold all moneys subject to the disposal of the Society.

"Article 5th. The annual meeting of the Society, which shall be the stated meeting for choosing officers and transacting business, shall be holden on the first Monday after the fourth of July.

"Article 6th. This constitution shall not be altered except at an annual meeting, and by a vote of two-thirds of the members present."

The above-quoted newspaper, in its issue of May 21, 1819, gave a copy of a letter addressed to a peace society in England by the Czar of Russia, who was then, as his successor is now, crying "peace, peace," when there was no peace—especially in his own dominions.

Another old paper, The Raleigh Register, throws considerable light on the peace movement at that time in North Carolina. It happened that the Society's first anniversary fell on Monday, July 5, 1819; and, as the day preceding was the nation's birthday and fell on Sunday, the usual Fourth of July festivities had to be postponed till the 5th day of July, both occasions falling on the same day. In a religious way the Raleigh Peace Society observed Sunday, July 4th, and held its business meeting on Monday. The Raleigh Register, of July 2, 1819, contained this notice: "To afford an opportunity to the citizens to hear both sermons on Sunday, the Rev. Dr. McPheeters will preach the Independence Anniversary Sermon at the Presbyterian Church at 10 o'clock, and the Rev. Mr. Charlton will preach the Anniversary Sermon of the Peace Society at the Methodist Church at 12 o'clock. The Peace Society will meet at the State House on Monday at 5 o'clock p. m. for the election of officers for the ensuing year, and for the transaction of other business."

The above services by the Reverend William McPheeters and the Reverend G. W. Charlton were held at the appointed time, Mr. Charlton's sermon being from the text, "Blessed are the peacemakers." On the next day the Peace Society held its regular meeting and elected the following officers: William Peck, President; William Shaw, Vice-President; Daniel DuPré, Recording Secretary; Jeremiah Battle, M.D., Corresponding Secretary; and Sterling Wheaton, M.D., Treasurer. In the proceedings published in The Raleigh Register, of July 16th, we learn that a memorial was drawn up to be forwarded to the President and Congress, asking that international treaties should be made to prohibit privateers from operating in naval warfare, and citing a treaty of this nature made through Benjamin Franklin with Prussia. On this point, at least—the desire to abolish privateering—the wishes of the Society were gratified eventually, but not until many of its members had passed to the realm above, where the Prince of Peace reigns supreme. Says the above account: "It was gratifying to see at this anniversary all parties, professions, and conditions of men unite for the holy purpose of diffusing and cherishing the pure Gospel principles of peace and general benevolence. Men who fill high stations in the civil and military departments of our government, ministers of three different denominations of Christians, and those who were opposed in politics at a time when parties existed amongst us, all cordially joined hands in this work, and enrolled their names as members of the Society."

Some North Carolinians, it would seem, had fears that their right to answer a call to arms in time of war, even to repel invasion, would be curtailed by the Peace Society; and, to quiet these misgivings, the announcement was made: "It may be proper to notice an error which some few uninformed persons have fallen into respecting this Society. They have supposed its principles were those of passive submission and non-resistance. Far from it. No man, by becoming a member of this Society, surrenders his independence of thinking and acting, and many of them distinctly avow their determination to take up arms to defend their country whenever the occasion requires. But they all unite in the endeavor to do away with the necessity of wars, and hope to do so by means first suggested and attempted by the great and good Henry the Fourth, of France, in an age not sufficiently enlightened and humanized for plans of such extended beneficence." From the extract, just quoted, it will be seen that the tenets of the Raleigh Peace Society were identical with those now advocated by those who favor arbitration and armament—peace if possible, but war if necessity should require it.

The Raleigh Peace Society recommended as reading matter, for the instruction of the public, a series of pamphlets entitled The Friend of Peace.

In the year 1820, the annual meeting of the Raleigh Peace Society was announced for July 10th by The Raleigh Register of July 7th. It was also stated that the Reverend William Hooper, of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, would preach the annual sermon in the Methodist Church on Sunday, July 9th. This meeting, together with the religious services, no doubt took place, though the later newspapers fail to enlighten us as to this.

In 1821, it was expected that the anniversary sermon before the Society would be delivered by the Reverend Mr. Crocker in the Baptist Church on Sunday, July 8th, but the Reverend Dr. McPheeters preached on that day, as, for some reason, Mr. Crocker did not deliver his promised discourse. Mr. DuPré, the Recording Secretary, published a report of some length in The Raleigh Register of July 20th, and this expresses regret over the small gains in membership during the preceding year. Yet at that time there were thirty-eight members of the Raleigh Peace Society, and about thirty-five similar organizations throughout the United States, containing an aggregate membership of over sixteen hundred. The Society in Raleigh kept up a fraternal correspondence with peace societies in several distant States, the newspapers mentioning among these one in New Lebanon, Ohio, another in Richmond, Indiana, and also one in Great Britain. At or near Cincinnati, Ohio, was a peace society made up exclusively of women.

Though the Raleigh Peace Society in 1821 had a balance of only ten dollars in its treasury, it had—since its formation in 1819—purchased six hundred and sixty-six pamphlets, periodicals, etc., advocating the cause of peace, and had two hundred and fifty-two undistributed copies on hand.

So far as I can learn, the last public announcement by the Raleigh Peace Society was under date of July 3, 1822, when the statement was made that the anniversary sermon would be preached in the Methodist Church on Sunday, July 14th, by the Reverend George M. Anderson, and that a business meeting would occur on July 15th. This meeting was probably the Society's expiring effort, for the faith of its members was tried by failure. Yet faith they had, and strong faith too, in the ultimate success of the cause they advocated. One of their last public declarations—made while the Society was declining in power—said: "The cause we advocate is the happiness of our species. We know of whom it is said, 'he maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth.' We know also who hath said, 'the nations shall learn war no more'—and we know him who hath called the peace-makers 'blessed'. With a knowledge so rich, so animating, how can we despair of ultimate success? Though our march may be slow, it will be sure; and must end in universal peace on earth and good will among men."

Before closing the above account of the old Raleigh Peace Society, a word or two concerning its officers may not be altogether devoid of interest; and so we shall give, in a very brief way, some account of each one.

William Shaw, who presided over the first meeting and was later Vice-President of the organization, was a Scotchman, born in Ayrshire about the year 1763, and died in Raleigh on December 27, 1827. He came to America early in life and lived for more than thirty years in Raleigh, of which town he was postmaster for a considerable length of time. He was a merchant; and, besides his possessions in Raleigh, he owned lands in Scotland, and at Cape May, New Jersey, bequeathing the former to his nephew. He was married, but left no children, yet had relatives in North Carolina. He was a zealous Christian, and an elder in the Presbyterian Church. In his will he bequeathed $150 to the Bible Society of North Carolina, $150 to the Foreign Missionary Society, $150 to the Presbyterian Missionary Society, and $50 to the Raleigh Female Tract Society.

William Peck, who was President of the Peace Society upon its organization, was born in Norfolk, Virginia, April 1, 1772; was carried to Petersburg, in the same State, when a child, and came to Raleigh in February, 1798. He spent the remainder of his life in Raleigh, and died there on June 21, 1851. In his religious affiliations he was a Baptist. In recording his death, Seaton Gales, editor of The Raleigh Register, wrote as follows: "For more than fifty years he has been actively engaged in business; and, in the midst of its fluctuations, he pursued the even tenor of his way, neither elated by prosperity nor depressed by adversity. He learned in early life to rely on himself for success rather than on the favors of friendship, and thereby acquired an independence of character which elevated him above the reverses of fortune and secured the confidence of his fellow-citizens in all his business transactions. He was not only an honest man, but a good man and a Christian. He delighted in doing good to the bodies and souls of men." Mr. Peck had two sons, Willis and Lewis W. Peck. The latter lived until recent years, doing business in the same little shop formerly occupied by his father, just east of the southeast corner of the Capitol Square.

Richard Fenner, M.D., who was Vice-President of the Peace Society at the time of its organization (but who was later succeeded in that office by Mr. Shaw), knew what war was by personal experience, having fought for America's cause in the Revolution and languished for more than a year in the military prison at Charleston, South Carolina. Dr. Fenner lived in early life at New Bern, later in Franklin County, for a while in Raleigh, and eventually went to Jackson, Madison County, Tennessee, where he died at an advanced age in May, 1828. Both personally and in his chosen profession—the practice of medicine—he was highly esteemed, being described as "a kind-hearted friend and neighbor, and an active and useful member of society." In religion he was an Episcopalian, having originally been connected with the old colonial parish under the Church of England at New Bern. In the Revolution his career began as Paymaster of the Second North Carolina Continental Regiment, on June 1, 1778; he was commissioned Ensign, January 10, 1780; was captured when General Benjamin Lincoln surrendered the city of Charleston to Sir Henry Clinton on May 12, 1780, and remained in prison till exchanged, on June 14, 1781; was made a Lieutenant on May 12, 1781, (just before his exchange), and served till the end of the war. In 1783 he was one of the Continental officers who founded the North Carolina Society of the Cincinnati, at Hillsborough.

Kimbrough Jones, Recording Secretary, was born on the 26th of April, 1783, and died on the 30th of March, 1866. He was a planter of large interests, and came of a family which had long been prominently identified with the affairs of Wake County. He was a son of Nathaniel Jones, of Crabtree, whose father (also named Nathaniel) was a brother of Attorney-General Robert Jones, Jr., better known as "Robin" Jones, an eminent lawyer in the days of royal rule. Kimbrough Jones represented Wake County at five sessions of the North Carolina House of Commons, and in the Constitutional Convention of 1835, his colleague in the latter body being Judge Henry Seawell. In religion Mr. Jones was a Methodist. The plantation where he lived—about three miles north of Raleigh on the Louisburg road, just beyond Crabtree Creek—is now owned by his son and namesake. All of the sons of Mr. Jones, who were living at the time of the war, went into the Confederate Army, the eldest, William Hogan Jones, being a Major in the Forty-eighth North Carolina Regiment, and Henry W. and Kimbrough, Jr., serving in the Third Cavalry or Forty-first Regiment, Company I. Ex-United States Senator James Kimbrough Jones, of Arkansas, is of this family, his father having been born on the upper waters of Crabtree Creek.

Daniel DuPre, who succeeded Mr. Jones as Recording Secretary, was a bank officer and planter. As an expert accountant he had few equals in the State. For more than forty years he resided in or near Raleigh, and was a consistent member of the Baptist Church. Not long before his death, he went to Wilmington, but did not remain there permanently. He died in Raleigh on April 9, 1858, at the age of eighty. "From childhood he had led a pure, unsullied and upright life," says an account written at the time of his death.

Jeremiah Battle, M.D., Corresponding Secretary, was a physician by profession, whose latter years were spent in Raleigh, where he died on the 28th of February, 1825. He belonged to a noted family, at that time chiefly residing in Edgecombe County, of which he was a native. His father, Elisha Battle, Jr., was the son of Elisha Battle, a Revolutionary statesman. Dr. Battle was a capable physician, "universally respected for his liberality and kind and benevolent deportment." He died unmarried, and was a Baptist in religion. He was author of a treatise of a statistical and historical nature relating to Edgecombe County in 1810. This was originally delivered as an address before an agricultural society. It was first published in a newspaper, afterwards in The North Carolina University Magazine, April, 1861, and later still in Our Living and Our Dead, October, 1874.

Sterling Wheaton, M.D., Treasurer, was another physician who practiced in Raleigh at that time. As early as 1802 he aided in organizing the North Carolina Medical Society. That society passed out of existence in a few years, and the present North Carolina Medical Society was not organized until 1849, some years after the death of Dr. Wheaton, which occurred in the summer of 1832. What his church affiliations were I am unable to say, yet his last will and testament (now filed in the records of Wake County) breathes a deeply religious spirit. In it he says: "I die in the full faith of that religion I have professed, and in the humble hope that I shall, by the mercy of my God, through the merits of my Redeemer, be raised up and accepted at the last day, when all shall be called to render an account of the deeds dõne in the flesh."

Thus I have given some account of the short-lived Peace Society of Raleigh, with a few remarks concerning its officers. Who its thirty-eight members were I am unable to say; for, so far as can be learned, its membership list has not been preserved. The religious affiliations of the above officers are given, to show that the movement was inter-denominational in its character.

NORTH CAROLINA STATE LIBRARY

It must be acknowledged that the Society in Raleigh apparently accomplished nothing in its day. It may be, however, that during the brief period of its existence, it encouraged other local societies, of like nature, to keep alive until greater and more effective measures could take shape. If this be true, the influence of these early North Carolina peace-workers is still felt, even though they may have accomplished no noticeable results in their day. And the same influence may be felt more strongly in the years to come, for the movement is steadily gaining favor with civilized nations throughout the world. So the old worthies, who labored and lost in the earlier stages of the efforts for peace on earth, well might say:

> "'Tis not in mortals to command success,
> But we'll do more, Sempronius—we'll deserve it."

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEOLOGICAL MEMORANDA.*

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

MRS. LULA CLARK MARKHAM.

Mrs. Lula Clark Markham was born in Christian County, Kentucky. She is descended from distinguished North Carolina families, her ancestors belonging to the Phillips family of Rowan County.

She is classed among the most promising of the younger writers of her native State, and has long been a contributor to the poetry columns of the leading magazines.

Her home at present is at historic Wilmington, where she is engaged in literary work along the line of North Carolina history.

JAMES CAMERON MacRAE.

Judge James C. MacRae, the author of the article on "The Fayetteville Light Infantry," comes from ancestors numbered among the old and distinguished families of the State. He was born in Fayetteville, North Carolina, October 6, 1838; son of John MacRae and Mary (Shackelford) MacRae, the latter a native of Marion, South Carolina. Judge MacRae graduated from Donaldson Academy at Fayetteville. At the age of fifteen taught school for a short time, then secured a position as clerk and continued in that occupation for several years, when he again turned his attention to teaching. Ambitious to become a lawyer, he studied with this aim while teaching in Brunswick, North Carolina, and Horry District, South Carolina.

*The writer desires to say that this method has been adopted in order to give to our present readers and to posterity some account of those useful citizens who have the history of North Carolina at heart, and who from true and accepted historical records, original manuscripts, wills and other authentic sources have made valuable contributions to this publication.

To these writers THE BOOKLET owes its prosperity and continuance in the work projected by it of developing and preserving North Carolina history. All profits from this publication will be devoted to securing tablets and other memorials to commemorate important events in the history of our commonwealth. MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

In August, 1859, he was licensed to practice law, and in June, 1860, he located in Fayetteville to practice his chosen profession. During the Civil War he enlisted as a private in Company H, First North Carolina Volunteers, and was subsequently promoted to Adjutant of the Fifth North Carolina State Troops. He commanded a battalion in Western North Carolina as Major, and was Assistant Adjutant-General for General Baker in the Eastern District of the State until the end of the struggle. After the war he resumed his practice and succeeded in securing a large clientele. In 1874 was elected a member of the Legislature. July, 1882, he was appointed Judge of the Superior Court to fill an unexpired term, and during same year was elected Judge of the Fourth, afterwards the Seventh Judicial District.

Subsequently he was appointed a Justice of the Supreme Bench of North Carolina, by Governor Holt, to fill the unexpired term of Justice Davis, and was subsequently elected to the position. After leaving the bench he returned to the practice of law and became a member of the legal firm of MacRae & Day, with offices in Raleigh.

Judge MacRae, as attorney for the Seaboard Air Line System, executed his duty with commendable ability. While practicing in the Federal and State courts he was considered an able lawyer and steadily and closely applied himself to the performance of every duty devolving upon him, and to-day holds a position in the front ranks of North Carolina's eminent lawyers. At the bar he has ever disdained the small arts of the pettifogger, and upon the bench he ever held the scales of justice with an even hand, treating with impartiality the poor and the rich, the innocent and the guilty. The degree of LL.D. was conferred upon him by the University of North Carolina. He has also served as Chancellor of the Episcopal Diocese of Eastern Carolina.

On October 31, 1867, he married Miss Fanny Hinsdale, of Fayetteville, and the union has been blessed with nine children.

Judge MacRae was, on August 19, 1899, elected Dean of the Law School of the State University, one of the highest honors that can come to a lawyer. He is editor of North Carolina Journal of Law, and has published several addresses. His sketch of the "Highland Scotch Settlements," which he contributed to the columns of THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET, February, 1905, was a concise and interesting account of this strong and exuberant race, principally from which the American Colonies were peopled. In this sketch may be found information heretofore wanting in historical libraries, interesting not only to the present generation but to those who shall come after them.

During the last month, in the presence of a distinguished array of counsel from the Seventh District and of a number of friends from the Raleigh Bar, ex-Chief Justice James E. Shepherd presented to the Supreme Court a handsome oil portrait of ex-Justice MacRae, a former Associate Justice of this high tribunal.

The remarks of Judge Shepherd consisted of a brief outline of the life and service of Justice MacRae more potent than any eulogy that, as he said, the modesty of his subject forbade. He spoke, however, at the request of the court—in part as follows:

"It is meet, therefore, that a few words be said of one, who, though still living, began his career in that crucial period in the history of his State which reflects his greatest civic and military glories—a time, indeed, when 'None was for the party and all were for the State'—when men bared their breasts to the iron hail of battle, not for conquest or glory, but in defense of their homes and firesides."

Accepting the portrait for the Court, Chief Justice Clark said, "The Court is gratified to receive this portrait and to add it to those of the other learned and able men who look down upon us from these walls, and whose lives and labors reflect credit upon this court and the State.

"It can not be said that Judge MacRae has ceased to be a member of this court. The sitting members are only a part of that greater court which takes part, and whose views are potent in the decision of controversies. The opinions of our predecessors are daily quoted to us at the bar as controlling. The long rows of volumes before us are the repository of their views. In our deliberations and decisions, they descend as it were from their frames, sit at our counsels, throw light upon the path we should go and point the way. They are 'the dead but accepted sovereigns, whose spirits rule us from their urns.'

"In the illustrious company of our predecessors, the recorded opinions of Mr. Justice MacRae, who is yet spared to us, make him still a part of the court. His services were long enough to establish his fame, but too short for the full measure of the service he might have rendered the profession. Yet it may be doubted if in his present position he is not rendering greater service still and more enduring, through his influence upon the future Bar and Judges of North Carolina.

"To those who sat with him here the memory of his uniform courtesy, his great learning and indefatigable labors is a benediction."

Judge MacRae continues as Teacher of Law at the University, beloved by Faculty and students. He is a genial and courteous gentleman, possessing that quiet dignity and strength of character worthy of emulation.

REV. ROBERT BRENT DRANE.

Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D., was born in Wilmington, N. C., December 5, 1851. His father, the Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D.D., came from Maryland and was Rector of St. James's Parish, Wilmington, N. C., for twenty-five years.

His mother's maiden name was Catherine Caroline Parker. Her early home was Tarboro, N. C.

He was ordained to the Priesthood in 1876, and, through Bishop Atkinson's advice, accepted the Rectorship of St. Paul's Parish, Edenton, of which he is yet in charge.

Dr. Drane's article, in this number of THE BOOKLET, on "Historic Edenton," will be of value to students of North Carolina history. Since becoming a resident of this historic place, Dr. Drane's interest in its past has been unabated. He found here a town "rich with the spoils of time" and a most inviting field for one fond of legendary and historical lore. One of the many important movements made by him was having the Records of St. Paul's Church copied by the young

---

NOTE—The BOOKLET takes this method of calling the attention of the patriotic citizens of North Carolina to a matter that if more widely known many names no doubt, would be added to its list of stockholders. Dr. Drane is desirous of getting more subscribers and thereby increase personal and popular interest and money resources.

This Association held its annual meeting in Edenton on April 27th in commemoration of the sailing of Amadas and Barlowe from the west of England April 27th, 1584, O. S. which resulted in the discovery and occupation of Roanoke Island in July 1584.

A review and memoranda of what the Association has accomplished will be given in a future number of the NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

It remains for a generous and patrotic public to uphold the hands of Dr. Drane and the other officers of this Association who are going their time and zeal for the love of their section and their State.

men of the town, in order that the originals might be filed away and saved from destruction by frequent handling. These precious records, dating back to 1701, are carefully preserved in the archives of the church and are greatly valued by the vestry and citizens of the Parish.

Another notable movement projected by him was the removal from abandoned graveyards to St. Paul's church-yard the remains of people distinguished in Colonial and Revolutionary times—a work that his parishioners entered into with zest and interest.

Dr. Drane, through maternal connection with Col. William Haywood, of Revolutionary fame, became a member of the North Carolina Society Sons of the Revolution, and is Chaplain of this Society. His wife, Maria Louisa Warren, is a daughter of a brave Confederate soldier, Maj. Tristram Lowther Skinner, who fell in the Battle of Mechanicsville.

She traces her lineage back to some of the best of old Edenton's good people, the Edens, Lowthers, Blounts, Johnstons and Harveys.

Dr. Drane is the President and a most active member of the "Roanoke Colony Memorial Association," with headquarters at Edenton, N. C. This corporation was organized for the benevolent and patriotic purpose of reclaiming, preserving and adorning Old Fort Raleigh, built in 1585, by the first English settlers on Roanoke Island, the birthplace of Virginia Dare, the first white child born in America; and also to erect monuments and suitable memorials to commemorate these and other historic events in North Carolina.

Dr. Drane's long rectorship in the Parish of St. Paul's argues well for the popularity and usefulness of this golden-hearted Christian gentleman. To him and others of his class for services in the cause of Christianity and unfaltering interest in the material things around, both church and state owe a debt of gratitude.

MISS JULIA SCOTT WHITE.

Miss White's article, in this number of THE BOOKLET, on the Quakers of Perquimans County, will enlighten many who are not familiar with the tenets of this sect of Christians whose distinguishing doctrine is that of the "light of Christ within."

Miss White was born in Perquimans County, N. C., in the year 1866. She is the daughter of Jephtha and Anna M. White, and granddaughter of Joseph and Charlotte (McAdams) White, natives of Scotland. She is a descendant of the Whites, Jordans, and McAdams, of Eastern Virginia, also connected with the Scotts, for whom she is named. Her maternal ancestors have been "Friends" for many generations, but her paternal ancestors for only two. Her father adopted the faith of his father, and was a prominent and useful member of the Friends' organization, and died in the faith, leaving an honored name to his posterity.

Miss White's parents dying in her infancy, she made her home with a sister, Mrs. Josiah Nicholson, at Belvidere, N. C., which she yet retains as her home. It was here that she received her early education, afterwards graduating at Westtown, Pennsylvania.

Adopting teaching as a profession, she was elected Principal of the Graded School in Southampton, Virginia, in 1884-1887; Teacher and Governess at Guilford College, N. C., 1887-1892; was awarded the B. S. degree at this college in 1891; was graduate student of Bryn Mawr College, Pa., 1892-1894; Teacher in Mathematics in Nolb Female College, Louisville, Ky., 1894-1896; Teacher of Mathematics at Pacific College, Oregon, 1896-1900.

Miss White's talents for painstaking accuracy well fitted her for the position to which she was called as Librarian of Guilford College, one of the best and most complete in the State until the recent disaster, which occurred in January, 1908, when about 8,000 volumes were burned. This was a great loss to the college and one most keenly felt by its careful custodian, whose familiarity with these books and records kindled a love like of that unto a brother. Her task, though arduous, in collecting and arranging for another library, will be one of love and interest, and she will heartily welcome the gift of suitable books from a generous public.

Miss White has done considerable editorial work for newspapers and magazines. Among her most recent articles in The American Friend (the national organ of the Friends of America) are the following:

(1) "Dolly Payne Madison," giving the records preserved at Guilford College, showing that she was a "birthright" member of New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends in North Carolina.

Dolly Madison came of pious stock. While presiding genius of the White House, during the administration of her husband, James Madison, she commanded the respect of the nation, and for thirteen years succeeding his death, she maintained a conspicuous and respected position in society at Washington, never forsaking the early and careful teachings received in her youth.

(2) "Friends in South Carolina," particularly the Bush River settlements.

II. In The Guilford Collegian, the College Magazine:

(1) "Matthew W. Ransom," the distinguished soldier, statesman, scholar, and orator. This article was well received and highly commended by his relatives as a true and just eulogy of the merits and public services of this great North Carolinian.

(2) "Guilford—What's in a Name," was a carefully compiled study of the origin of the name and how and why it was transplanted to America.

Miss White, though not a native of Guilford County, loves its people and its traditions.

It was in this county that the "Battle of Guilford Court House" was fought, March 15, 1781—the battle that led to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. The site of this noted battle was secured through the services of that dutiful and distinguished son of North Carolina, the late Judge David Schenck, and the formation of the "Guilford Battle Ground Company," which has cleared up, adorned, and placed there many monuments to distinguished men of the Colonial and Revolutionary period. Since the death of Judge Schenck, Maj. Joseph M. Morehead has been the untiring, zealous and devoted President, under whose guiding hand the work goes on, making this the historic rallying ground of the Piedmont section of North Carolina.

A biographical sketch of Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood will appear in the next BOOKLET. In future issues will be given sketches of those who contributed articles previous to Vol. VI.

ABSTRACTS OF WILLS PREVIOUS TO 1760.

By Mrs. H. DeB. Wills, Genealogist and Historian, N. C D. R.

Will of George Deane, Sr., of Chowan; 1700; Son George, daughter Christian, Wife Elizabeth.

Will of William Benbury; July 1709; Wife Jane Son-in-law James Watch; sons William and John; daughters Martha and Hannah. Test. Henry Bonner, Ann Moseley and Edward Moseley.

Will of James Fewox, Tyrrell; May 5th, 1711; son Robert, John Lawson, Mary Lawson, Jr., grandson Samuel Hardy, son of William Hardy, (brother of John and Jacob Hardy of Bertie), wife Anne, Mary Lawson, wife of Nathaniel Lawson.

Will of Farnifold Green of Bath, 1711; sons Thomas, John, Farnifold, and James Green; wife Hannah, daughters Elizabeth and Jane Green; daughter-in-law Ann Smithwick; wife Hannah Exx.

William Duckenfield, of Cheshire, Eng., Feb. 1721; brother John, Cousin Charles Barbour, Cousin Nathaniel Duckenfield, son of my brother Sir Robert Duckenfield, Mary, Anne, Susanna, Jane, Katherine, and Judith, sisters of Nathaniel.

William Barry, 1722; Marian, brother David Barry, Theo' Morris, Mary Meads, daughter of John Meads of Little River.

Will of Gov. Charles Eden; prob. 1722; dear niece Mrs. Margaret Pough, youngest daughter of Robert Pough, deceased; dear friends John Holloway, Daniel Richardson, James Henderson, John Lovick; John Lovick, Ex.

Will of Thomas Hoskins, 1733-'34; daughter Sarah Charlton, son William, daughter Mary, William Hoskins and John Benbury, executors. (He had other children, among them son Thomas; who can furnish the full list.—N. C. Hist. and Gen'l Register.

Will of Christopher Gale, Chief Justice of the Colony 1734; b. at York, G. B., 54 years old; wife Sarah Catherine, brother Edmund, debts due from the estate of my wife's former husband, John Ismay, son Miles Gale, daughter Penelope Little, Mary, daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth Clayton, gr. daughter Sarah Clayton, Nephew and godson Edmund Gale, Granddaughter Penelope Little. Note, Wife Sarah was Widow of Gov. Thomas Harvey, nee Laker (dau. of Benj. Laker). William Little married his daughter Penelope.

Will of John Baptista Ashe; * * * prob. 1740; son Lemuel, son John, daughter Mary, brother Samuel Swann.

Will of Richard Hill of Bath, Granddaughter Elizabeth Hill, brother Francis Hill, son-in-law Evan Jones, daughter Ann Jones, Craven Precinct 1723-4.

Will of Samuel Johnston of Onslow Co., Prob. Jan. 3—1759; daughters Jean, Penelope, Isabel, Ann and Hannah; sons Samuel and John. Test Cary Godbie, Wm. Williams, John Milton.

Will of Gov. Gabriel Johnston of Eden House, Bertie Co., prob. April 10th, 1753; Wife Frances, daughter Penelope, * * * brother Samuel's children my books to Wm. Cathcart, sister Elizabeth Sinclair of Fife N. B.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

VOLUME VII.

No. 1—JULY, 1907.

North Carolina in the French and Indian War..... 3-12
By Colonel Alfred Moore Waddell.

Locke's Fundamental Constitutions..... 13-49
By Mr. Junius Davis.

Industrial Life in Colonial Carolina..... 50-58
By Mr. Thomas M. Pittman.

An Address: Our Dearest Neighbor—The Old North State.... 59-64
By Hon. James Alston Cabell.

Biographical Sketches: Colonel Alfred M. Waddell, Mr. Junius Davis, Mr. Thomas M. Pittman..... 65-72
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Hon. James Alston Cabell..... 72-74
By Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Abstracts of Wills..... 75-76
By Mrs. Helen De Berniere Wills.

No. 2—OCTOBER, 1907.

Ode to North Carolina..... 79-85
By Pattie Williams Gee.

The Finances of the North Carolina Colonists..... 84-104
By Charles Lee Raper, Ph.D.

Joseph Gales, Editor of Raleigh's First Newspaper..... 105-130
By Mr. Willis G. Briggs.

Our First Constitution, 1776..... 131-137
By Dr. E. W. Sikes.

North Carolina's Historical Exhibit at Jamestown Exposition.. 138-145
By Mary Hilliard Hinton.

Biographical Sketches: Kemp Plummer Battle, LL.D., Charles Lee Raper, Ph.D., Willis Grandy Briggs, Pattie Williams Gee, 146-161
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

Illustrations: Six cuts of Colonial Currency, viz: Eight Pence, One-Sixth of Dollar, Thirty Dollars, Four Pence, One-Third of Dollar, Four Dollars.
Dr. Kemp Plummer Battle.

No. 3—JANUARY, 1908.

General Robert Howe..... 165-192
By Hon. John D. Bellamy.

Early Relations of North Carolina and the West..... 193-209
By Dr. William K. Boyd.

Incidents of the Early and Permanent Settlement of the Cape Fear 210-235
By Mr. W. B. McKoy.

Biographical Sketches: John Dillard Bellamy, William Kenneth Boyd, William B. McKoy..... 236-241
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

No. 4—April, 1908.

Poem: St. James's Churchyard..... 245-247
By Mrs. Loula Clark Markham.

Fayetteville Independent Light Infantry..... 248-266
By Judge James C. MacRae.

The Expedition Against the Row Galley "General Arnold"—A Side Light on Colonial Edenton..... 266-277
By Rev. Robert B. Drane, D.D.

The Quakers of Perquimans..... 278-289
By Miss Julia S. White.

An Early Peace Society in North Carolina, 1819-1822..... 290-300
Abstracts of Wills Previous to 1760..... 310-311

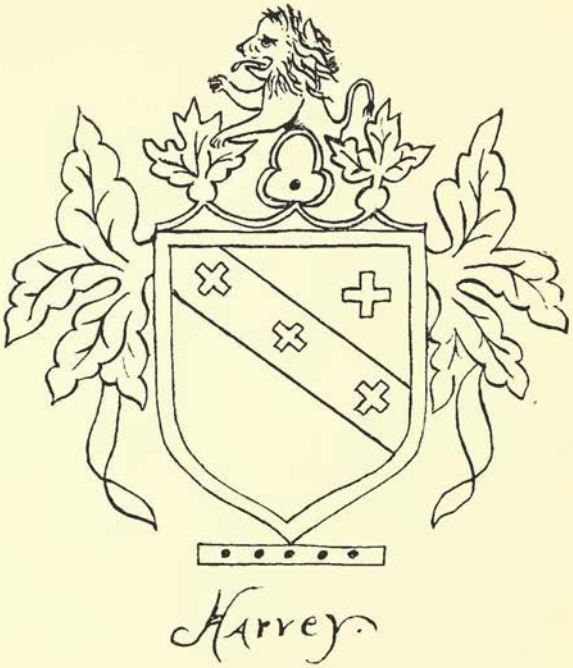
Biographical Sketches: Mrs. L. C. Markham, Rev. Robert B. Drane, D.D., Miss Julia S. White, Judge James C. MacRae.... 301-309
By Mrs. E. E. Moffitt.

DATE DUE

MAY 2 2 1974

GAYLORD

PRINTED IN U.S.A.



Harrey

Vol. VIII. JULY, 1908. No. 1

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the BOOKLET is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. EDITORS.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E. MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:

MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:

MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:

MRS. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:

MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:

MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:

MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VIII JULY, 1908 No. 1

JOHN HARVEY.[1]

BY R. D. W. CONNOR,
Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission.

Of all the men who inaugurated the Revolution in North Carolina, John Harvey, perhaps, is least known. But little has been written of his services to his country, and the student of his career will search in vain outside of the bald official records for more than a mere mention of the official positions which he held. These records, however, reveal a career that would do honor to any of his great contemporaries.

The origin of the Harvey family in North Carolina has been the subject of much speculation and has been accounted for in various ways. The traditional accounts credit Virginia with furnishing this family to North Carolina, but whatever may be true of the other branches, this is not true of the branch from which John Harvey sprung. During the middle of the seventeenth century the first John Harvey of whom we have any record, and his wife Mary, lived "at ye Heath in Shetterfield Parish in Warwick Sheare in Ould Ingland." One of their sons, Thomas Harvey, came to North Carolina some time about 1680 as private secretary to Governor John Jenkins. He himself afterwards served as deputy governor during the absence of Governor Archdale. Upon his arrival there he found others of his name who were already prominent in the official life of the province. They had settled in Perquimans County on Albemarle Sound, occupying a strip of land between the Yeopim and Perquimans rivers, known to this day as Harvey's Neck. Governor Jenkins died December 17, 1681. Within less than four months Thomas Harvey showed his devotion to the memory of his patron by marrying the bereaved widow, Johannah. In those early days in North Carolina, when the number of men in the province greatly exceeded the number of women, it was probably regarded as contrary to public policy for a sprightly woman to hide her charms behind a widow's veil. Six years after her second marriage Johannah Harvey died. Thomas Harvey bore his loss with becoming fortitude and within less than six months resigned his sorrows into the keeping of Sarah Laker, the daughter of a prominent colonial official, Benjamin Laker, and his wife Jane Dey. By her Thomas Harvey had three children. The second son, a Thomas also, married Elizabeth Cole, daughter of Colonel James Cole, of Nansemond County, Virginia. This union continued only a few years, Thomas Harvey dying during the winter of 1729. He left four sons, Thomas, John, Benjamin, and Miles.[2] In his will he made provisions and left directions for the education of these boys; one legacy in this will was a hundred pounds proclamation money for the poor of Perquimans County.

[1] Reprinted, with additional matter, from the "Biographical History of North Carolina," Volume IV, by permission of Charles L. Van Noppen, Publisher.

The second of these boys was destined to become the most illustrious of the Harveys. He was born some time about the year 1725. According to the provisions of his father's will he received a good education, probably under a private tutor, or, as was not unusual then, in England. We may suppose that, like other boys similarly situated, he gave due attention to the sports common in frontier settlements—riding, hunting, fishing, swimming, rowing, and other outdoor amusements. Early in life he was married to Mary Bonner, daughter of Thomas and Abigail Bonner, of Beaufort County. They had ten children. It is not unworthy of remark that the Harveys were a prolific family. John Harvey's eldest son, Thomas, had eight children; his second son, John, had three; Miles, his fifth son, had four; while Joseph, the seventh son, had fourteen. John Harvey's grandchildren also proved themselves in this respect not unworthy of their origin.[3]

[2] Hathaway: North Carolina Historical and Genealogical Register, Vol. 3, No. 3, 476-480.

We know nothing about John Harvey's early life. As soon as he was old enough to understand such things he manifested a lively interest in provincial politics; the traditions of his family, no less than his own inclinations, would lead him to do so. A promising young man, supported by family influence, wealth, and education, he could not fail to attract the attention of the local politicians of the popular party. He had scarcely laid aside his childish things before they brought him forward as a candidate for a seat in the General Assembly, and elected him a member of the session held at New Bern in June of 1746.[4] He arrived one day too late to take part in the organization of the House, which was effected by the election of Samuel Swann speaker. The journal quaintly states that, June 12, "Mr. John Starkey moved that as Mr. Samuel Swann had been speaker heretofore and no objection lay against his behaviour in that station he may be chosen speaker." To this proposition there was no dissent. John Harvey's first session was a short one, lasting only sixteen days.

Harvey had entered the Assembly, however, just in time to become involved in one of the bitterest contests connected with our colonial history. The early North Carolina charters had given to the counties of Chowan, Perquimans, Pasquotank, Currituck, Bertie,[5] and Tyrrell the privilege of sending five members each to the Assembly, and had allotted to all the other counties only two each. As these latter counties grew in wealth and population they looked with jealous eyes on the extra privilege of the older counties. Rivalries and friction enhanced by local prejudices arose out of this inequality. By having five members each the northern counties had a majority of the Assembly, and of course controlled legislation. The southern counties could do nothing but patiently await their opportunity to strike a more nearly even balance. It happened that just at the time John Harvey entered the Assembly the governor, Gabriel Johnston, a hard-headed Scotchman, threw himself into the controversy on the side of the southern counties. In November, 1746, he called the Assembly to meet at Wilmington.[6] On account of the difficulties in reaching Wilmington at that season of the year, the northern members had declared that they would not attend an Assembly held at that place. Relying upon the fact that they composed a majority of the members, they expected, of course, that no session could be held without them. In this they reckoned without their host. Little did John Harvey and his colleagues think that Samuel Swann and his colleagues, for the sake of a petty sectional advantage, would surrender one of the most cherished constitutional principles for which the colonists had ever contended—that no number less than a majority of the Assembly ought to be considered a quorum. But this is just what the southern members did, for at the bidding of a royal governor they formed a house composed of less than a majority, and proceeded to business. Only two bills were passed at this session—one to make New Bern the capital of the province, the other to reduce the representation of the northern counties to two members each. After this had been done the governor with many honeyed words sent the members home.

[3] Ibid. [4] Colonial Records of North Carolina, IV, 818.

[5] Northampton County had afterwards been created out of Bertie and given two of the latter's five members. Northampton acted with the northern counties. [6] Colonial Records, IV, 838.

Of course the northern counties refused to recognize the validity of laws passed by this rump Assembly. So when the governor issued his writs for a new election, commanding them to choose two members each, they refused obedience, and chose five each as usual. John Harvey was one of those elected for Perquimans. But the governor declared the elections void. Thereupon the northern counties appealed to the king. The controversy was long and bitter. Eight years passed before a decision was reached on the appeal, and during these years the northern counties, refusing to send only two members each—the only number the governor would recognize[7]—were not represented in the Assembly of the province. It was not until March 14, 1754, that the board of trade filed its report with the king; the decision was in favor of the northern counties.[8]

Governor Johnston, dying in 1752, did not live to see the end of the controversy he had helped to fasten on the colony. His successor was Arthur Dobbs. He arrived in North Carolina in October, 1754,[9] bringing instructions to call a new Assembly in which the representation was to be distributed as it had been prior to 1746. This Assembly met in New Bern, December 12th, and was the first session in eight years at which all the counties were represented.[10] John Harvey was returned at the head of the Perquimans delegation. John Campbell was there from Bertie, leader of the northern forces; Samuel Swann from Onslow, leader of the southern [7] Col. Rec., IV, 856–57. [8] Col. Rec., V, 81. [9] Col. Rec., V, 144g.

[10] Col. Rec., V, 231.

faction. The northern faction was of course hostile to Swann, and for the first time in fourteen years an opponent for the speakership appeared. An interesting contest ensued. There were fifty-eight members of the Assembly, thirty of whom were of the northern faction, twenty-eight of the southern. On the opening day, however, six members were absent, four of the former, two of the latter party, so that those present were equally divided in their allegiance. This gave the southern members some encouragement, for if their two absent colleagues arrived before those of their opponents, they could re-elect Swann and triumph over the arrogant North. When the house met, therefore, "Mr. Sinclair set up Mr. Samuel Swann; Mr. Thomas Barker proposed and set up Mr. John Campbell, on which the motion was made and the question was put, and the house dividing there appeared an equality of votes." Neither faction was willing to give way. Word was therefore sent to the governor that the house could not yet attend upon him, and his opinion was asked as to the solution of the difficulty. Dobbs replied that it was an unprecedented case, "but in all cases where there was a right, there ought to be a remedy," and he thought the clerk ought to cast the deciding vote. The house would not agree to this, and Swann, realizing that the chances were against him, offered to withdraw. His friends demurred, but in spite of their opposition "Mr. Swann acquainted the members that in order to expedite the business of the house he gave up his pretentions to the said place to Mr. John Campbell, whereupon he was placed in the chair."[11] The next morning Governor Dobbs wrote: "Although there may be some little sparring betwixt the parties, yet both have assured me it shall have no effect upon public affairs or make my administration uneasy." [12]

[11] Col. Rec., V, 233. [12] Col. Rec., V, 153-4.

The great event of Governor Dobbs's administration was the French and Indian War. No man was more British in his enmity to the French or more Protestant in his hostility to their religion than Arthur Dobbs. He made the wringing of money out of the province for the prosecution of the war the paramount object of his administration. The Assembly met his demands as liberally as they thought the situation and circumstances of the province justified, but they could not satisfy the governor. Greater demands pressed in impolitic language gave birth to sharp controversies over the limitations on the prerogatives of the Crown and the extent of the privileges of the Assembly. In these debates John Harvey was one of the leaders in stoutly maintaining that the only authority on earth that could legally levy taxes on the people was their General Assembly. Dobbs's first Assembly voted £8,000 for war purposes.[13] John Harvey was a member of the committee that drafted the bill. An incident connected with its passage is significant and worthy of record. The Council, or upper house, having proposed an amendment, the Assembly, or lower house, promptly rejected it and, instead, resolved, without a dissenting vote, "that the Council in taking upon them to make several material alterations to the said bill whereby the manner of raising as well as the application of the aid thereby granted to his Majesty is directed in a different manner than by that said bill proposed, have acted contrary to custom and usage of Parliament, and that the same tends to infringe the rights and liberties of the Assembly, who have always enjoyed uninterrupted the privilege of framing and modeling all bills by virtue of which money has been levied on the subject for an aid for his Majesty." [14] Within less than a year after this session adjourned all British America was thrown into consternation

[13] Col. Rec., V, 243 et seq. [14] Col. Rec., V, 287,

by the disastrous ending of Braddock's expedition. Governor Dobbs at once convened the Assembly in special session, and in a sensible, well-written address suggested that "a proper sum cheerfully granted at once will accomplish what a very great sum may not do hereafter."[15] The house went into committee of the whole, with John Harvey presiding, to consider the ways and means of raising £10,000. Harvey was also a member of the committee to draft the bill which was promptly passed. Three companies were ordered to be raised and placed at the disposal of the governor. The next session of the Assembly, 1756, voted another war appropriation, £4,400.[16] In the meantime the war had been going against the British and the ministry felt that more concerted action by the colonies was desirable. At a meeting of southern governors at Philadelphia, March, 1757, a plan was adopted which apportioned 400 troops to North Carolina.[17] When Governor Dobbs laid this plan before the Assembly, the house, through a committee of which Harvey was a member, promised to do all within its power to carry it into execution.[18] A bill carrying £5,306 was introduced. John Harvey was especially instrumental in securing its passage. He presided over the committee of the whole to consider ways and means, was a member of the committee that drafted the bill, and a member of the conference committee of the two houses. These appropriations were all voted with "alacrity," as the Assembly said, and the governor acknowledged, though they imposed upon the people a debt of "above forty shillings each taxable," which was more than the currency in circulation in the province.[19]

The summer of 1757 was one of the gloomiest in the annals of the British empire. Success everywhere crowned the arms [15] Col. Rec., V, 495 et seq. [16] Col. Rec., V, 734. [17] Col. Rec., 750.

[18] Col. Rec., V, 829 et seq. [19] Col. Rec., V, 1001.

of France. In America, the French empire "stretched without a break over the vast territory from Louisiana to the St. Lawrence."[20] The Indians called Montcalm the "famous man who tramples the English under his feet."[21] In July, however, a new force was introduced into the contest which, it is not mere rhetoric to say, was destined in a few brief months to raise the banner of England from the dust of humiliation to float among the most exalted stars of glory. This force was the genius of William Pitt, "the greatest war minister and organizer of victory that the world has seen."[22] The Assembly of North Carolina had quarreled with Dobbs, but the words and spirit of Pitt inspired them, "notwithstanding the indigency of the country," to renewed efforts for the support of the war. John Harvey was a member of the committee that drafted a bill enrolling three companies to serve in the Virginia campaign under General Forbes and appropriating £7,000 for their subsistence.[23] The house requested that these troops be sent to General Forbes "without loss of time." The summer of 1758 was as glorious as the summer of 1757 had been gloomy. In every quarter of the globe England's arms were victorious. In Europe victory followed victory with dazzling rapidity. In America Louisburg fell, Fort Frontenac surrendered, and Fort Duquesne was rebaptized with the name of England's great war minister. The North Carolina Assembly at the winter session voted £2,500 for the North Carolina troops serving on the Ohio.[24] After this Dobbs made a total failure in his efforts to direct the Assembly. More zealous than judicious, he allowed himself to become involved in a foolish quarrel in a matter which he was pleased to consider an encroachment upon the king's prerogative; and rather than yield a little where resistance could do no good, he foolishly threw away the supplies which a burdened people reluctantly offered. Quarrel after quarrel followed; the sessions were consumed with quarrels. The Assembly refused to frame supply bills at the governor's dictation, and in an outburst of wrath he wrote to the board of trade that the members were "as obstinate as mules," and appealed to the king to strengthen his authority that he might "prevent the rising spirit of independency stealing into this colony."[25]

[20] Green: Short History of the English People. [21] Fiske: New France and New England, 309. [22] Fiske: Ibid, 315. [23] Col. Rec., V, 1003. [24] Col. Rec., V, 1063.

While the war occupied public attention little else occurred to attract general interest. John Harvey had gradually forged his way to the front rank of the popular leaders and had become the recognized head of the northern party. In October, 1755, Governor Dobbs wrote to the board of trade, "parties are only smothered, yet not quite laid aside."[26] The truth of this observation became apparent at the session of September, 1756. John Campbell was detained at home on account of sickness and sent in his resignation of the speakership. The smoldering embers of faction at once broke forth. The North lined up behind John Harvey in one more effort to break the power of Samuel Swann. But as no one expected such a contest, several members of the Assembly were not present at the opening, and when the roll was called only thirty-eight answered. The majority of these were of the Swann faction, and he was accordingly elected speaker.[27] This was the last attempt made to defeat Swann. Events soon occurred that welded the two parties together for united resistance to the encroachments of the governor, and harmony being the first essential for success, Swann was allowed to preside over the Assembly until he voluntarily resigned the honor. Except for matters relating to the war the time and attention of the Assembly were given largely to schemes for internal improvements. John Harvey was concerned in much of this uninterestingly necessary work. He served on most of the important committees and was frequently called on to preside over the house in committee of the whole.

[25] Col Rec., VI, 251. [26] Col. Rec., V, 440. [27] Col. Rec., V, 689.

Governor Dobbs, who had grown peevish with age, was given permission in 1765 to surrender the cares of his office to a lieutenant-governor and return to England. While he was busily packing for his trip "his physician had no other means to prevent his fatiguing himself than by telling him he had better prepare himself for a much longer voyage." He set sail on this "longer voyage" March 28, 1765.[28] His successor was William Tryon, the ablest of the colonial governors. Tryon's first Assembly met at New Bern, May 3, 1765.[29] He laid before the house some correspondence relative to the establishment of a postal route through the province, and recommended that an appropriation be made for the purpose. This was of course a matter of the first importance, and the Assembly, desiring more information than was then available, resolved to postpone final action until the needed data could be collected. However, "desirous that a matter of such public utility should take effect" at once, the house appointed a committee to arrange with the postmaster general for a temporary route until more definite action could be taken. The chairman of this committee was John Harvey. The work was pushed with vigor and success, and a route was laid out from Suffolk in Virginia to the South Carolina boundary line, a distance of two hundred and ninety-seven miles. In a letter to Governor Bull of South Carolina urging him to have the route continued to Charleston, Governor Tryon says, evidently referring to the committee, that the route was established through North Carolina "by the assiduity of some gentlemen" of this province.[30]

December 20, 1765, Tryon, who had until then been lieutenant-governor, qualified as governor. As was customary when a new governor entered upon his office, he dissolved the Assembly, December 21, and issued writs for a new one. Nearly a year passed, however, before he allowed the members to convene, and they did not meet until November 3, 1766.[31] That day Richard Caswell, representing Dobbs County, "moved that John Harvey, Esquire, be chosen speaker; and [he] was unanimously chosen speaker and placed in the chair accordingly. Mr. Howe and Mr. Fanning," continues the journal, "waited on his excellency the governor, and acquainted him the members had made choice of a speaker, and desired to know when they should wait on him for his approbation; and being returned acquainted the members that his excellency said he would receive them immediately. The members waited on his excellency the governor in the council chamber and presented John Harvey, Esquire, to his excellency for approbation, who was pleased to approve of their choice. Then Mr. Speaker asked his excellency to confirm the usual privileges of the house, particularly of that of freedom of speech, to which his excellency, for answer, was pleased to say that the house might depend he would preserve to them all their just rights and privileges."

[28] Col. Rec., VII, 3, [29] Col. Rec., VII, 61. [30] Col. Rec., VII, 100.

Thus John Harvey at last came to his own. Since the people then had no voice in the choice of their governor, the highest office within their gift was the speakership of the Assembly. To this office the ambitious politician aspired, and to it the leader of the popular party was generally elected. This position, as leader of the province, which John Harvey now assumed, he never lost, though once temporarily laid aside because of ill health. It is of course impossible, from the bare records that have been preserved, to estimate accurately the exact share which he had in the stirring scenes enacted in the province from now until his death, but we know that as leader of the popular party his was the mind that directed the inauguration of the Revolution in North Carolina. He was the author of many of the movements that culminated in the Revolution, while none were attempted until he had been consulted and his co-operation secured. How he bore himself in his responsible position the success of those movements, guided by him in their inception, bears witness.

[31] Col. Rec., VII, 342.

At the winter session of 1767-1768 Edmund Fanning moved in the Assembly that the speaker provide for himself, the clerks and other officials "necessary robes, suitable to their stations, and a mace for this house and the Council at the expense of the public."[32] The motion was passed unanimously. At the next session Harvey reported that he had written to London to learn what the articles would cost, and now submitted his information to the house for instructions. "Whereupon the house resolved," as the journal states, "that the two silver maces of about two feet long and gilded, weighing about one hundred ounces, do not exceed the sum of one hundred and fifteen pounds sterling, and that the robes for Mr. Speaker do not exceed the sum of fifteen pounds sterling."[33] Harvey accordingly ordered the articles through the colony's agent, Henry Eustace McCulloh. McCulloh sent the robe, but not the maces, because he did not have money enough for the latter. A resolution of the North Carolina Assembly evidently would not pass for currency in London. Referring to the robe McCulloh wrote to Harvey: "I flatter myself it will please, for it is rich and plain. You will want a handsome tye upon the occasion, but that, I recollect, George Gray, of Edenton, can furnish you with. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of the sons of Adam bow the knee to appearances; so far wise men approve, and make use of them."[34]

[32] Col. Rec., VII, 656. [33] Col. Rec., VII, 969.

But graver matters than the purchase of parliamentary paraphernalia demanded the attention of John Harvey and the North Carolina Assembly. The Stamp Act had been repealed, but the continent was now in a turmoil from one end to the other over the Townsend Acts. Massachusetts and Virginia, during the summer of 1768, issued their famous circular letters inviting the co-operation of the other colonies in concerting measures of resistance, in order that their remonstrances and petitions to the king "should harmonize with each other." November 11, 1768, John Harvey laid copies before the Assembly.[35] Much to the disgust of some of the leaders the house declined to take any action except to give the speaker verbal directions to answer them.[36] The house then resolved to present "an humble, dutiful and loyal address" to the king, praying the repeal of the several acts imposing duties on goods imported into America. A committee composed of John Harvey, Joseph Montfort, Samuel Johnston, Joseph Hewes, and Edward Vail was appointed to draw up the address, which Henry Eustace McCulloh was instructed to present.[37] Thus the Assembly missed the real significance of the proposition, unity of action with the other colonies. Union was the great bugbear of the king and ministry; they did not doubt that if the colonies could be kept separated they could easily bring them to terms. The policy of the king, therefore, was to avoid as far as possible giving the Americans a common grievance in support of which they could unite. So, too, the king and ministry did not dispute the right of each colony alone to petition the throne for redress of grievances; but they fought desperately against any disposition on the part of the Americans to unite in their [34] Col. Rec., VIII, 59. [35] Col. Rec., VII, 928. [36] Col. Rec., VIII, 9.

[37] Col. Rec., VII, 973.

petitions. Johnston and Hewes were so disgusted at the Assembly's flash in the pan that they declined to serve on the committee. But John Harvey acted more wisely. He assumed that the Assembly intended for the committee to act in concert with the committees of the other colonies, and thus improved on the Assembly's verbal instructions. In his letter to Thomas Cushing, speaker of the Assembly of Massachusetts, Harvey said: "I am directed to inform you that they [the North Carolina Assembly] are extremely obliged to the Assembly of the Massachusetts-Bay, for communicating their sentiments on so interesting a subject; and shall ever be ready, firmly to unite with their sister colonies, in pursuing every constitutional measure for redress of the grievances so justly complained of. This house is desirous to cultivate the strictest harmony and friendship with the assembles of the colonies in general, and with your house in particular. * * * The Assembly of this colony will at all times receive with pleasure, the opinion of your house in matters of general concern to America, and be equally willing on every such occasion to communicate their sentiments, not doubting of their meeting a candid and friendly acceptance."[38] In their letter of instructions to McCulloh, Harvey, Montfort, and Vail, said: "The last thing, Sir, which we shall take leave to recommend to you as the sense of the people and which we doubt not will be equally pleasing to you as to us, will be on your part a spirited co-operation with the agents of our sister colonies and those who may be disposed to serve us in obtaining a repeal of the late act imposing internal taxes on Americans without their consent and the which is justly dreaded by them to be nothing more than an introduction to other acts of the same injurious tendency and fatal consequences."[39] This course taken by John Harvey and the other members of the committee, therefore, saved North Carolina from the odium which a failure to support the common cause would have heaped on the colony.

[38] The Boston Evening Post, May 15, 1769. [39] Col. Rec., VII, 877.

In the address to the king, which Harvey as chairman of the committee probably wrote, the king was reminded that in the past whenever "it has been found necessary to levy supplies within this colony requisitions have been made by your Majesty or your royal predecessors conformable to the rights of this people, and by them cheerfully and liberally complied with"; and while promising a like compliance in the future, the address maintained that members of the "Assembly can alone be the proper judges, not only of what sum they are able to pay, but likewise of the most eligible method of collecting the same. Our ancestors at their first settling, amidst the horrors of a long and bloody war with the savages, which nothing could possibly render supportable but the prospects of enjoying here that freedom which Britons can never purchase at so dear a rate, brought with them inherent in their persons, and transmitted down to their posterity, all the rights and liberties of your Majesty's natural born subjects within the parent state, and have ever since enjoyed as Britons the privileges of an exemption from any taxations but such as have been imposed on them by themselves or their representatives, and this privilege we esteem so invaluable that we are fully convinced no other can possibly exist without it. It is therefore with the utmost anxiety and concern we observe duties have lately been imposed on us by Parliament for the sole and express purpose of raising a revenue. This is a taxation which we are firmly persuaded the acknowledged principles of the British constitution ought to protect us from. Free men can not be legally taxed but by themselves or their representatives and that your Majesty's subjects within this province are represented in Parliament we can not allow, and are convinced that from our situation we never can be."[40]

McCulloh's letters to the committee and to Harvey give the history of the address after it reached him. To the committee he wrote that in accordance with customary procedure he waited on Lord Hillsborough, secretary of state for the colonies, with the address and that his lordship agreed to present it to the king. The answer, he said, would be forwarded through the official channels.[41] To his friend, John Harvey, to whose influence McCulloh owed his appointment, he wrote with more freedom. "The little right I had to expect that warmth of friendship which I have met from you," he said, "is an additional circumstance to the grateful sense I have of your partial kindness; I am very sensible that my success in the affair of the agency is principally the work of your hand. I wish I may ever have it in my power to make you a more weighty return than words; them I will spare. I am proud and happy in your friendship, and will endeavor to deserve it.

"I don't mean a compliment, but I really think the general idea of your petition is the best I have seen. I should have blushed forever for you if you had not bore [sic] some testimony in the good cause. Surely you have been polite and compliant enough.

"It may be proper to give you a little private history as to your petition. I am convinced they would have been better pleased had you let it alone. Many of my friends (acquaintances rather) in Carolina, have kindly hinted to me, that I would best judge whether I would lay the ideas of the mad (rebellious) Americans at the foot of the throne; and have been kindly concerned for the consequences to me should I attempt it. I am much obliged to them. I see nothing in your petition but my soul approves. My spirit as well as my circumstances are independent, and though my Lord H—h [Hillsborough] had the politeness to say that petitioning in my circumstances was foolish, (his own words) I insisted I had no discretion to exercise—no question to ask, but that it should be presented in the most proper and official manner; had he refused I would have bent the knee myself—the way it has been done is the only one, and never deviated from but in cases of refusal. I trust in God I shall never want courage to execute your commands. * * * I have it from authority, to acquaint you, that the acts complained of by America are to be repealed; their proud stomachs here must come down. Our politics here are nothing but a scene of confusion. Men's minds seem greatly inflamed. The ministry, etc., seem most cordially detested—it is, however, my opinion that they will keep their seats. * * * One thing let me add—surely Messrs. H. [Hewes] & J. [Johnston] who have refused to act, will not be continued of the committee of correspondence."[42]

[40] Col. Rec., VII, 980. [41] Col. Rec., VIII, 55.

This Assembly and the governor parted on good terms. Later, because of several deaths among the members, Tryon dissolved it and issued writs for a new election. When the new Assembly met in October, 1769, John Harvey was again unanimously elected speaker.[43] They met the governor in good spirits and everything promised smooth sailing; but unexpected reefs were in the way. In the preceding May the Assembly of Virginia adopted a series of resolutions on the questions at issue between the American colonies and the British Parliament. These resolutions were sent to the speakers of the various colonial assemblies. John Harvey laid a copy before the Assembly of North Carolina, November 2, and the house adopted them verbatim. They denied the right of Parliament to levy taxes in America. They affirmed the right of the subject to petition the throne for redress of grievances. They denounced the act of Parliament requiring Americans accused of treason to be taken to England for trial. They declared "that the seizing any person or persons in this colony suspected of any crime whatsoever committed therein and sending such person or persons to places beyond the sea to be tried is highly derogatory to the rights of British subjects, as thereby the inestimable privilege of being tried by a jury from the vicinage, as well as the liberty of summoning and producing witnesses on such trial, will be taken away from the party accused." An address to the king was adopted which presented in a different form the same ideas embodied in the resolutions; and McCulloh was instructed, after presenting it to the king, to have it printed in the British papers.[44] Convinced by experience that the ears of the king were deaf to their appeals, the Americans now began to appeal to their British brethren. For these resolutions the house suffered the penalty of dissolution.

[42] Col. Rec., VIII, 58–61. [43] Col. Rec., VIII, 107.

The Assembly was dissolved November 6, 1769. But the members had not completed their work and they were not ready to go home. They thought "it necessary that some measures should be taken in their distressed situation, for preserving the true and essential interests of the province," and therefore resolved to hold a meeting "for that very salutary purpose," independent of the governor. Sixty-four of the seventy-seven members immediately repaired to the court-house and organized themselves into a convention. So far as I have been able to ascertain no account of this meeting has ever appeared in any history and, therefore, at the risk of being tedious and of prolonging this sketch beyond the proper limits, I shall give the account in full as it appears in the South Carolina Gazette and Country Journal, of December

[44] Col. Rec., VIII, 121–124.

8, 1769.[45] Says that paper, after stating the fact of the meeting, "it was first proposed, for the more decent and regular discussion of such matters as might be taken into consideration, that a moderator should be appointed, and John Harvey, Esq., late speaker of the house of Assembly, was unanimously elected.

"The true state of the province being then opened and fully explained, and it being proposed that a regular association should be formed, a committee was appointed to prepare the necessary and most proper regulations for that purpose, and they were ordered to make their report to the general meeting the next day, at nine o'clock."

The next day accordingly the committee made their report, "which being read, seriously considered, and approved, was signed by a great number of the late members of the Assembly then present, and is as follows:

"We, his Majesty's most dutiful subjects, the late representatives of all the freeholders of the province of North-Carolina, avowing an invincible attachment and unshaken fidelity to our most gracious Sovereign, and protesting against every act that may have the least tendency to disturb the peace and good order of this government, which we are willing, at the risque of our lives and fortunes, to maintain and defend; but, at the same time, sensibly affected with the hardships, difficulties and discouragements the colonies at present labour under, from several taxes and impositions laid on by Parliament, for the sole purpose of a revenue, by which our money is taken from us, without our consent, and applied to the sup-

[45] For this, and the other material from the South Carolina papers used in this article, I am indebted to Miss Mabel L. Webber, the very efficient Secretary of the South Carolina Historical Society. Miss Webber has been engaged by the North Carolina Historical Commission to make an index to the North Carolina items in the Colonial and Revolutionary newspapers of Charleston, and has done her work with thoroughness and accuracy. These items throw much new light on the early history of North Carolina.—R. D. W. C.

port of new created commissioners of customs, and other placemen: And by other acts of Parliament, we are deprived of that invaluable privilege of trial by our peers and the common law, and made subject to the arbitrary and oppressive proceedings of the civil law, justly abhorred by our ancestors, the freemen of England: And finding, that the most dutiful and loyal petitions and remonstrances from the colonies for redress, have been rejected with contempt; and dreading the evils which threaten us and our posterity, by reducing us from freedom to a state of slavery; and in order to stimulate our fellow subjects, the merchants and manufacturers in Great-Britain, to aid us in this our distress, and to shew our readiness to join, heartily, with the other colonies, in every legal method which may most probably tend to procure a redress, which we believe, will be most effectually promoted by establishing economy, encouraging American manufactures in general, and of this province in particular; promoting industry, and discouraging all manner of luxury and extravagances: We do therefore, most earnestly, recommend this our association, to the serious attention of all gentlemen, merchants, traders, and other inhabitants of this province, not doubting that they will, very readily and cordially, accede thereto; we therefore, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do solemnly promise and agree, to and with each other, that until the colonies are restored to their former freedom, by a repeal of those oppressive acts, we will most truly adhere to, and abide by the following resolutions, to-wit:

"First. It was unanimously agreed on and resolved, this 7th day of November, 1769, that the subscribers, as well by their own example as all other legal ways and means in their power, will promote and encourage industry and frugality, and discourage all manner of luxury and extravagance; and will also encourage and promote the use of North American manufactures in general, and those of this province in particular; and such of the subscribers who shall or may have any such for sale, will sell and dispose of them at the same rates as heretofore.

"Secondly. That they will not at any time hereafter, directly or indirectly, import or cause to be imported, any manner of goods, merchandise or manufactures, which are or shall hereafter be taxed by act of Parliament for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, except paper, not exceeding eight shillings sterling per ream, and except such articles only as orders have already been sent for; nor purchase any such after the first day of January next, of any person whatever, but they will always consider such taxation, in every respect, as an absolute prohibition; and in all future orders forbid their correspondents to ship them any goods whatever, taxed as aforesaid, except as is above excepted.

"Thirdly. That the subscribers will not hereafter, directly or indirectly, import or cause to be imported from Great Britain, or any part of Europe, (except such articles of the produce and manufacture of Ireland, as may be immediately and legally brought from thence, and also all such goods as orders have been already sent for) any of the goods hereinafter enumerated, to-wit: Spirits, wine, cyder, perry, beer, ale, malt, barley, pease, beef, pork, fish, butter, cheese, tallow, candles, oil, fruit, sugar, pickles, confectionary, pewter, hoes, axes, watches, clocks, tables, chairs, looking-glasses, carriages, joiners and cabinet work of all sorts, upholstery of all sorts, trinkets, and jewellery, plate and gold, and silversmiths work of all sorts, ribbons and millinery of all sorts, (except spices), silks of all sorts, (except sewing silk), cambrick, lawn, muslin, gauze, (except bolting cloth), calico, or cotton stuffs, of more than two shillings per yard, linens of more than two shillings per yard, woollens, worsted 'stuffs of all sorts, of more than one shilling and six-pence per yard, broadcloths of all kinds, of more than eight shillings per yard, narrow cloths of all kinds, of more than three shillings per yard, hats, stockings, shoes and boots, saddles and all manufactures of leather and skins, of all kinds, until the late act of Parliament imposing duties on tea, paper, glass, etc., for the purpose of raising a revenue in America are [sic] repealed; and they will not after the first day of January next, purchase any of the above enumerated goods of any person whatsoever, unless the above mentioned acts of Parliament are repealed.

"Fourthly. That in all orders which any of the subscribers may hereafter send to Great Britain, they shall and will expressly direct their correspondents not to ship them any of the above enumerated goods, until the above mentioned acts are repealed; and if any goods are shipped to them contrary to the tenor of this agreement, they will refuse to take the same, or make themselves chargeable therewith.

"Fifthly. That they will [not] import any slaves or purchase any imported, after the first day of January next, until the said acts of Parliament are repealed.

"Sixthly. That they will not import any wine of any kind whatsoever, or purchase the same from any person whatsoever, after the first day of January next, (except such wines as are already ordered) until the act of Parliament imposing duties thereon are [sic] repealed.

"Seventhly. For the better preservation of the breed of sheep, that they shall not kill, or suffer to be killed, any lambs that shall be yeaned before the first day of May, in any year, nor dispose of such to any butcher, or other person, whom they have reason to expect intends to kill the same.

"Eighthly and Lastly. That these resolves shall be binding on all of the subscribers, who do hereby, each and every person for himself, upon his word and honour, agree that he will strictly and firmly adhere to, and abide by, every article in this agreement, from the time of his signing the same, for and during the continuance of the before mentioned acts of Parliament; and every subscriber who shall not strictly and literally adhere to his agreement, according to the true intent and meaning hereof, ought to be treated with the utmost contempt."

Upon the publication of these resolves the newspapers declared with triumph: "This completes the chain of union throughout the continent for the measure of non-importation and economy."

Governor Tryon had been pleased at the action of the Assembly on the circular letter of 1768; but now his wrath boiled over. He declared that the resolutions and address adopted by the Assembly "have sapped the foundations of confidence and gratitude, have torn up by the roots every sanguine hope I entertained to render this province further service, if in truth I have rendered it any, and made it my indispensable duty to put an end to this session."[46] To Lord Hillsborough he wrote: "I must confess the proceedings of the last Assembly have wounded my sensibility and, being dangerously ill at the time, their conduct took advantage of the then weak state of my mind, and for that reason perhaps has made the deeper impression upon it. I wish I could say with Lord Botetourt[47] that my prospect brightens. Confidence, my Lord, that delicate polish in public transactions, has received an ugly scratch, and I fear we have no artists here who can restore it to its original perfection."[48] In his reply Lord Hillsborough declared that the conduct of the Assembly in adopting "measures and resolves so unbecoming and unwarrantable" gave "great concern" to his Majesty.[49]

[46] Col. Rec., VIII, 134. [47] Governor of Virginia. [48] Col. Rec., VIII, 169. [49] Col. Rec., VIII, 170.

But the friends of the American cause were as much pleased as its enemies were offended. To John Harvey, Henry Eustace McCulloh wrote: "A letter from Mr. Pryor acquaints me of the dissolution of your late Assembly and of my appointment as agent. I am pleased to think the Assembly had virtue to deserve the first event; and I am sensible I am greatly to thank you for the second."[50] Later he referred again to their resolutions: "In my opinion the proceedings of your late Assembly have vindicated the honor of the province, and I pray God, future assembles may ever have wisdom to see, virtue to assert, and courage to vindicate the just rights of themselves and their constituents."[51] Ten days later he added: "Your governor (in my opinion) would have done wiser to have been less passionate; and had he been so I do not believe he would have been blamed here. Lord Hillsborough has found out at last that dissolutions do no good."[52]

A sentence in one of McCulloh's letters reveals the commanding position in the province which Harvey had now attained. Acknowledged leader of the popular party, there was no political position which he could now accept that would have been regarded as a promotion. McCulloh says: "For the reasons you approve, I shall endeavor hard to get some of the vacant seats in the Council filled by gentlemen from the northward. I may be wrong, but I at present conceive it would be a lessening of your dignity and weight to take one of them. Pray write me unreservedly on this subject."[53] Many of the leaders of the Assembly had stepped up into the Council; for Harvey alone it was suggested that it would be a step downward.

When the new Assembly met at New Bern in December, 1770, Richard Caswell was elected speaker. It has been frequently stated that the Assembly took this step because they were anxious to placate Tryon, and John Harvey on account of his bold stand for the privileges of the colony was not acceptable to the governor. Such a statement is not only erroneous, but does a great injustice to all the persons concerned. It is an insinuation that the Assembly could stoop to the sacrifice of their leader in order to please a royal governor; it is an insinuation that Tryon had no better sense than to bite at the bribe; it is an insinuation that Richard Caswell was not true to the interests of the province and was willing to lend himself as a peace offering at the expense of his leader; it is an insinuation that John Harvey was willing to show the white feather after having so arrogantly waved the red flag. There is no need to seek such a complicated explanation of such a simple event; the plain truth is that John Harvey was at home sick when the Assembly convened and so a substitute had to be found. What better substitute could be found for bold John Harvey than the versatile Richard Caswell? It may as well be said here that John Harvey's relations with Tryon were of the most friendly, and even confidential, nature. In that event in Tryon's career for which he has been most blamed, the Regulator War, he received the sympathy and support of John Harvey.

[50] Col. Rec., VIII, 171. [51] Col. Rec., VIII, 181. [52] Col. Rec., VIII, 183.
[53] Col. Rec., VIII, 184.

Whatever may be the sympathies of the people of North Carolina to-day, one thing is certain—the Regulators received scant sympathy from those patriots of North Carolina who organized and conducted the Revolution and won American independence. In a letter to John Harvey, December 21, 1770, while the Assembly was in session and Harvey was at home sick, James Iredell said: "Before I left New Bern the Assembly had done nothing, but since there have been appearances very alarming. The day I left town (New Bern), Mr. Johnston presented a spirited bill to the house upon the subject of punishing the Regulators. * * * This bill, I believe, sir, you would have thought expedient, though severe, but desperate diseases must have desperate remedies. * * * Your absence, sir, at so critical a period is much to be lamented, but yourself are equally to be pitied for the unhappy occasion, as your country for the unhappy effects of it."[54] McCulloh in a letter to Edmund Fanning, whom the Regulators especially detested, refers to Harvey, and two others, as "our common friends."[55] Tryon, too, regarded Harvey as friendly to his movement against the Regulators, and there is nothing to show that Harvey felt otherwise. When about to set out on his Alamance campaign, the governor wrote to Harvey: "Though I am apprehensive your situation lays [sic] too remote from the seat of the disturbances in this country to give government in time any aid to suppress the insurgents, I, nevertheless, out of respect to you, take the liberty to inform you that I purpose the last week in next month to begin my march from New Bern to Orange County, so as to be if possible the first week in May in the settlements of the insurgents."[56] It is probable that had he not been ill Harvey would have followed the example of Harnett, Caswell, Ashe, the Moores, and other leaders and marched to Alamance with Tryon.

After the battle of Alamance Tryon went to New York and Josiah Martin came to North Carolina. Martin met his first Assembly November 19, 1771. The session was short, for the governor soon quarreled with the house over a measure which he denounced as "a monstrous usurpation of authority that I think provides irrefragably the propensity of this people to democracy."[57]

The Assembly did not meet again until January, 1773. Richard Caswell, whose bold conduct had been the cause of Martin's wrath, might very justly have demanded that the [54] Col. Rec., VIII, 270. [55] Col. Rec., VIII. 223. [56] Col. Rec., VIII, 697.

[57] Col. Rec., IX, 234.

members endorse his conduct by re-electing him speaker. But realizing that it was an improper time for self-seeking, he deferred to the real leader of the Assembly, and himself nominated John Harvey. From this session till the end of royal rule in North Carolina John Harvey was continuously elected speaker of the Assembly without opposition. This January session ended in confusion. During the preceding summer Governor Martin, acting under certain instructions from the king which the assembly had positively declined to follow, had caused the boundary line between North Carolina and South Carolina to be run in such a way as to operate to the disadvantage of the former province. He now called upon the Assembly to defray the expenses of this work and the house peremptorily and sharply refused. In order to give them an opportunity to reconsider their action, which, under the rules of the house, could not be done at that session, Martin prorogued the session from March 6th to March 9th. On the 9th, when he was ready to meet the Assembly again, he found to his astonishment that the majority of the members had gone home. He therefore convened those who remained and commanded them to form a house. They refused unless a majority of the members should return. When Martin asked John Harvey if he expected a sufficient number to return to make a majority, Harvey replied that he had not "the least expectation" that any such event would occur. In an outburst of rage Martin declared that "the Assembly had deserted the business and interests of their constituents and flagrantly insulted the dignity and authority of government," and forthwith dissolved it.[58] He afterwards wrote to Lord Dartmouth, secretary of state for the colonies, that he had the satisfaction to find that "no ill humour or disposition has been discovered toward me," but "the Assembly confessed with one accord that I had acted in every part of this business with uniform and becoming firmness, an effort of candour that I will acknowledge to your lordship I did not expect, but that is not therefore the less pleasing to me. To evince their regard to me the speaker and the other members who remained in town, at the dissolution of the Assembly, paid me a visit on the evening of that day, and complimented me in the most respectful manner. In justice to these gentlemen, my lord, it behooves me to remark to your lordship, that they were the flower of that very heterogeneous body."[59] One can not let pass this opportunity to remark that these "flowers," in the estimation of Governor Martin, soon degenerated into very obnoxious weeds.

[51] Col. Rec., IX, 594–595.

The Assembly at this session manifested their regard for John Harvey by voting him out of the public treasury £100 "as a reward" for his extraordinary trouble, assiduity and attention to the business of the Assembly. The Council readily concurred in this resolution and the governor assented to it, declaring that he did so "with the greatest pleasure * * * as it is a token of the just respect of your house to Mr. Speaker, which I am well assured the faithful services of that gentleman will always claim."[60] A similar mark of respect, except that the sum was £200, was again shown in 1774.

In the meantime the quarrel with the mother country had continued with increasing bitterness, until it had become apparent to all Americans that if they were to make a successful stand for their liberties they must stand together. So when John Harvey at the December session in 1773 laid before the house letters from Virginia proposing that each colony appoint a committee of correspondence to keep in touch with the committees of the other colonies, the idea found ready acceptance. The following were elected a committee for [59] Col. Rec., IX, 600. [60] Col. Rec., IX, 571, 580, 936.

North Carolina: John Harvey, Robert Howe, Cornelius Harnett, William Hooper, Richard Caswell, Edward Vail, John Ashe, Joseph Hewes, and Samuel Johnston.[61] Thus North Carolina took her first step towards union. The next step was the natural consequence of the first and was easy to take. This was the call that now went abroad throughout the country for a Continental Congress. When Martin learned that North Carolina was determined to join in this congress he determined to prevent it by refusing to call the Assembly together until too late to elect delegates. April 2, 1774, he wrote to Lord Dartmouth that "writs have been issued for the election of a new Assembly, returnable on the 26th of May next, being one day beyond the time to which the late Assembly stood prorogued, but unless some unforeseen public exigency shall make it expedient, I do not propose another meeting of the Legislature until the fall."[62] Tryon had successfully adopted this plan to prevent the election of delegates to the Stamp Act Congress; but Martin lacked a good deal of Tryon's tact and personal popularity, and the men with whom he was contending were not the kind to be caught twice in the same trap. When the governor's private secretary communicated his determination to John Harvey, Harvey flew into a rage, exclaiming, "In that case the people will convene one themselves." April 5, 1774, Samuel Johnston wrote to William Hooper: "Colonel Harvey and myself lodged last night with Colonel Buncombe, and as we sat up very late the conversation turned on continental and provincial affairs. Colonel Harvey said during the night, that Mr. Biggleston told him, that the governor did not intend to convene another Assembly until he saw some chance of a better one than the last; and that he told the secretary that then the people would convene one themselves. He was in a very violent mood, and declared he was for assembling a convention independent of the governor, and urged upon us to co-operate with him. He says he will lead the way and will issue handbills under his own name, and that the committee of correspondence ought to go to work at once. As for my own part, I do not know what better can be done. Without courts[62] to sustain the property and to exercise the talents of the country, and the people alarmed and dissatisfied, we must do something to save ourselves. Colonel Harvey said that he had mentioned the matter only to Willie Jones, of Halifax, whom he had met the day before, and that he thought well of it, and promised to exert himself in its favor. I beg your friendly counsel and advice on the subject, and hope you will speak of it to Mr. Harnett and Colonel Ashe, or any other such men."[63]

[61] Col. Rec., IX, 737, 740, 741. [62] Col. Rec., IX, 959.

Harvey's bold and revolutionary proposition fell upon willing ears. The people rallied to his support; the convention was called; and in defiance of Governor Martin's proclamation forbidding it, met at New Bern, August 25, 1774.[64] Seventy-one delegates were present, among them the ablest men in the colony. When they came to choose their presiding officer all eyes turned to one man, the father of the convention, John Harvey. A series of resolutions was passed denouncing the acts of Parliament, stating the claims of the Americans, and expressing approval of the call for a Continental Congress to which delegates were elected. John Harvey was authorized to call another convention whenever he thought it necessary. Then having resolved "that the thanks of this meeting be given to the Hon. John Harvey, Esquire, moderator, for his faithful exercise of that office and the services he has thereby rendered to this province and to the friends of America in general," the convention adjourned. No more significant step had ever been taken in North Carolina than the successful meeting of this convention. It revealed the people to themselves; they now began to understand that there was no special magic in the writs and proclamations of a royal governor; they themselves could appoint delegates and organize legislatures without the intervention of a king's authority. This was a long step toward independence; John Harvey took it, the people followed.

[62] This was due to the fact that the Assembly declined to pass a court law in accordance with the king's instructions, and the king refused assent to any other. For a brief account of this long contest see sketch of Cornelius Harnett, in No. 3 of Vol. 5 of The North Carolina Booklet.
[63] Col. Rec., IX, 968. [64] Col. Rec., IX, 1029, 1041.

During the summer of 1774 the distressed situation of Boston, because of the Boston Port Bill, touched the hearts of the American people. In all the colonies the cry went up that Boston was suffering in the common cause. The convention of North Carolina reiterated this cry and the people, by their generous contributions, showed that their sympathy lay deeper than words. From Wilmington, New Bern, Edenton, and the surrounding counties ship loads of provisions were sent free of freight charges to the suffering poor of the New England city. September 20, 1774, John Harvey addressed the following letter to the committee of correspondence in Boston, composed of James Bowdoin, John Hancock, Samuel Adams, and Isaac Smith:

"PERQUIMANS Co., 20th Sept., 1774.[65]

"Honorable Gentlemen.

"Joseph Hewes, Esq., appointed a trustee with me, to collect the donations of the inhabitants of two or three counties in the neighborhood of Edenton, for the relief of our distressed brethren of Boston, being absent attending the Constitutional Congress at Philadelphia, I have the pleasure to send you, as per enclosed bill of lading, of the sloop Penelope, Edward Herbert, master, which [I] wish safe to hand, and that you will cause the amount of the same to be divided among the poor inhabitants according to their necessities.

[65] Massachusetts Historical Society Collection, 4th Series, Vol. 4, 85–86.

"The captain has received the most of his freight here. The balance will be paid him on return, the cargo to be delivered clear of any expense; which you would have received some months sooner, but the difficulty of getting a vessel on freight prevented. [I] hope to be able to send another cargo this winter, for the same charitable purpose, as the American inhabitants of this colony entertain a just sense of the sufferings of our brethren in Boston, and have yet hopes that when the united determinations of the continent reach the royal ear, they will have redress from the cruel, unjust, illegal and oppressive late acts of the British Parliament. I take the liberty to inclose you the resolves of our provincial meeting of deputies, and have the honor to be, with the most perfect respect and esteem, in behalf of Mr. Hewes and self,

"Honorable Gentlemen, your most obedient and very humble servant, JOHN HARVEY."

This cargo was received October 15. It consisted of 2,096 bushels of corn, 22 barrels of flour, and 17 barrels of pork, which, as the Boston committee said in their letter of thanks, was a noble and generous donation from their worthy brethren and fellow countrymen of the two or three counties in the neighborhood of Edenton. "We thank you," continued the Boston committee, "for the resolves of your provincial meeting of deputies, which you were so kind as to inclose. We esteem them as manly, spirited and noble, worthy our patriotic brethren of North Carolina. The tender concern for, and honor done, this greatly injured and oppressed town and province, expressed therein, demand our particular notice and grateful acknowledgments, which are hereby tendered by this committee in behalf of the town. In short, your bounty, of which we now partake so largely, and the encouragement given of the increase thereof, lay us under the greatest obligation, and make us almost forget our misery. God grant that our endeavors to restore and preserve the rights of our dear America may be attended with His favor and blessing; then we may hope that we shall have occasion, both he that soweth and he that reapeth, to rejoice together in the salvation of our God and Saviour. To Him be all the glory."[66]

And yet there are those who would have us believe that in this great contest with the power of Great Britain none of the American colonies played other than a selfish role!

Foiled in his purpose to hold North Carolina aloof from the Continental Congress, Governor Martin determined to make the best of a bad situation and summoned the Assembly to meet him at New Bern, April 4, 1775. John Harvey immediately called a convention to meet at the same place April 3.[67] It was a wise precaution, for the Assembly sat only at the pleasure of the governor, who would certainly dissolve it upon the first manifestation of disloyalty. It was intended that the members of the Assembly should also be members of the convention, and this plan was carefully carried out, though there were members of the former who were not members of the latter. Martin was furious and denounced Harvey's action in two resounding proclamations.[68] The convention replied by electing Harvey moderator; the Assembly by electing him speaker.[69] The governor roundly scored both bodies, and both bodies roundly scored the governor. It was indeed a pretty situation. One set of men composed two political bodies—one legal, sitting by the authority of the royal governor and in obedience to his writ; the other non-legal, sitting in defiance of his authority and in direct disregard of his proclamation. The governor impotently demanded that the former join him in denouncing and dispersing the latter, composed largely of the same men whose aid he solicited. The two bodies met in the same hall, the convention at nine o'clock a. m., the Assembly at ten, and were presided over by the same man. When the governor's private secretary was announced at the door, in an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, Mr. Moderator Harvey would become Mr. Speaker Harvey and gravely receive his excellency's message.[70]

[66] Ibid, 86–88. [67] Col. Rec., IX, 1125. [68] Col. Rec., IX, 1145, 1177.
[69] Col. Rec., IX, 1178, 1187.

Neither body accomplished much. The convention approved the "Association" recommended by the Continental Congress, agreed to adhere to it, and recommended it to the people of the province. A resolution declaring the right of the people themselves, or through their representatives, to assemble and petition the throne for redress of grievances was adopted, with the conclusion that "therefore, the governor's proclamation issued to forbid this meeting, and his proclamation afterwards commanding this meeting to disperse, are illegal and an infringement of our just rights and, therefore, ought to be disregarded as wanton and arbitrary exertions of power." Hooper, Hewes, and Caswell were reelected delegates to the Continental Congress, and a resolution of thanks for their services was adopted. Thereupon Mr. Speaker Harvey returned the thanks of the house in the following words:

"GENTLEMEN:—The sacred trust reposed in you by your country, so faithfully discharged by you, does honor to yourselves; justifies the choice made of you by the last convention; and places you in a situation to receive the best reward a patriotic breast can fill [feel], the applause of your country, who, in order to bear testimony to your merit, have directed me to convey to you their sincere thanks for the services you have rendered them in the important office to which they appointed you. And it is with great pleasure I now, gentlemen, in behalf of this colony in general and of this convention in particular, return you those thanks which have been so unanimously resolved by the convention to be your due."

[70] Col. Rec., Prefatory Notes, IX, XXXIV.

The next day John Harvey, or in the event of his death, Samuel Johnston, was authorized to call another convention when necessary.

The Assembly had time only to organize and exchange messages with the governor when it, too, came to an end. Its first offense was the election of John Harvey speaker. The governor had authority to reject the Assembly's choice if he saw fit, but he did not dare do so, however bitter a pill it was. "On the 3d instant, the time appointed for the meeting of the convention," thus he wrote to Lord Dartmouth, "* * * hearing that many deputies from the counties were come here, I issued the proclamation, of which I now transmit your lordship a copy numbered 1,[71] notwithstanding which I found this unlawful body met for a short time and elected Mr. Harvey moderator, by whose advertisement it had been convened. I still hoped the Assembly on what I had to say to it would secede from this convention, although I well knew that many of the members had been sent as deputies to it. And this hope, together with my desire to lay no difficulties in the way of the public business, induced me on the next day to admit the election of Mr. Harvey, who was chosen speaker of the Assembly, and presented by the house for my approbation. Indeed, to say the truth, my lord, it was a measure to which I submitted upon these prinples not without repugnance even after I found the Council unanimously of the opinion that it would not be expedient to give a new handle of discontent to the Assembly by rejecting its choice if it should fall as was expected upon Mr. Harvey, for I considered his guilt of too conspicuous a nature to be passed over with neglect. The manner, however, of my admitting him, I believe sufficiently testified my disapprobation of his conduct while it marked my respect to the election of the house."[72] The next day the Assembly committed its second offense by inviting the delegates to the convention who were not also members of the Assembly to join in the latter's deliberations. The governor promptly sent the sheriff of Craven County with a proclamation to forbid this unhallowed union. The only notice taken of it was by James Coor, the member from Craven County, who said, after the sheriff had read the proclamation: "Well, you have read it and now you can take it back to the governor."[73] "Not a man obeyed it," wrote Martin, who had thus far succeeded in keeping his temper admirably. But on the fourth day of the session the house adopted resolutions approving the "Association" of the Continental Congress, thanking the delegates for their services, and endorsing their re-election. This was more than the governor had bargained for, and when he learned of it his wrath boiled over. He promptly issued his proclamation, April 8, 1775, dissolving the Assembly. It was the last Assembly that met in North Carolina at the call of a royal governor and by its dissolution Governor Martin put an end to British rule in that province. In a letter to Lord Dartmouth, describing these events, he said: "I am bound in conscience and duty to add, my lord, that government is here as absolutely prostrate as impotent, and that nothing but the shadow of it is left. * * * I must further say, too, my lord, that it is my serious opinion which I communicate with the last degree of concern that unless effectual measures, such as British spirit may dictate, are speedily taken there will not long remain a trace of Britain's dominion over these colonies."[74]

[71] Col. Rec., IX, 1177.

[72] Col. Rec-, IX, 1212. [73] Col. Rec., IX, 1213.

It was impossible for Governor Martin to let slip any opportunity to vent his wrath at a rival. Three days after the dissolution of the Assembly he called the attention of the Council to the proceedings of the convention "signed John Harvey, moderator, wherein are certain resolves highly derogatory to the honour and dignity of his Majesty's government, tending to destroy the peace and welfare of this province, in the highest degree oppressive of the people, and utterly subversive of the established constitution. He therefore submitted to the consideration of this board the propriety of marking its indignation of such unlawful and dangerous proceedings by striking Mr. John Harvey out of his Majesty's commission of the peace for the county of Perquimans, where he resides."[75] The councilors of his Majesty's governor gravely concurred in these sentiments and John Harvey's judicial head fell at the block.

But little did John Harvey care. His time for earthly honors and earthly contests was rapidly drawing to a close. The last days of his life were spent under the clouds of the rapidly coming revolution. That revolution no man had done more to produce than he. No man watched its outcome with greater confidence, or awaited it with greater hope. But it is one of the tragedies of human life that men often are not permitted to see and enjoy the fruits of their labors and sacrifices. So it was with this man of the people, this political leader with the vision of a prophet, this organizer of revolution destined to mark the beginning of an era in the history of mankind. The South Carolina Gazette and Country Journal,[76] in a letter dated at New Bern, May 19, 1775, announced his death in the following appreciative obituary:

[74] Col. Rec., IX, 1215. [75] Col. Rec., IX, 1215–1216. [76] June 6. 1775.

"With inexpressible grief and concern, we have received from Edenton the melancholy account of the death of Col. John Harvey, of Perquimans County, who a few days since died at his seat there after a very short illness, occasioned, it is said, by a fall from his horse. The respectable and uncommon character of this worthy member of society has, for many years past, placed him in the highest department of this province in the gift of the people, that of speaker of the house of Assembly; and the great assiduity and diligence with which he discharged that, and many other important trusts committed to his care, and his perseverence, in seeking the real and substantial good of his country, renders his death a public loss, which will be truly lamented by a grateful people. It is to be hoped that some abler pen will do justice to his manes; we can only say, that as in public life all his actions were directed to the good of his country, so in private his house was one continued scene of hospitality and benevolence, and his purse, his hand and heart, were ever devoted to the service and relief of the distressed. In him the advocates for American freedom have lost a real and true friend! In him this province may mourn a substantial and irretrievable loss."

On the last day of May, Robert Howe, Cornelius Harnett, and John Ashe, patriots who had not hesitated to follow where John Harvey led, wrote these words to Samuel Johnston: "We sincerely condole with all the friends of American liberty in this province on the death of our worthy friend, Colonel Harvey. We regret it as a public loss, especially at this critical juncture."[77] "He will be much missed," wrote Joseph Hewes from Philadelphia. "I wish to God he could [77] Col. Rec., IX, 1285. McRee in his "Life and Correspondence of James Iredell," I, 34, states, and the statement has been repeated, that Harvey died June 3, 1775. Perhaps for "June" we should read "May".

have been spared and that the G—r [Governor] and Judge H—d [Howard] had been called in his stead." Few the words, but sincere the tribute, from men who knew his virtues and appreciated his worth.[78]

---

[78] John Harvey was buried at Belgrade farm, on Albemarle Sound, in Perquimans County, in a granite tomb said to weigh twenty tons. The tomb was originally on a bluff, but the waves have gradually washed the bluff away until the tomb now lies about three hundred yards from the shore. It has withstood the washing of the waves and is yet in a good state of preservation. It is said that there is an inscription on it, but it is so covered with moss and barnacles that it can not be deciphered.

MILITARY ORGANIZATIONS OF NORTH CAROLINA DURING THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

BY CLYDE L. KING, A.M.

The purpose of this paper is to make a study of the military organizations of North Carolina, during the American Revolution, with the hope of finding out whether North Carolina or the Continental Congress exercised final and sovereign authority over them. We will examine, first, the various military organizations of the State and, second, the military organizations placed upon the Continental establishment, noting in each case how the troops were embodied, supported, officered, and directed. Then we will determine, if we can, whether North Carolina or the Continental Congress exercised sovereign control over them.

One of the first[1] steps taken by North Carolina toward embodying military forces for the Revolutionary War was to provide[2] (Sept. 7, 1775) for minute men and militia. For this purpose the Province was divided into six districts. Each of these districts was to raise one battalion[3] of minute men to be enlisted for six months. It seems that they were not reinlisted at the expiration of their six months term, at least no further reference is made to them after the battle of Moore's Creek.

In each of these districts, too, a brigade of militia was to be raised. "The militia of every county," so read the resolution[4] of the Provincial Congress, May 4, 1776, "is to consist of all the effective men from sixteen to sixty years of age and shall be formed into one regiment" and "the regi-

[1] On Aug. 30, 1775, two Continetal Battalions had been embodied.
[2] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 196-199.
[3] "Consisting of ten companies, of fifty men rank and file each."
[4] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 560-564.

ments divided into companies of not less than fifty rank and file." Each company was to be divided into five divisions, one division to consist of all the more aged and infirm men, the other four divisions to draw lots for the first, second, third, or fourth turns to go on service. The militia were to muster once a month at least.

From time to time other military organizations were formed. On April 9th, 1776, three companies of Light Horse were created, "consisting of one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet and thirty-three privates each.[5]" On April 29th, 1776, the Provincial Congress created[6] five Independent Companies "to consist of one captain, two lieutenants, one ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, two drummers, one fifer, and sixty-eight rank and file." Later, they created a company of rangers and embodied and equipped an artillery company. Thus we see that the legislative power of North Carolina created military organizations at will and regulated their embodiment in detail, and that they did this without reference to any other sovereign body.

How were these organizations supported, how officered, and by whom directed? All of them were paid, armed and maintained[7] by the State of North Carolina. The field officers for each and every battalion of minute men were recommended by the several districts and appointed by the Provincial Congress.[8] The field officers of each district appointed a suitable person or persons in each county to enlist minute men. These minute men, when their companies were completed, chose their captains, lieutenants and ensigns, and these appointed their respective non-commissioned officers.

The field officers of the militia were appointed by the Provincial Congress; the captains, lieutenants, and ensigns by

[5] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 506.
[6] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 546.
[7] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 570-571; XI, p. 529; X, p. 290-1.
[8] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 196-197.

committees of their respective companies.[9] The Provincial Congress named all the officers for the five Independent Companies[10] and for the Light Horse.[11] In order that this power of appointment should always rest with the State legislature or, in its recess, with the Governor, Sec. 14 of the State Constitution[12] (1776) provided "That the senate and house of commons shall have power to appoint the generals and field officers of the militia and all officers of the regular army of this State" and section 20 provided "That in every case where any officer, the right of whose appointment is by this constitution vested in the General Assembly, shall, during the recess, die, or his office by any other means become vacant, the Governor shall have power, with the advice of the Council of State, to fill up such vacancy by granting a temporary commission, which shall expire at the end of the next session of the General Assembly." The full and ultimate power, therefore, to support and officer these troops rested in the North Carolina Legislature, or, during its recess, with the Governor.

The first decided and effective use made by North Carolina of her military forces was the overthrow of the Loyalists at Widow Moore's Creek on February 27, 1776.[13] The committees of safety in the various counties, in accordance with the power[14] vested in them by the Provincial Congress, ordered out a certain part of their militia.[15] These forces were placed by the Provincial Council under proper command, and other organizations were ordered to join them, so that by the time of the battle, Colonel Caswell, who re-

[9] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 200, 204, 207.
[10] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 546.
[11] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 519.
[12] Revised Statutes of N. C., Vol. 1, p. 13.
[13] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 482.
[14] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 200 (On Sept. 8, 1775).
[15] Tryon County ordered out "every third effective."

pulsed and scattered the Loyalists, had under him[16] 800 minute men to whom he added the 250 under Lillington. Col. James Moore was near at hand with an army[17] of 1,100 men made up of the First North Carolina Continental Battalion, 150 Wilmington minute men, 200 Duplin militia and 100 volunteer independent rangers. These forces were assembled and directed by North Carolina authorities alone. Again, May 2, 1776, the Provincial Congress drafted 1,500 militia[18] for three months[19] to ward off a threatened attack, and ordered them to march as quickly as possible to Wilmington. At divers times other uses were made of the troops by local or provincial authorities, such as putting[20] down local uprisings of the loyalists and preventing them from joining Governor Martin.[21] Some of her laws, too, show that she was not expecting any other authority to make use of North Carolina troops. The act (April 29, 1776) creating the five independent companies specifically provided[22] that they should "be subject only to the control of this or any future Congress, or to any executive power, acting in the recess of the same, to remove or disband them." These companies were also given authority to take enemies' ships as prizes of war—a power assumed only by sovereign States. Thus we see that North Carolina made use of her troops for such purposes and in such ways as her sovereign will directed.

Whenever the urgent need for any one or more of these military organizations seemed to be past, the Provincial Congress disbanded them at will. On one occasion she dissolved the two Southern Independent Companies[23] and at another

[16] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 482.
[17] Moore's Hist. of N. C., pp. 203, 204.
[18] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 558.
[19] May 11, 1776, this.
[20] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 761.
[21] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 440, 536.
[22] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 546.
[23] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 92.

time certain companies of militia.[24] On December 15, 1777, she discharged[25] the militia companies that she had stationed on the coast and also those on the frontier, creating[26] in the place of the latter a special company of Rangers to warn the militia when Indian uprisings seemed imminent. The Provincial Congress and, later, the State Legislature not only assumed full control over these military organizations for itself, but, during its recess, vested its power in the Provincial Council and, under the constitution, in the Governor.

Not only did North Carolina assume sovereign control over her State troops within the State, embodying, officering, using, and disbanding them as she wished but, when outside the State, she exercised the same control over them. Jointly with Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia, she subdued the Cherokees with no interference or suggestion from the Continental Congress, save the following resolution[27] (July 30, 1776): "Information being given to Congress by a letter from the President of South Carolina, that the Cherokees have commenced hostilities against that State, and that he has ordered a body of men to march against them and has applied for assistance to the neighboring states of North Carolina and Virginia:

Resolved: That it be recommended to the states of Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia to afford all necessary assistance to the State of South Carolina and to cooperate against that state in prosecuting the war against the Indians with the utmost vigor." But at once the three North Carolina delegates then in the Continental Congress, lest the home authorities might interpret this resolution as of some force and significance, sent home this statement[28] which they

[24] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 927.
[25] State Records of N. C., XII, p. 159.
[26] State Records of N. C., XII, p. 160.
[27] Journals of Cont. Cong., V, p. 616 (Ford ed.).
[28] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 679.

all signed: "This resolve is by no means intended to alter the plan of military operations which you have begun or to draw off the Strength of our back Country to a distant part merely for the sake of acting in the same place with the South Carolinians, if the Opposition can be made as effectually in any manner devised by yourselves or from a part of your province from whence hostilities may successfully be carried into the bosom of the Cherokee country. In fact, nothing is meant but to subdue the Cherokees." The States subdued the Cherokees, and then, without any resolution on the part of the Continental Congress, appointed joint commissioners and signed a treaty[29] of peace with the Indians. Later in the same year (November, 1776), North Carolina granted to South Carolina, which was then in sore need of troops, permission to raise troops in North Carolina territory. At the same time she embodied two regiments and sent them to the aid of South Carolina,[30] maintaining the while full control of them.[31]

We may conclude from these facts that North Carolina assumed the same sovereign control over her troops when without the state or in joint action with other states, as when within the state, a thing impossible had she considered herself and the other states subject to a common sovereign power.

Since North Carolina embodied, supported, officered and directed her troops, maintaining full and final authority over them, whether serving within or without the State; and since the Continental Congress in no sense even assumed power over these troops, and since North Carolina in her

[29] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, pp. 650, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661-9, 889, 895, 912.

[30] State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 103.

[31] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 929.

[32] There were also many objections made by North Carolina to the raising of troops on her territory by other States, e. g., see N. C. R., XI, p. 663.

military regulations never suggested that the Continental Congress had power to control them, we must conclude that so far as her State troops were concerned North Carolina was a sovereign and independent State.

But there remains for consideration another military organization embodied in North Carolina, the Continental Battalions. These Continental Battalions were supported by money advanced by the Continental Congress to Treasurers appointed by the North Carolina Legislature, to which they reported, and to which they looked for orders and directions.[32] The Battalion officers proper were all appointed by the North Carolina legislature. Those officers having charge over one or more battalions[33] were appointed by the Continental Congress upon the nomination of the North Carolina Legislature. These troops, therefore, if any, should be under Continental control.

Let us follow in some detail the embodiment of these troops, to find out by whom they were embodied, and if by North Carolina upon the order of the Continental Congress, whether the State acted in a spirit of obedience or in one of prudent acquiescence.

On June 26, 1775, the Continental Congress resolved "That in case the Assembly of Convention of that Colony shall think it absolutely necessary for the support of the American Association and safety of the Colony to raise a body of forces not exceeding 1,000 men this Congress will consider them as an American army and provide for their pay."[34] The Provincial Assembly of North Carolina embodied these troops, appointed their officers (September 1, 1775), divided them into two regiments of five hundred men each, subdivided these into divisions, and stationed these di-[32] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. IX, pp. 482 and 521.

[33] Journals of Cong., Vol. IV, p. 174.
[34] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 40.

visions where they were most needed in North Carolina. In the same act the legislature provided that "The said two regiments, and every of the above divisions, shall from time to time be disposed of as this Congress or the Council of Safety shall direct."[35]

The Assembly of North Carolina, one week afterawrds,[36] declared that these troops should "be kept in pay three months, unless the Provincial Council shall judge it necessary to continue them longer; and the said Council are empowered to disband them at any time before or after the term of three months, when they shall judge that their service is unnecessary."[37] But on November 28th following, the Continental Congress put these two Battalions on pay for one year.[38] North Carolina made no change in the terms of her enlistment and embodied her troops on her own plan. The same overriding of Continental regulations occurred the next year. The North Carolina Legislature had declared (April 27, 1776) that the Continental troops should be enlisted for the term of two years and six months.[39] On September 24, 1776, the Continental Congress resolved that these troops should be enlisted for the "continuance of the war."[40] But to this resolution North Carolina paid no heed. This was not obedience nor was it acquiescence, but rather the natural neglect, it would seem, of a sovereign body to take care that its acts should coincide with the requests and recommendations of a Central Committee.

Eight more battalions were finally put upon the Continental Establishment. The embodiment of the Third to the Sixth of these Battalions may throw additional light upon the attitude of the North Carolina Congress to the Conti-

[35] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 187.
[36] September 8, 1775.
[37] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 203.
[38] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 338.
[39] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 544.
[40] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 807.

nental Congress. On January 16th, 1776, the Continental Congress resolved that another Battalion should be raised in the Colony of North Carolina.[41] Acting upon this resolution, the Provincial Congress of North Carolina created, April 9, 1776, not one Battalion, but three and these of 750 privates each, and in addition three companies of Light Horse.[42] The next day the members of the Provincial Congress bethought themselves of the Continental regulations that, including officers, each regiment should consist of 728 men. Nothing daunted, however, they created a fourth Battalion out of the extra officers and privates, and the President of the Assembly cheerfully wrote to the Continental Delegates at Philadelphia: "It is hoped that you will find no difficulty in getting them placed on the Continental Establishment when it is considered that the Colonies of Virginia and South Carolina are in daily expectation of being invaded and that we have therefore very little reason to hope for succour or assistance from either of them."[43] There is in this a spirit of independence that can scarce be reconciled with obedience to sovereign power.

When these Continental forces were needed for military purposes, by what power were they summoned, and, when in operation, by what power were they directed? On October 21, 1775, the Provincial Congress which had already stationed the two Continental Battalions along the coast, ordered them to "oppose to the utmost of their power" the landing of any hostile troops.[44] We have already seen that North Carolina used the First Continental Battalion at Widow Moore's Creek. Other similar uses were made of them. When within the State, then, North Carolina assumed full control of these troops.

---

41 Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 413.
42 Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 506.
43 Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 495.
44 Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 186.

But what of their control when without the State? On September 3d, 1776, the Continental Congress resolved that "Two of the Continental Battalions be ordered to march with all possible expedition under command of General Moore to reenforce the army at New York." By whom they were to be ordered the resolution did not state but that the execution of the resolution at least was to be left to North Carolina is shown by the following resolution[45] of the Continental Congress (September 16, 1776): "It being represented by the delegates of North Carolina, that, from late accounts, it appears that the situation of affairs in that State is such, that it will be dangerous, if not impracticable, to execute the resolution of Congress of the third instant * * * Resolved that it be left to the discretion of the Council of Safety of North Carolina, to execute or suspend that resolution according as they shall think most conducive to the public service and the safety of their particular State."[46]

On November 16th, 1776, the Continental Congress passed the following resolution:[47] "Resolved that it be recommended to the Convention of North Carolina to station General Moore with the regular troops under his command in such parts of that state or of the state of South Carolina where they will be in capacity to render immediate and seasonable assistance to their friends in South Carolina." The North Carolina Assembly evidently did not consider this as a command of a superior authority directing its own troops, for on November 29th, 1776, following, it put this order into execution in the following words:[48] "In consequence of In-

[45] Journals of Cont. Cong., Vol. V, p. 761 (Ford ed.).

[46] It is very significant to note that the following clause was stricken out: "Provided, nevertheless, that they shall not have power to stop Brigadier-General Moore from repairing to New York." Is this a tacit confession that North Carolina did have full control even over a Brigadier-General? Does it mean that she could have held the troops and not the officer?

[47] Journals of Cong., Vol. VI, p. 956 (Ford ed.).

[48] Col. Records of N. C., Vol. X, p. 947.

formation from the Continental Congress that a considerable number of Troops and a large Fleet had sailed from New York, and are supposed to be intended against Charlestown, South Carolina, Resolved, That General Moore do immediately march with the troops under his command to the Relief of Charlestown without delay." General Moore led his troops as directed and while in South Carolina looked to the North Carolina authorities for direction.[49] That the execution of the orders of the Continental Congress was left wholly to North Carolina we can no longer doubt, and it only remains for us to find out whether or not the State considered herself under obligations to execute implicitly Continental orders.

In the early part of 1777[50] the Continental Congress resolved that all the battalions of Continental troops in North Carolina should join General Washington "as soon as may be" after March 15th.[51] Governor Caswell on February 6th requested General Moore to order three complete regiments to march without delay and join General Washington.[52] General Moore encountered constant delays always reporting to Governor Caswell, never to the Continental Congress, for aid[53] and orders.[54] In time all of the nine Battalions by order of North Carolina authorities reached General Washington. But North Carolina followed her own dictates, ordering them to depart when she wished and in the way she wished.[55] This may have been acquiescence, but certainly it was not obedience.

Even after these Continental Battalions were in Washington's camp they continued to look to the North Carolina

---

49 State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 367.
50 February 5, 1777.
51 State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 374.
52 State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 375.
53 State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 411.
54 State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 412.
55 State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, pp. 579, 614; Vol. XII, p. 131. Follow particularly the new Tenth Battalion.

authorities as the authorities to whom alone their obedience, outside of their immediate field operations, was due. In the first place North Carolina recruited the ranks[56] and punished the deserters. To aid in this, the North Carolina Legislature called upon General Nash or the Commanding officer of the Continental troops to report to the Assembly lists of the different battalions, divisions, companies, parts of companies and names of deserters.[57] It ordered Continental Battalion officers to recruit in North Carolina or to repair to the North as it saw fit.[58] It even abolished superfluous Continental offices although the officers were then under General Washington.[59] That there was need of effective recruiting we may learn from the fact that the nine Continental Battalions, instead of having 6,552 men and officers had 1,385 of whom there were only 655 privates fit for duty.[60] Yet the Continental Congress gave no orders. Her anguish and feeling of helplessness were no doubt reflected in these words written home by the North Carolina delegate, Corn. Harnett: "For God's sake fill up your Battalions, Lay Taxes, put a stop to the sordid and avaricious spirit which infects all ranks and conditions of men."[61]

Not only did the North Carolina Legislature assume full control over these Continental troops while within and without the State, but on May 9th, 1777, vested the Governor, during its recess, with power[62] at his discretion to appoint "officers to fill up all such vacancies as may happen in the Continental armies," and to remove,[63] suspend and censure [56] State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, pp. 578-9, 456-7; XII, pp. 9, 10, 59, 60.

[57] State Records of N. C., Vol. XII, p. 33.
[58] State Records of N. C., Vol. XII, pp. 59 and 60.
[59] State Records of N. C., Vol. XII, pp. 48 and 50.
[60] State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 690.
[61] State Records of N. C., Vol. XI, p. 696; Dec. 16, 1777.
[62] State Records of N. C., Vol. XII, p. 99.
[63] State Records of N. C., Vol. XII, p. 93.

any Continental officer that may behave unworthily. It particularly required him from time to time to give such directions respecting the securing and disposal of deserters as he might judge necessary, and further gave him power "To give such orders as he may think necessary for the removal, marching or disposition of the Continental Troops in this state or any of them."[64]

North Carolina, then, embdoied at will such state military organizations as she pleased and directed all of them as she thought best, exercising full and sovereign control over them. She embodied in her own way ten Continental battalions which were paid by the Continental Congress through North Carolina treasurer. The Continental Congress recommended by resolution certain military operations for these troops. The execution of these resolutions was left wholly to the State of North Carolina which maintained and exercised full control of the troops, both within and without the State, even to the extent of punishing deserters though they were under the immediate command of General Washington. The Continental Congress in no place asserted definitely that she had sovereign authority over them while North Carolina not only asserted such authority but exercised it. We must conclude, then, that so far as control over her military organizations was concerned, North Carolina was a sovereign and independent State and that Thomas Burke expressed the common attitude of the people of North Carolina toward the Continental Congress, when he said to the General Assembly: "I consider the Congress at present as a general council of America instituted for the purpose of opposing the usurpations of Britain."

---

[64] State Records of N. C., Vol. XII, p. 99.

A SERMON

BY

REV. GEORGE MICKLEJOHN

PREACHED BEFORE

GOVERNOR TRYON'S ARMY AT HILLSBOROUGH

SEPTEMBER 25, 1768

Edited for THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET

BY

R. W. D. CONNOR

Secretary North Carolina Historical Commission

On the important Duty of SUBJECTION to the CIVIL POWERS.

A

SERMON

Preached before his EXCELLENCY

WILLIAM TRYON, Esquire,
GOVERNOR and Commander in Chief of the Province of NORTH-CAROLINA,

AND THE

TROOPS raised to quell the late

INSURRECTION,

AT

HILLSBOROUGH, in ORANGE County,
On SUNDAY September 25, 1768.

By GEO. MICKLEJOHN, S. T. D.

NEWBERN:
Printed by JAMES DAVIS,

M,DCC,LXVIII.

DEDICATION.

To

HIS EXCELLENCY

WILLIAM TRYON, Esquire,

Governor and Commander in Chief of the Province of NORTH-CAROLINA.

SIR,

THE Kind Approbation with which YOU have favoured this DISCOURSE, is as much an Honour as it is a Satisfaction to me; for which I desire Your Excellency to accept my grateful Acknowledgments: And as You, with many other Honourable Gentlemen, have, in so particularly obliging a Manner, signified Your Desire of seeing it published, I have complied with Your Request; which, indeed, I must own, You put it out of my Power to refuse. I heartily pray GOD it may be attended with those beneficial Effects, which You seem to entertain so much Hopes of: And if it should be instrumental in bringing any to a just Sense of the great DUTY inculcated therein, and a religious Observance of it for the future, My Pleasure would be greatly heightened, by the Happiness I am sensible You will receive Yourself. With My earnest Wishes for Your Excellency's present Felicity, as well as Eternal Wellfare, which it will always be a peculiar Joy to Me to promote,

I remain, SIR,

Your EXCELLENCY'S

Ever faithful and obliged

Humble Servant,

GEO. MICKLEJOHN.

A SERMON, &C.[1]

ST. PAUL'S Epistle to the ROMANS, Chap. XIII. Verses 1st & 2d.

Let every Soul be subject unto the higher Powers; for there is no Power but of God; the Powers that be, are ordained of God.

Whosoever therefore resisteth the Power, resisteth the Ordinance of God; and they that resist, shall receive to themselves Damnation.

I AM persuaded, that every one who feels the least regard for the wellfare and happiness of his country; and the peace and comfort of his fellow-subjects and countrymen, will look upon the subject as highly proper, and seasonable at this time.

FOR who can reflect upon so many wretched and unthinking men, thus madly attempting to subvert the laws of the kingdom; thus inconsiderately involving friends, relations and neighbours, in the most direful calamity, and foolishly

[1] Extracts from the Journal of the General Assembly of North Carolina:

Friday, November 18, 1768:

Recd from his Excellency a Written Message by Mr. Edwards relative to, and accompanied with one hundred copies of a sermon preached by the Reverend Mr. Micklejohn before the Troops at Hillsborough, which Message is as follows, (that is to say)

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the House of Assembly,

By the particular request of the Reverend Mr. Micklejohn, I desire leave in his behalf to present your House with one hundred copies of a sermon preached before the Troops at Hillsborough. The merit and beneficial tendency of this admirable discourse, gave general satisfaction to all who heard it delivered; a testimony it will undoubtedly receive from every one who reads with attention. WM. TRYON.

* * * * * * * *

bringing upon themselves destruction here, and damnation hereafter;—who can look upon so deplorable a scene, without feeling the most earnest desires, that every such rash and misguided person could be made duly sensible of the dreadful impiety of so daring and wicked an action, as well as of the certain misery that must inevitably be the consequence?

IT is possible this alarming consideration may prevail with some persons, when every other more laudable motive fails of its proper influence; and, it is to be hoped, that a sight of their danger may bring them to a sense of their duty.

Saturday, December 3d, 1768:

Recd from the Council the following Message Vizt

Mr. Speaker and Gentlemen of the Assembly,

* * * * * * * *

We must also recommend to your consideration the Reverend Mr. Micklejohn who preached to the Troops at Hillsborough printed and dispersed several copies of one of the sermons on the the important occasion.

3d December 1768. In the upper House.

* * * * * * * *

Resolved the following Message be sent to the Council, Vizt,

Gentlemen of His Majestys Honble Council.

* * * We do agree that the Treasurers pay the expence of printing those sermons preached by the Reverend George Micklejohn sent to this House by his Excellency this session.

3d December 1768. JOHN HARVEY Sp.

* * * * * * * *

Monday December 5th 1768.

Resolved the following Message be sent to His Excellency the Governor, Vizt,

To His Excellency William Tryon, Esquire, Captain, General Governor, &Ca,

SIR,—This House have received your Excellency's Message relative to the Reverend George Micklejohn, with one hundred copies of a Sermon preached by him at Hillsborough, and in his behalf presented by your Excellency to the House, in consequence of which we have Resolved that the Expence of printing the said Sermon be paid by the Public. * * *

5th December 1768. JOHN HARVEY Sp.

(Colonial Records of North Carolina, VII—939, 976, 983.)

WITH this view, I have singled out the words of the text for the subject of our present meditation: And though I have the pleasure to think I am speaking before those who stand not in need of [2] the admonition they contain, yet I thought it not improper for us to consider the several arguments which enforce this great duty here enjoined; that we may not only be preserv'd stedfast in our obedience to it ourselves, but may be able to convince others of the danger, as well as error of their ways; and keep them, for the future, in the paths of duty and allegiance, from which they have lately so unhappily wandered.

YOU cannot but observe then, in the first place, that this important duty of subjection to lawful authority, is one plain and principal doctrine of Christianity. It is here delivered to the world by an inspired Apostle of CHRIST; by Him, whom our LORD, in a vision to Ananias, honours with the distinguishing title of "a chosen vessel to Himself." He it is, who, thus commissioned from above, gives us, in the name of the most high GOD, this solemn command in the words of the text; to which we are, all of us, both high and low, rich and poor, wise and ignorant, indispensably obliged to pay the highest reverence and regard; and no rank nor station in life, can possibly exempt any one from the strictest obedience to it: For it is directed to all men in general, without any exception—Let every soul be subject to the higher powers—and it comes to us by the Authority of the same GOD and SAVIOUR, who has given us every other precept that we meet with in holy scripture:—It comes to us from that sovereign LORD OF ALL LORDS, whose name we have the honor to bear; whose subjects we profess ourselves at present; and whose eternal kingdom we hope to become inheritors of hereafter: 'Till men, therefore, have renounced CHRIST, and apostatized from his religon—'till they have disowned his sovereignty and dominion over them, and given up all expectations of future happiness from his favour, they must acknowledge themselves bound, by the strongest ties, both of interest and gratitude, to comply with this sacred injunction, no less than with every other command of his Divine Gospel.

BUT we may still further judge of the singular importance of this duty enjoined us in the text, from that remarkable stress laid upon [3] it by the great Apostle in several other of his Epistles. When he is delivering his apostolical injunctions to Titus, and instructing him in the several branches of his duty as a minister of Christ, he gives it him in charge, in a very solemn manner, to put men in mind, to be subject to principalities and powers; to obey Magistrates; to speak evil of no man; to be no brawlers, but gentle; shewing all meekness to all men. These things, says he, I will that thou affirm constantly, that they which have believed in God, that is, they who have acknowledged the truth of that revelation[2] he has made us in the Gospel, might be careful to maintain good works: These things are good and profitable unto men.

AND in the first Epistle to Timothy, he carries this request and reverence for the powers that are lawfully set over us, to a still greater height; making it our duty, not only to be subject unto them, but to implore the favour of Heaven upon them, and the divine blessing on their endeavours for the public happiness and tranquility. I exhort first of all, says the Apostle, that Supplications, Prayers, Intercessions, and giving of Thanks, be made for all Men: For Kings, and for all that are in Authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty: for this is good, and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour.

JUDGE therefore in yourselves, my beloved brethren, and beseech others, in the name of God, to consider how dreadful a breach of this duty they must be guilty of, who, instead of praying for the safety of our governors and protectors, presume to threaten their sacred persons with violence, to whom God has commanded us to pay the highest veneration, because they derive their authority from him.

[2] In the text, revalation.

AND this leads me to a second very material argument, arising from the words of the text, which strongly enforces this duty, and to which it becomes every one seriously to attend: For surely nothing should more fully convince us of our obligation to pay the most ready obedience to this precept of Christianity, than the solemn reason which the Apostle has immediately subjoined: Let every soul [4] be subject to the higher[3] powers; for there is no power but of God: the powers that be, are ordained of God.

HAD this precept been delivered to mankind without pointing out to them at the same time, this particularly awful sanction; yet even then our observance of it would have remained indispensable: For when God commands, man is to obey.

THAT God, from whom we have received life and breath, and all things, and to whom we are indebted for every comfort and blessing we enjoy—that God, upon whom alone we are to depend to all eternity, and by whom our unalterable fate is to be finally determined;—this great and adorable BEING has an uncontroulable right over his dependent creatures, to lay upon them whatever commands his wisdom sees proper for them, without being obliged to satisfy them of the reasons for such his sovereign will and pleasure. But in the case before us, you cannot but take notice, in how very different a manner God has been pleased to deal with us; for while he gives us this command by his holy Apostle, he graciously condescends to inform us of those weighty reasons upon which the duty is founded, and which would be most likely to engage us in a religious observance of it.

[3] In the text, higer.

WE are commanded, therefore, to be subject to the higher powers, because the authority they are invested with is from HEAVEN: The powers that be, are ordained of God!— They are God's vicegerents upon earth, and instruments in the hand of his providence, for carrying on the grand purposes of protection and government, and for securing the peace and happiness of mankind.

AND though, indeed, they are sometimes unhappily obliged, through the perverseness and wickedness that is in the world, to become unwilling avengers, to execute wrath upon every one that doth evil; yet are they, in general, the ministers of God to us, for good, and for the praise and reward of them that do well.

WAS it not for this necessary power which has been committed to them by the ALMIGHTY, every thing must soon be involved in the most dreadful anarchy and confusion. Every man's own will [5] would then be his law; and no language can fully describe those various scenes of misery and horror which would continually arise before us, from the discordant passions and divided interests of mankind. But God, in his infinite goodness, has provided a natural security against all these mischiefs in those different ranks and orders of men, which his wisdom has thought proper should subsist in the world; and in which some are allotted to govern, and others obliged to obey, that so the happiness of the whole community might the more effectually be preserved. And upon these guardians of the public and general wellfare, God has been pleased to confer a divine authority, to render their persons, as well as ordinances, the more sacred and venerable.

IT is by him, therefore, that kings reign, and princes decree justice; by him princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth: And as it is very beautifully expressed in the book of Wisdom, power is given them of the LORD, and sovereignty from the Highest: To the truth of this important point, we have a greater than Solomon bearing testimony; even our blessed Saviour himself; who, when Pilate was boasting of that power he had over him, either to crucify or to release him, puts him in mind from whence he had received his authority; and gives him this mild and instructive answer, Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above.

HERE we learn from the mouth of our Redeemer himself, whence is derived that dignity and sacredness, which belongs to those who are invested with any public power and office.—Here we behold the God of the universe submitting to that supreme authority he himself has conferred upon man; and acknowledging the reverence due to that very power, which was shortly to pronounce the sentence of death against him.

BUT we have a still more striking and remarkable instance of submission and respect to the Civil Powers, which our blessed Lord, upon another occasion, condescended to shew, and which highly deserves every one's serious attention and regard: It is recorded by the [6] Evangelist St. Matthew, in the 17th chapter of his Gospel, that when our Lord was come to Capernaum, they who received the tribute money, which was required of every Jew above the age of twenty, demanded of St. Peter, whether his Master intended to pay it. St. Peter very readily engages for his Lord's willing and chearful compliance; as he well knew how exact had ever been his observance of every civil, as well as religious duty: But when he came into the house to inform his master of this demand, our blessed Saviour, by an easy similitude, leads him to understand, that he had been too hasty in his promises for him; for surely, if the children of earthly princes could plead a freedom from paying any custom or tribute, (as appeared by his own reply to the question our Lord had proposed) much more reasonably might he be exempted from it, who was himself the Lord of all things, and the Son of that heavenly King, for the service of whose temple this particular tribute was paid.—But notwithstanding our Lord might have justly claimed this privilege and exemption; yet, you see, he willingly declines it; and, Least we should offend them, says he, to the Apostle, go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shall find a piece of money; that take, and give unto them for me and for thee.—What condescension was this in the Son of God!—Who but must be struck with admiration at this amazing instance of goodness, in thus vouchsafing to work a miracle, rather than not satisfy the demands of public authority; lest, by refusing compliance himself, he might countenance others in disobedience and rebellion! And who is there that will presume to offer insult to the powers that are in authority, or shew the least resistance, when he considers how remarkably our Lord was pleased to honour them, by expressing the most cautious fear of displeasing them, and thus wonderfully providing against giving any offence?—In order, therefore, to guard men from incurring the guilt of so heinous a crime, let us, in the third place, briefly consider the dreadful consequences that must attend it.—This the Apostle gives us, in these few, but awful words, They that[7] resist, shall receive to themselves DAMNATION; not only condemnation in this world, but eternal vengeance in the life to come.—And here again, we cannot but observe, the great importance of this duty of subjection, from that tender care which the goodness of GOD has taken to secure our obedience to it. Some precepts are delivered to us without any particular intimation of the punishment attending our neglect: But this was a matter of so much consequence to the general comfort and happiness of the world, that the divine wisdom thought it necessary for us, while we read the sacred injunction, to have before our eyes that future misery which must follow the violation of it: So that, if the love of God, and reverence for his commands, should fail to produce this becoming submission, a regard for our own Everlasting Interest might possibly prevail.

GOD has, therefore, been pleased, by his holy Apostle, to pronounce the sentence of inevitable perdition upon all those who refuse subjection to lawful power and authority; as hereby, they not only shew the highest contempt of his positive command, but do all in their power to obstruct the gracious designs[4] of his providence, for the good and welfare of mankind. So that, upon calm consideration, every one must acknowledge, there cannot possibly be offered a greater insult to Almighty GOD, than thus contemptuously to disregard his will, and despise those sacred powers whom he has ordained and appointed to carry on the best and noblest purposes in the world: And what wonder then is it that so terrible a portion is reserved in store for every such bold and presumptuous offender?—God is represented in scriptures as the God of Peace, and Lover of Concord; and we are, for this reason, commanded, in another place, to follow peace with all men; because, without this, no man shall see the LORD. Every one, therefore shall hereafter be banished from his presence and glory who dares to disturb, in the least degree, that peace and harmony; or endeavours, in any respect, to destroy that good order and government, which it is the intention of HEAVEN should be supported in the world.

---

[4] In the text, desings.

[8] BUT though we were not able to assign any particular reason for this severe judgment mentioned in the text, yet ought it to be a sufficient warning to every rebellious sinner, to find how positively it is there denounced: For what God has so solemnly threatened, he will most assuredly inflict.

THESE then are the principal reasons which enforce the duty enjoined by the Apostle; but there are several others, which, if duly attended to, cannot but add considerable weight to the arguments already offered, and which I shall, therefore, beg leave briefly to mention.

LET it be considered then, that resistance to that lawful power and authority which God hath set over us, can never possibly be productive of any thing but the wildest uproar, and most universal confusion; and, in the end, can never fail of being attended with the most shocking and dismal effects.

OF this we would have seen a dreadful and melancholy proof; and God only knows what worse consequences might have ensued, had they not been happily prevented by the good conduct of those brave men, who distinguished themselves as remarkably by their HUMANITY, as by the VALOUR, they shewed on that trying occasion.

TO their courage and intrepidity will ever be due our warmest gratitude and thanks; which, blessed be God, gave so timely a check to the desperate fury of those rash men who were engaged in that execrable attempt; and to their humanity these very men must ever acknowledge themselves obliged, which bore so long and patiently their repeated and exasperating insults, and treated them afterwards with greater lenity than they could reasonably expect; for where one has not fallen, twenty ought to have suffered.

LET every one learn, that outrage and violence can never answer any other end but to spread slaughter and desolation around us; and to introduce the most wretched scenes of misery and distress: Let them consider further, how impossible it is that any good can ever be brought about by such wicked means; and that tho[ugh] some [9] may only meet the ruin their rashness has sought, yet many others must unavoidably become partakers in the calamity, who were never partners in the crime.

THE consideration therefore of the present misfortunes, in which many of their fellow-creatures must be involved, as well as the future destruction to which others are exposed by such daring acts of rebellion, will naturally restrain every man from uniting in them who has the least spark of humanity and compassion remaining in his breast.

ANOTHER motive which cannot but have great weight with every generous mind, is the reflection that every the least Insult offered to magistrates and governors, is an act of the basest ingratitude against those who are, under God, our protectors and guardians, not only from foreign Enemies, but from every domestic foe: To them we owe our security from all that numerous train of mischiefs to which we should be daily liable, from the corruption and wickedness of the world, if under no restraint from human laws, and unawed by proper authority!—To them are we indebted for the safe and comfortable enjoyment of all the blessings of private life, and all the advantages we derive from civil society!—Were there not some who would take upon them the arduous business of public government, the execution of laws, and administration of justice, how would vice and iniquity every where triumph! And what must become of the welfare and tranquility of every individual, were men left at full liberty to plan their malicious schemes against them, and knew they could safely execute them whenever they pleased? What must become of the general peace and happiness of the whole community, when fraud and injustice, oppression and violence, with every other crime that is injurious to society, might be perpetrated with impunity, and without controul? How infinitely then are we obliged to those persons who willingly undertake so important a trust, and by whose care, abilities and vigilance, these evils are prevented, and the public felicity preserved? And how very[10] enormous and shocking is the offence, when in the discharge of their laborious office, they are treated with insolence instead of honour, and meet with threatenings instead of thanks!

BUT lastly, there is one remark I have further to make, and which ought to have a peculiar force with the people of this land, in leading them chearfully to that subjection which is represented in the text, as the common duty of all men.—I would beg leave to observe therefore, that for an Englishman to oppose the laws of his country, is an instance of the highest folly and contradiction we can conceive: For such is the singular excellence of our happy constitution, that the laws to which our obedience is required, are, in reality, no other than what we ourselves have been partly concerned in making.

ALL men must know, that it is impossible for a whole province to meet together for this important work; and every one, I believe, will acknowledge, that were they so assembled, very few would be found capable of carrying it on: For as the wise son of Sirac very justly observes, How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough, and that glorieth in the goad; that driveth oxen, and is occupied in their labours; and whose talk is of bullocks? They shall not be sought for in the public council; nor sit high in the congregation; they cannot sit in the judges seat, nor understand the sentence of judgment: Since therefore, we cannot all be present in this great assembly, wherein the weighty business of public government is transacted, we have this peculiar privilege, and a glorious one it is, of appointing such persons, in whose abilities, understanding, and integrity, we think we may safely confide, to appear for us, in that august assembly; and who are, upon that account, very properly stiled our representatives.

IN consequence then of this choice, which we have the liberty to make, and that full power we voluntarily give into their hands; we not only yield our consent before-hand, to whatever laws they may judge it expedient to enact, but may be justly said to have had [11] a principal share in enacting them ourselves; inasmuch as they are framed by their wisdom, and established by their authority, whom we have appointed for that very purpose.

SO that every man, of the most common understanding, if he will allow himself a moment's reflection, may easily see how particularly it is the duty of every one of us, to submit to the laws of his land; and, how astonishing an absurdity it must appear to all the world, if ever we refuse that becoming subjection.

HOW happy would millions think themselves at this hour, who know no other law than the imperious will of some arbitrary prince, could they change situations with us, and taste the singular blessing we enjoy, in being govern'd by the laws we ourselves have made! Let us take care, we set a due value upon this inestimable privilege; lest, if we slight these distinguishing marks of God's favour, and disturb that excellent form of government which his providence has so long preserved among us,—He may be provoked to deprive us of it, and bring upon us the misery which such ingratitude would deserve.

I SHALL now briefly sum up what has been said in this discourse, that we may see how many, and powerful, are the arguments we are furnished with, to engage us in a stedfast observance of this duty, and enable us to convince others of their indispensable obligations to practice it.

YOU find, then, it is a duty which is guarded from violation by all the most sacred and awful sanctions that could possibly be thought of; and bound upon us, by every tie, civil, moral, and divine.—The peace and tranquility of our fellow-subjects and countrymen demand our obedience to it. —The well-being and happiness of society in general, and the comfort and felicity of our dear relations, friends and neighbours in particular, depend upon it; and without our conscientious performance of it, an universal scene of confusion must soon prevail, and all be involved together in the deepest calamity and horror.

[12] LET all such persons therefore who dare to think of engaging in any act of rebellion and disobedience, be intreated to contemplate a little those various and horrible miseries they will unavoidably occasion, and that may possibly deter them from it:—Let them listen to the cries of the disconsolate[5] widow;—behold the tears of the helpless orphan; and consider, how they will be able to endure the sad upbraidings of those miserable mourners, who may justly take up against them the lamentation of the prophet Jeremiah: Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which your rashness and iniquity have brought upon us!

BUT particularly let them remember, that the blood which may be shed by their means, will hereafter be required at their hands; and that every one of those unhappy souls who shall be brought to an untimely end through their evil counsels and wicked instigations, and sent into another world with all their sins about them, will rise up in judgment against them at the last day, and call for tenfold vengeance on their devoted heads.

[5] In the text, disconlate.

LET them be farther put in mind, that gratitude to those who afford us a peaceful security from every ill, should engage us in a steady adherence to this duty, at all times and upon every occasion: Should lead us to return obedience for protection, and repay the kind exertion of their abilities and endeavours for the public happiness, with the easy tribute of reverence and affection.

BUT some men may have neither humanity nor generosity enough in their tempers, to be affected by such considerations as these. To them therefore we must open the sacred page, (which, perhaps, they have never before looked into) and point out the solemn and positive command of God enforcing this great duty; and tho[ugh] they may not regard an earthly potentate, yet surely they will stand in awe of the MAJESTY of HEAVEN: Or, as holy Job emphatically puts the question: Shall not HIS EXCELLENCY make them afraid? and shall not His DREAD fall upon them?— Shew them, moreover, [13] the foundation upon which the reasonableness of this duty is supported: Tell them, that obedience to the civil powers is required of us, not only because God has commanded it, but given us also this very solemn reason, enforcing that command;—that they were instituted and ordained by Himself. When they read therefore, that there is no power but of God, beseech them seriously to consider how detestable they must render themselves in His sight, who, instead of submitting[6] to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, (as we are taught by another Apostle, is our bounden duty) dare to rise up themselves, and compel others to unite with them, in opposition to any law that has been legally established; or to obstruct the ministers of justice in the execution of that high office they are obliged by oath to discharge, and which has been derived to them from the authority of the Almighty himself.

[6] In the text, summitting.

NOTHING, one would think, could so effectually strengthen our obligation to the duty of subjection, as this single consideration, that whosoever resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and that every such wicked and desperate attempt is not only treason against an earthly sovereign, but rebellion against the most high God.

AS a farther motive to this duty, and because example is more prevailing than precept, bid them turn their eyes upon the meek and blessed Jesus, and behold him in that gracious and condescending act of submission, I mentioned in the former part of this discourse.—Ask them, if they are not sensible, that He who could feed five thousand men with a few loaves and fishes, could have supported millions with the same ease, to have protected him from the resentment of the civil powers, if he had thought fit to have made the least opposition? But instead of shewing resistance, we behold Him here manifesting the most tender concern and regard for the support of their authority; and by that miraculous method he took to pay obedience to it, convincing mankind of the necessity and importance of this great duty.

SHALL man then presume to refuse that submission which God himself has thus condescended to pay? This amiable pattern we [14] have before us in the person of our great Redeemer, ought to have an irresistable influence upon all who call themselves by his name; and was, no doubt, intended for our imitation by that gracious Being, who came from HEAVEN with this peculiar design, to leave us an example that we might follow his steps.

FINALLY, whereas the more various and powerful the motives are, which enforce any duty, so much more aggravated will be the crime which leads us to break through them: Oh! beseech them therefore, in the pathetic words of St. Peter, to repent of this their wickedness; and pray God, if perhaps the thought of their heart may be forgiven them. This repentence and contrition, if accompanied with future obedience, may not only procure them pardon at an earthly tribunal, but when they come to stand before the judgment seat of CHRIST, will be one means of their obtaining mercy from the Lord in that day, and escaping the vengeance which will otherwise fall upon them. And this leads me to the last motive we have, to enforce their observance of this Christian duty enjoined in the text; the consideration of that eternal misery denounced against those who neglect it.

IF men have no love for their country; if they have no regard for the peace and happiness of those around them; if they have neither humanity nor compassion; neither gratitude nor generosity in their breasts; if they have no veneration for their king, nor reverence for the best constitution in the world; yet they must have some affection for themselves: And though they may despise the commands of GOD, and the example of a SAVIOUR, yet they cannot disregard their own everlasting wellfare. This motive then may possibly bring them to repentance, and a better mind, when every other has failed of its influence; and let us not omit incessantly, and importunately, to urge it upon them.

WARN them of the certain perdition they must inevitably bring upon themselves; and exhort them to consider in time, how fearful a thing it is to fall into the hands of the LIVING GOD! Tell them our God is a consuming fire to such workers of iniquity, and able [15] to destroy both body and soul for ever; and bid them therefore remember, that though they may escape from the sword of justice in this life, they cannot escape the DAMNATION OF HELL.

MAY the good grace of God preserve us at all times from falling into the like crime, that we may never incur so dreadful a condemnation. And as we of this land are peculiarly blessed at this time with one of the most amiable and excellent Governors that ever adorned a province, who has given us his promise, that the felicity of his people shall ever be his principal care; let it be our perpetual study and delight, by every means in our power, and particularly by all dutfiul submission to him, and those whom he shall set over us, to render his government as peaceful and happy to our affectionate SOVEREIGN, as he will endeavour to make it to us his grateful subjects.

SO shall we secure the blessings of Heaven on ourselves and our posterity; and whenever we are removed out of this troublesome world, shall become members of that blessed kingdom, where universal peace and love, and uninterrupted concord and harmony, will reign for ever and ever. Amen.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

R. D. W. CONNOR.

Robert Diggs Wimberly Connor, the author of the sketch of John Harvey, which appears in this number of the BOOKLET, is fast coming to the front, among that class of writers trained to the work of investigation and is now devoting himself largely to historical research. As Secretary of the North Carolina Historical Commission he is discharging his official duties with credit to himself and honor to the State. A biographical sketch of him may be found in the BOOKLET, January, 1907.

CLYDE L. KING.

Clyde L. King, born May 1, 1879, at Burlington, Kansas, is the son of Peter and Sarah (Taliaferro) King; graduated from Kansas State Normal, Emporia, Kansas, 1904; Michigan University, 1907, A.B.; 1908, A.M.

He had a teaching experience three years before entering Kansas Normal Schools, Mound City, Kansas, then resigned in order to enter Michigan University in the fall of 1905. In the summers of 1905 and 1906 he was Instructor in the Teachers' Institutes in different counties in Kansas. During the summer of 1907 he served as Instructor in the Department of American History in Kansas Normal College at Emporia (a college course having been added since 1906 to this institution). He was elected as Fellow in American History, 1907-'08, in Michigan University and was called upon to act as "quizmaster" in one of the American History courses.

Mr. King is a member of the Kansas State Historical Association and the American Historical Association. He belongs to the University societies, but is more interested in the "Acolytes", a Philosophers' Club of the University, and he prizes his membership in this club more than any other.

In 1907 Mr. King was elected Assistant in the Department of American History and Government in the Kansas Normal College, and after his election he was granted the "Honorable Peter White Fellowship" for 1908, when he asked and received a leave-of-absence from the Kansas position in order to profit by a year's study as Fellow in Michigan University; after which he returns to the position in the Normal College in June. Recently he has passed successfully the examination for the Master's degree.

It will be seen that Mr. King's course of study has brought him in intimate relation to North Carolina history and his article in the present number on the "Military Organizations of North Carolina during the American Revolution" will be hailed with much interest by the readers of the BOOKLET. This carefully prepared treatise is collated from approved official and documentary data and adds another valuable monograph to the BOOKLET's collection, which will be the more appreciated as coming from a citizen of a distant State.

MARSHALL DE LANCEY HAYWOOD.

Marshall De Lancey Haywood was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, on March the 6th, 1871. He is the son of Dr. Richard Bennehan Haywood (1819-1889), an eminent physician, at one time a surgeon in the service of the Confederacy; and he is of New York ancestry on the maternal side, his mother, whose maiden name was Julia Ogden Hicks, being connected with some of the first families of her native State.

Mr. Haywood is the grandson of Sherwood Haywood

(1762-1829), a man who was venerated and affectionately beloved in private life and highly honored as a man of sterling integrity. He was among the earliest settlers of Raleigh.

This Sherwood Haywood was a son of Colonel William Haywood, and a nephew of Lieutenant-Colonel Sherwood Haywood and Major Egbert Haywood—all patriots of the Revolution, and sons of Colonel John Haywood, who was member of the Colonial Assembly, Treasurer of the Northern Counties of the Province, Commissioner of Coast Fortifications, etc., prior to the Revolution. Sherwood Haywood, of Raleigh, already mentioned, married a sister of Governor William Hawkins, and a daughter of Colonel Philemon Hawkins, Jr., who—like his father, Colonel Philemon Hawkins, Sr.—was an officer in the Revolution.

Through his mother, Marshall De Lancey Haywood is lineally descended from Robert Hicks, who settled at Plymouth, Mass., in 1621; John Hicks, of the Colonial Assembly of New Amsterdam; Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Hicks, High Sheriff of Queen's County in the Colony of New York; Lewis Morris, of Morrisania Manor, Chief Justice of New York and first Governor of New Jersey; Attorney-General James Graham and Surveyor-General Augustine Graham, both of the Colony of New York; and Major John Graham, of the Second New York Continental Regiment. Through the wife of the last named, Mr. Haywood is also descended from the historic Ogden family of New Jersey.

Marshall De Lancey Haywood early evinced a love for letters, and his experience as Clerk in the Attorney General's office and as local editor of a daily newspaper, led him into a broader field of literature of a higher and more substantial character. When twenty-nine years old, he entered Johns Hopkins University and took a special course as a student of history. On returning to his State in 1901 he became Assistant State Librarian; following this he was appointed Librarian of the State Agricultural and Mechanical College. All of these positions he filled with credit, besides the benefit of becoming conversant with standard works and particularly in that line of literature bearing on the history of his State. He has collected books and pamphlets bearing on the history of North Carolina and also owns a most valuable collection of book-plates, engraved portraits, and autographs.

With a patriotic ancestry, and rare opportunities for studying old and forgotten lore, Mr. Haywood has devoted much time to the service of the Society of Sons of the Revolution in North Carolina and is Secretary of the organization, the object of which is to preserve and perpetuate the memory of the War for Independence, devoting surplus funds to the painting of portraits of eminent men who have cast luster on the State, and to similar patriotic purposes.

Mr. Haywood was elected an honorary member of the Society of the Cincinnati in the year 1897 and is now its Secretary. He is equally interested in the United Sons of Confederate Veterans, having served on several of the committees of that organization.

To the Masonic Order he is devoted, and was chosen Historian of the Grand Lodge of North Carolina. His book on the "Beginnings of Freemasonry in North Carolina and Tennessee" has given great satisfaction and has received much applause.

He is the author of numerous other historical sketches, notable among them a book entitled: "Governor William Tryon and His Administration in the Province of North Carolina." Mr. Haywood has been an important factor in the life of the BOOKLET, and has contributed the following articles: "Governor Charles Eden" (1673-1722), Vol. III, December, 1903; "The Genesis of Wake County," Vol. V, July, 1905; "John Lawson"—the Colony of North Carolina's earliest Historian—(—1711), Vol. VI, April, 1907; "The North Carolina Peace Society, 1819-23," Vol. VII, April, 1908. This last mentioned article comes in opportune time, when the Hague Tribunal, Carnegie Peace Endowment, and general efforts to substitute arbitration for force of arms, are claiming the attention of the world, looking forward to that brighter day when the nations shall learn war no more.

At present Mr. Haywood has in preparation a work dealing with the lives of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of North Carolina, running down to the division of the Diocese—this including sketches of Bishops Ravenscroft, Ives, Atkinson, and Lyman.

Mr. Haywood's devotion to historical research, his painstaking industry and literary ability led to his selection as one of the editors of the "Biographical History of North Carolina From Colonial Times to the Present," which is to be completed in ten volumes. The name of Capt. Samuel A'Court Ashe as editor in chief is sufficient to attest the high merit of this work. It is published by Charles L. Van Noppen, a bookman of established reputation. The sketches in this publication represent the best work of some of the best writers of the State; the result is meeting with the highest commendation and the BOOKLET adds its voice to the general verdict—that "the publication is of great excellence and of equal merit with the historical productions of the best American authors." Up to the present time Mr. Haywood has written more than one hundred sketches for that work.

Through a series of steady successes Mr. Haywood is daily adding to his reputation as a writer of history. An interesting sketch of his life, with portrait, may be found in Volume VI of the Biographical History, by Capt. S. A. Ashe, to whom the editor is indebted for the facts set forth in this sketch.

ABSTRACTS OF WILLS.

FROM SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

Will of Adam Gambell, of Glascow, Scotland; Nov. 14, 1694.—John Land, living in London; Adam Hill, in London; John Argy, in France; Robert, Thomas and John West, sons-in-law of Thomas Pollock; John Hunt, brother James Gambell, of Glascow; Thomas Pollock and John Hunt, Exrs. Test: Henel Gregory, Elizabeth Hunt, W. Lynch.

Will of Thomas Gough, Dec. 18, 1794.—Son Robert, daughter Sarah, wife Sarah, whom I appoint Exx. Test: Anthony Dawson, John Williams, Juliana Taylor.

William Flovell, Newton, New Hanover. Dec. 8th, 1737; Mch. 1, 1737-8.—Two hundred pounds to be paid by my executors in six months, to build an English Church in Newton, and my pew in the English Church of Charlestown to be sold and the amount laid out for "Communion Plate" for the said Church in Newton: niece Elizabeth Colleton, now wife of George Colleton, of South Carolina; Uncle William Hale, late of Nassau, New Providence; William Roper, Elizabeth Colleton, Rufus Marsden, John Davis and Jos. Wragg, Exrs. Test: Roger Rolfe, Mich. Higgines, Armand deRossett, M. D.

Mary Glaister, Pasquotank. 9th day, 4th month, 1740; Oct. Court, 1740.—Cousin Henry Palin, son of Thomas, decd.; cousin Thomas Palin, cousin Ann Riding, daughter of Thos. Palin, decd.; cousin Mary Glaister Palin, daughter of Thos., decd., and cousin Mary Palin, daughter of John, decd.; John Palin, son of John, decd.; cousin Sarah Palin, cousin Susannah Pritchard, daughters Sarah Honeycutt and Ruth Scott; Elizabeth Scott, daughter of Stephen, Mary Joans, Mary Morris, Sr., Sam'l Newby, son of James, Hannah Stafford, Sarah Martin, wife of Nath'l; friend Thomas Pritchard, cousins Sarah Palin and Mary Clark, Exrs. Test: David George, John Henby and Joshua Scott.

Dr. John Gourley, Onslow, Jan'y 2d, 1746-47; Jan'y 7th, 1747-48.—Mother Elizabeth, if alive; brother George Gourley, sisters Grizzle and Mary, Sam'l Johnston Exr: £40 (pounds) to buy Bibles and New Testaments for the poor children on New River; nephew John Gourley. Test: James Glenn, Geo. Coheenaw.

Gordin, Nath'l; July 14, 1755; Jan'y Court, 1756.—Son Nathaniel, daughter Tamer, son George, daughters Elezele and Elizabeth; wife Amy, Exx. Test: Thomas Bartlift, Emanuel Davis.

John Haywood, Edgecombe. Feb'y 18, 1758; June Court, 1758.—My father, sisters Deborah and Mary, brothers Egbert and Sherwood. Test: Robert Wasson, Joseph Pope, Samuel Pittman.

John Jacob Horn, Craven. Feb. 4th, 1744; Nov. 20, 1744, Wife, sons Jacob, Henry and Samuel, daughters Mary and Elizabeth Slabbach, daughter Margaret; wife Mary Magdalene and Nicholas Purefoy, Exrs. Test: John Granade, Jas. Wilcox.

HELEN DEB. WILLS,
Historian and Genealogist.

Some Booklets for Sale

Vol. I

"Colonial New Bern." Sarah Beaument Kennedy.
"Greene's Retreat," Prof. Daniel Harvey Hill.

Vol. II

"Our Own Pirates," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Indian Massacre and Tuscarora War," Judge Walter Clark.
"Moravian Settlement in North Carolina," Rev. J. E. Clewell.
"Whigs and Tories," Prof. W. C. Allen.
"The Revolutionary Congresses," Mr. T. M. Pittman.
"Raleigh and the Old Town of Bloomsbury."
"Historic Homes—Bath, Buncomb Hall, Hays," Rodman, Blount, Dillard.

"County of Clarendon," Prof. John S. Bassett.
"Signal and Secret Service," Dr. Charles E. Taylor.
"Last Days of the War." Dr. Henry T. Bahnson.

Vol. III

"Trial of James Glasgow," Kemp P. Battle, LL. D.
"Volunteer State Tennessee as a Seceder," Miss Susie Gentry.
"Historic Hillsboro," Mr. Francis Nash.
"Life in Colonial North Carolina," Charles Lee Raper, Ph. D.
"Was Alamance First Battle of the Revolution?" Mrs L. A. McCorkle.
"Governor Charles Eden," Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
"Colony of Transylvania," Judge Walter Clark
"Social Conditions in Colonial North Carolina," Col. Alexander Q. Holladay, LL D.
"Battle of Moore's Creek Bridge, 1776," Prof. M. C. S Noble.
"North Carolina and Georgia Boundary," Daniel Goodloe.

Vol. IV

"Battle Ramseur's Mill, 1780," Major Wm. A. Graham.
"Quaker Meadows," Judge A. C Avery.
"Convention of 1788," Judge Henry Groves Connor
"North Carolina Signers of Declaration of Independence, John Penn and Joseph Hewes," by T. M. Pittman, and E. Walter Sikes.
"Expedition to Cartagena, 1740," Judge Walter Clark.
"First English Settlement in America," W. J. Peele.
"Rutherford's Expedition Against the Indians," Capt. S. A. Ashe.
"Changes in Carolina Coast Since 1585," Prof. Collier Cobb.

Vol. VIII. OCTOBER, 1908. No. 2

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by

THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY

DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Mrs. Spier Whitaker.
Professor D. H. Hill.
Mr. W. J. Peele.
Professor E. P. Moses.
Dr. Kemp P. Battle.
Mr. Marshall DeLancey Haywood.
Mrs. T. K. Bruner.
Mr. R. D. W. Connor.
Dr. E. W. Sikes.
Dr. Richard Dillard.
Mr. James Sprunt.
Judge Walter Clark.

EDITORS:

Miss Mary Hilliard Hinton, Mrs. E E. Moffitt.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
Mrs. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
Mrs. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
Mrs. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
Mrs. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
Miss MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
Mrs. HELEN De BERNIERE WILLS.

Founder of the North Carolina Society and Regent 1896-1902:
Mrs. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
Mrs. D. H. HILL, Sr.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
Mrs. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VIII OCTOBER, 1908 No. 2

THE CONVENTION OF 1835.

BY HENRY GROVES CONNOR,
One of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of North Carolina.

The Convention which met in Raleigh, June 4, 1835, was one of the "Great Events in the History of North Carolina." It was the result of a long, sectional controversy which had divided the people of the State for more than fifty years, growing out of the Constitution of 1776.

At the Provincial Congress of April, 1776, the question of forming a Constitution was considered and a committee was appointed to draft one, but the delegates could not agree on a plan and the matter was postponed until the next session. The next Congress met, at Halifax, in November, 1776, and the delegates to it were elected with special reference to the adoption of a Constitution. In some of the counties full instructions were drawn up and given by the people to their delegates in respect to those particular points on which they were to insist in the formation of the Constitution. William Hooper, a delegate to the Continental Congress, addressed a letter to the Convention giving his opinion, in regard to the proposed Constitution. Among other things he strongly urged that the Legislature should be composed of two branches, saying: "A single branch of legislation is a many-headed monster which, without any check, must soon defeat the very purpose for which it was created, and its members become a tyranny, dreadful in proportion to the numbers which compose it." At the opening of the Congress, November 12, 1776, a committee, composed of the ablest men in the body, was appointed to report a "Bill of Rights" and "Constitution or Form of Government." When this report came in it was "debated, amended," passed its several readings and adopted on its third reading.[1] It would be interesting to read the discussions of the delegates, some of whose letters and other writings have been preserved, that we might see what their views were in regard to the making of a written Constitution.[2] The vote by which the report of the committee, with the amendments thereto, was adopted, is not given in the Journal of the Congress, but it is certain that there were wide divergencies of opinion among the delegates upon the most important phases of their work. While in its general provisions the Constitution is a model in style, clearness and adaptability to the conditions existing, like all things human, it was, in some respects, imperfect. It is probable, however, that but few changes would have been made for many years, but for the basis upon which representation in the Legislature was fixed. The Constitution as adopted, allowed each county one senator and two members of the House of Commons. The State at that time was divided into thirty-five counties, twenty-nine of which were east of the present capital. Six borough towns were permitted to send one representative each to the House of Commons, and this privilege was afterwards [1789] extended to Fayetteville. It was based upon the theory that by reason of the trade and commerce in which they were engaged these towns had interests peculiar to themselves which entitled them to representation. The qualifications of a senator differed from those of a member of the House of Commons only in regard to the number of acres of land which he was required to own. Both were to be freeholders. An elector was required to be a freeholder in order to vote for a senator, while to be a freeman, if his taxes were paid, entitled him to a vote for a commoner. It was provided that the Legislature should consist of two branches, but there is nothing in the Constitution suggesting that represenation in the Senate was based upon wealth, and in the House of Commons upon population. It is probable that it was deemed wise, in the conditions then existing, to make only such changes as were necessary to organize the State government. While the statesmen of that time were laying the foundations of States, based upon the sovereignty of the people instead of the Crown, they wisely avoided making radical changes in matters of administration. They were State-builders rather than scholastic theorists discussing abstract "rights of man," and were not seeking to cut loose from, but rather to build upon the experience and lessons of the past. They were familiar with the principles of English Constitutional liberty and the rights secured by Magna Carta, and other guarantees of liberty, including the common law. It was because these rights and liberties guaranteed in their charter had been denied to them, that they separated from the Mother Country. The "Bill of Rights" and "Form of Government" were not adopted hastily or without consideration.

[1] Colonial Records of North Carolina, X 974.

[2] Much light is thrown on the subject in McRee's "The Life and Correspondence of James Iredell".

So soon as the War for Independence was over and the State began to increase in population, friction arose between the larger counties which were being formed in the central and western parts of the State and the smaller counties in the east. As population moved westward there was a demand for the formation of new counties in the west which was met by a counter demand for a corresponding increase in the east, without, however, there being any such increase in population. The East, upon the basis of county representation, held controlling power in the Legislature and refused to permit any amendment to the Constitution. The question, originally one of political power, soon became, because of increased interest in improved modes of transportation and other internal improvements, one of industrial and commercial importance. The East, content with its waterways, slave labor, and the produce of its rich soil, cleared into large plantations, opposed State aid to schemes for internal improvements. Judge Murphey originated a movement for improved methods of transportation, "by deepening the inlets from the ocean, opening the rivers for navigation, connecting them by canals, and constructing turnpikes or macadamized roads, so as to concentrate all the trade at two or three points within the limits of the State." The plans of this wise, far-seeing statesman and of those coöperating with him, were changed and given a new impulse by the invention and introduction of the locomotive engine and railroad for transportation and travel. Other States embarked in the construction of canals, and the building of railroads, whereas North Carolina, with no large cities, no canals or other modes of transportation, and no manufactories, made but little progress in industry, wealth or population.

It is not difficult to see that these conditions not only intensified the complaints of the West, regarding the distribution of power, but created a positive antagonism of interest between the two sections. For many years the East successfully resisted every demand for a change in the Constitution, or compliance with the demands of the West for internal improvements, which became more pronounced each year. In 1821 resolutions were introduced in the House of Commons by Charles Fisher, of Salisbury, declaring "that the representation of the people of this State, in both branches of the Legislature, under the Constitution, was greatly unequal, unjust and anti-republican; that the Constitution ought to be so amended that each citizen should have an equal share in the right of representation upon the principle of free white population; that a Convention, therefore, should be called to amend the Constitution." The debate on the resolutions clearly marked the line of division. It was ably conducted and at times aroused much bitterness of feeling. The western members showed that thirty-three counties, containing one-third of the free white population, sent ninety-nine members, being a majority in each branch of the General Assembly; thus one-third of the white population controlled the law-making department, and, as the Constitution then provided, elected the Governor and other executive and the judicial officers. If the representation had been based upon population Rowan County would have been entitled to send nine, and Orange seven members, whereas they sent only six, two senators and four representatives. Six eastern counties, with about the same population, sent eighteen members. Twelve eastern counties, with a population of 38,037, sent as many members as the same number of western counties, containing 156,726. The State, at that time, contained sixty-two counties.[3] The resolutions were defeated in the House by a vote of 81 to 47, while in the Senate they were rejected, without discussion, by 36 to 23. Meetings were held by the western people, "addresses" were sent out, and continued agitation kept up for a Convention. At the session of 1831 resolutions were introduced by Mr. Whitaker, of Macon, calling a Convention for the purpose of amending the Constitution, and after a full discussion were defeated by a vote of 69 to 56. It is not difficult to see that, in a government based upon the consent of the people, discord and dissension would continue until some change was made. The State government was developing into an aristocracy based upon county representation without regard to the right of the majority of the people to make the laws under which they lived.

In 1831 the State Capitol was burned. The question of rebuilding was complicated by a movement to make Fayetteville the capital. Of course the old controversy in regard to amending the Constitution came to the front and entered into the discussion. The people of the State were divided in sentiment, mainly along sectional lines, involving sectional feelings and interests. The divisions, and their combinations are thus set forth in a letter from a member of the General Assembly:

[3] Debates of 1821.

"We are distracted—rent asunder, by factions, and the result of the legislative discussions and dissensions will be (I fear) that we shall separate in anger, after having proved most unprofitable servants. There are five parties here. The largest—but it does not quite constitute a majority—is for rebuilding the capitol and is opposed to a Convention in every form. This may be termed the Eastern party. The next, in point of magnitude, is the Western party—they want a reconstruction of our Constitution with respect to political power and want no more, but will either keep the government at Raleigh or remove it to Fayetteville, as the one or the other will favor their great end. The third, in point of size, is the Fayetteville party; their main object is removal—but they are willing, also, to go for a general Convention. The two others are of about the same magnitude—the Northwestern and Southwestern parties. The former want a modification of the Constitution, but are utterly opposed to a removal, and the latter want a removal, but resist alterations of the Constitution."

The outcome of this somewhat complicated condition was the rebuilding of the capitol at Raleigh, followed at the session of 1834, after an unsuccessful effort to make amendments to the Constitution by submitting them directly to the people, by the passage of an act submitting to the people the question of calling a Convention.

The act provided that, if a majority of the votes cast were for "Convention," elections were to be held in the several counties for the election of delegates, each county sending two. The act further provided that only such amendments as were named therein should be submitted. The Convention was directed to form and submit an amendment providing for the election of not less than thirty-four, nor more than fifty senators, to be elected by districts, which were to be established on the basis of the amount of taxes paid into the public treasury; and not less than ninety nor more than one hundred and twenty members of the House of Commons distributed among the counties on the basis of the "Federal population," i. e., of all free men and three-fifths "of all other persons," excluding Indians, not taxed. Each county, however, was to have at least one member. This basis of representation was adopted by the General Assembly as a compromise. At that time the State contained sixty-five counties and seven borough towns, making the total number of senators and members of the House two hundred and two. The Assembly met annually. Other amendments, in the discretion of the Convention, might be submitted. The most important of these were: whether borough representation should be abolished, or restricted; whether the right of free negroes to vote should be abolished or restricted; whether the Governor should be elected by the people and for what term; whether there should be biennial sessions of the General Assembly; whether the capitation tax on free whites and slaves should be equal throughout the State; whether the salaries of Judges should be decreased during the term for which they had been elected, and whether they should be eligible to any other position while retaining their judicial office, except the Supreme Court Bench; whether, in the election of officers, members of the Legislature should vote viva voce; and finally, whether the 32d Article should be amended. Each delegate was required to take an oath, prescribed by the act, to observe these limitations.

The proposition to call a Convention was approved by a vote of about 27,000 out of 49,224. This, according to Governor David L. Swain, was, with one exception (the election of 1828), the largest vote cast at any election in this State. He also stated that he did not think that the population of the State had increased between 1830 and 1835 so much as three per cent, and was not sure that it had increased at all. As a general rule the counties sent as delegates their ablest and most experienced citizens. Warren sent Nathaniel Macon, who, after a long and distinguished service in both branches of the National Congress, had voluntarily resigned in 1828, and retired to private life. His associate was Weldon N. Edwards. From Buncombe came Governor Swain; from Burke, Burgess S. Gaither and Samuel P. Carson; from Caswell, Calvin Graves; from Cumberland, Judge John D. Toomer; from Granville, R. B. Gilliam and Josiah Crudup; from Guilford, John M. Morehead; from Lincoln, Bartlett Shipp; from Richmond, Alfred Dockery; from Rockingham, E. T. Broadnax; from Rowan, Charles Fisher; from Wake, Judge Henry Seawell; from Wilkes, James Wellborn and Edmund Jones; from Craven, Judge William Gaston and Richard D. Spaight; from Greene, Jesse Speight; from New Hanover, Owen Holmes; from Washington, Josiah Collins; from Sampson, W. B. Meares; from Martin, Asa Biggs; from Edgecombe, Louis D. Wilson; from Halifax, Governor John Branch and Judge Joseph J. Daniel; from Perquimans, Jesse Wilson; from Pasquotank, John L. Bailey; from Chatham, Hugh McQueen; from Chowan, J. B. Skinner; from Bertie, David Outlaw; from Hertford, Kenneth Rayner; from Cartaret, James W. Bryan; from Cabarrus, Daniel M. Barringer; and from Lenoir, Council Wooten.

These citizens had won at that time, or thereafter won distinction in the service of the State and Nation. They and their colleagues constituted a strong, patriotic body of men, who recognized the importance of the work to which they were appointed, and approached it with a determination to remove from the Constitution the source of discord and dissention. Macon was unanimously elected President; E. B. Freeman, Principal Clerk, and Messrs. Gales and Son, Printers. The question was raised regarding the power of the Legislature to impose limitations upon the delegates representing the people, or to prescribe a form of oath to be taken by them. This objection was disposed of by the pertinent suggestion that the people had, by adopting the act as their own, themselves prescribed the limits within which the delegates were to submit amendments. The Convention decided to discuss proposed amendments in Committee of the Whole before final adoption. It is impracticable, within the limits of this paper, to give more than the outlines of the debates on the most important amendments.

The first question discussed was a proposition to abolish borough representation. The debate took a wide range and gave indications of the views of the delegates upon other questions which were to engage the attention of the Convention. Judge Gaston favored retaining the right of the borough towns to send representatives, and gave an interesting account of the origin of the right, and the reasons upon which it was based. Mr. Smith, of Orange, opposed retaining them, as did Mr. Fisher and several others representing counties which contained borough towns. A number of delegates took part in the debate. Governor Swain, although from the extreme west, from which there were no such representatives, noticed that the votes of the borough members had joined with the West in calling the Convention. He said: "The united vote of the borough members was the fiat which called this Convention into existence, and their constituents were the only aggregate portions of eastern communities that sustained the measure. Are they to be immolated upon the Altar of their own patriotism?" In this speech Governor

Swain outlined the policy of the western people. Internal improvements, education, general progress in the development of the resources of the State, and encouragement to immigration were the purposes of this strong, patriotic leader from the mountains. His speech drew fire from Mr. Macon, and the lines were soon drawn. Mr. Macon said that he could go hand in hand with the gentleman from Buncombe as regarded education, but he differed with him in his notions about internal improvements. He doubted the capacity of North Carolina to become a great commercial State, but they could diffuse the blessings of education and become a virtuous if not a great people. The opponents of borough representation were in the majority, and passed the amendment abolishing it. As the principle of representation based upon population was to be engrafted into our Constitution, the action of the Convention was logical and doubtless wise. To have retained it would have been a source of dissension outweighing its advantages.[4]

The Convention next discussed the proposition to deprive "free persons of color" of the privilege of voting. Judge Daniel favored giving to each of them the right to vote for members of the House of Commons provided he owned a freehold estate of $250. In an interesting speech he traced the origin of the privilege which they had enjoyed, which he thought was useful to them as a means of protection and a stimulant to good behaviour, because it gave them a status which appealed to their pride and manhood. He did not think that the right to vote was secured in the Bill of Rights. That embraced only free white men. He had observed that they uniformly voted for men to represent them of the best character and talents. Mr. Macon was utterly opposed to any free person of color having the right to vote. He did not think they ever had such right under the Constitution of 1776. Mr. Crudup, a man of great wisdom and large views, wished to see these people raised from their present degradation, but did not think giving them the right of suffrage would do so. His remarks upon this, and other subjects before the Convention, were conservative and well considered. Mr. Gaston did not think it wise to make any change in the Constitution in respect to these "unfortunate people." If they had not enjoyed this privilege they would not at that time aspire to it. "The hardship," he said, "lay in depriving them of what they had been in the enjoyment of. * * * Let them know that they are a part of the body politic, and they will feel an attachment to the form of government and have a fixed interest in the prosperity of the community, and will exert an important influence over the slaves." Mr. Wilson, of Perquimans, did not believe "free blacks qualified to vote." He gave expression to the opinion then held by many Southern men. He said that he had heard almost everybody saying that slavery was a great evil. He believed it was no such thing, but thought it a great blessing to the South. Our system of agriculture could not be carried on in the Southern States without it. The Southern people might as well attempt to build a railroad to the moon as to cultivate their swamp lands without slaves. It is interesting to note that Mr. Wilson thought there were, at that time, about five hundred and seventy-five "free persons of color" voting in Halifax and several neighboring counties. He feared that "if we foster and raise them up they will soon become a majority and we shall have negro justices, negro sheriffs," and other negro officials. The western men took no part in the discussion, leaving the question to be settled by the eastern delegates, and the amendment depriving negroes of the privilege of voting was adopted. Branch, Daniel, Gaston, Rayner, Toomer, Holmes, Seawell from the East, and Swain, Carson, Morehead with others from the West, voted in the negative. How little the wisest know of the operations of the industrial, political and social forces, and what disturbances they work in the "nice adjustments" of human governments.

[4] Nash: "The Borough Towns of North Carolina," in THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET. Vol. VI. No. 2.

Having disposed of these "side issues," the Convention grappled with the paramount issue, the question which had disturbed the peace and retarded the growth of the State for more than a generation. The proposition submitted to the Convention was that the Senate be composed of fifty members. This was easily decided in the affirmative with but little debate.

The next proposition, that the House of Commons be composed of one hundred and twenty members, met with opposition from Mr. Speight, of Greene, who saw in this number a majority from the West with internal improvements, railroads, and all manner of evils for the East. He was of the opinion that to make a railroad from Beaufort to the mountains would be incurring an expense which could never be repaid by the intercourse between these distant portions of the country.

Mr. Wilson, of Perquimans, also opposed any change in the Constitution which would give power to the West to impose upon the East taxes for internal improvements, saying: "But what benefit would accrue to the West? Very little; for nine-tenths of their lands are exhausted, and not worth cultivating, contrasted with hundreds and thousands of acres annually brought into market in the Southwestern States. None complain so much of the want of a market as those who have little or nothing to carry to it."

Mr. Macon was opposed to any plan of internal improvements in which the government was to take any part. All improvements of this kind, he said, ought to be the work of individuals as they could always have it done at cheaper rates than the government.

In response to the arguments of Governor Swain, Messrs. Fisher, Wellborn, Morehead, Carson and others, Mr. Speight said that he need not assure the committee that he was the friend of internal improvements, such as would afford a facility to the farmers of our country in getting to market; but he equally deprecated those wild and visionary schemes on which the demagogue always mounts to power. "The gentlemen talk about a railroad from the seaboard to the mountains. Why, sir, such a scheme is not only idle and visionary, but perfectly impossible." To convince the Convention that he favored internal improvements, Mr. Speight assured the delegates that, if he ever had the honor to be again a member of the Legislature he would "bring forward a plan, and the only one which can improve our condition, viz: a railroad from Beaufort to New Bern, and one from Fayetteville to some central point in the West."

Judge Gaston discussed the question in all its aspects, in a spirit of moderation, with thoroughness and convincing argument. He favored the number of senators and members agreed upon by the report of the committees. Among other things he said, "It should be borne in mind that governments are formed for practical purposes, and not to present themes for the exercise of schoolmen and declaimers." Conceding that the West had cause for complaint, and combatting the conservatism of the extreme eastern men, he said: "The principle which the gentleman from Greene professes, that of equal representation by counties, is supported by no reason whatever—is upheld by nothing but existing usage—stands condemned by the people and has had its day." He showed by calculations made by himself, the original of which are before the writer, that by adopting fifty as the number of senators, distributed upon the basis of taxable property, and one hundred and twenty as the number of the House of Commons, distributed upon the basis of Federal population, the East would have a small majority in the Senate, and the West in the House. He insisted that while by this plan the result was satisfactory, at the time, it was also based upon a correct principle. Said he: "Make it right, so that it may last. Make it right, for the effect of it will be to obliterate those very sectional divisions which have heretofore prevailed." In conclusion, deprecating the dissensions which had divided the people and retarded progress, he said: Who but must wish that the disconnected fragments of the State may be brought together by those facilities of communication which will make her people and act as one people in interest and affection. Much, very much, may be done for the improvement of the State's physical condition. But there was another point of view in which he most earnestly desired the improvement of the State. If the only secure foundation of rational liberty be the virtue of the people, the best safeguard of that liberty is to be found in their intelligence. This alone could secure them against the wicked acts of oligarchs and demagogues. Not a little had lately been done in the cause of education; and he hailed with delight the institutions which were springing up in various parts of the country for the instruction of youth. But no efficient plans had yet been adopted for diffusing information throughout the land, and bringing it home to the poor and humble. If righteousness exalteth a nation, moral and religious culture should sustain and cherish it. It was in vain to hope that what ought to be done for the physical or intellectual and moral advancement of the State, could ever be accomplished, without the united efforts of the good and the wise, without liberal councils, and systematic coöperation. Many an anxious, many a painful hour, had he spent in reflecting on the divided and distracted state of his country. Earnestly had he wished that he might live to see the day when, instead of wasting their energies in sectional broils—instead of waging against each other a foolish and wicked contest, in which victory was without glory, and defeat without consolation, they could, like a band of brothers, devote all their aspirations and all their efforts to their country's cause. He would not—he could not abandon the hope, that harmony and good will were about to be restored. He did hope that under this new order of things—under these favorable auspices, his beloved State was about to become all that her sons could wish her to be—that retaining the excellencies she now possessed—her love of liberty and order—her steady, kind, republican and industrious population—her simple and unobtrusive virtues, there might be added to her whatever was fitted to raise, and decorate, and ennoble her character.

Mr. McQueen, of Chatham, followed in a very able and patriotic speech, advocating the same views. After an enthusiastic discussion he concluded: "I am impressed with the belief that the meeting of this convention holds out a more sublime and beautiful spectacle than ever has been before presented to the moral or intellectual vision in North Carolina. And as I firmly believe that it will reveal brighter and more animating prospects than ever flushed Carolinians' hearts with joy, my heart now swells with rapture at the imperfect glimpse which I have caught of the bright beams that have occasionally darted upon the consultations we have held for the benefit of our country. I think that when this convention surrenders its powers at the feet of those who gave it, we will perceive the morning sun of a brighter day beaming in the firmament of our prosperity."

The motion to strike out 120 members was defeated by a vote of 76 to 52. The affirmative vote came entirely from the eastern counties. Among the eastern delegates voting in the negative were Bonner and Tayloe, of Beaufort, Arrington of Nash, Faison and Meares of Sampson, Macon and Edwards of Warren, Gaston and Spaight of Craven, Holmes and Marsteller of New Hanover, Ruffin and Williams of Franklin, Toomer and McDiarmid of Cumberland, Williams and Joyner of Pitt. The number of representatives fixed upon at that time has never been changed. The center of population has moved far westward, and the present indications are that it will continue to do so, but happily the conflict between the sections is now confined to friendly contests for office.

It is an interesting problem for the student of North Carolina to forecast the basis of political power in 1935. With the negro eliminated, as a political factor, and the industrial growth of the Piedmont and West, it may safely be assumed that a convention in 1935 would present a very different line of division from that of 1835. The number of senators and representatives will hardly be interfered with unless, as is not probable, the present number of counties is increased to more than one hundred and twenty.

The proposed amendments providing for biennial sessions of the General Assembly, and the election of the Governor biennially by the people alarmed Mr. Macon, and he strongly opposed them. He said, "Democracy is dead in North Carolina"; predicted all manner of tyranny, and the destruction of popular rights. He quoted Mr. Jefferson as saying, "Where annual elections end, tyranny begins." He offered as a safe analogy the custom of a good farmer who, he said, always hired his overseer for one year. Judge Daniel quietly observed that he had lately seen a gentleman from Tennessee, where they elected the governor by the people, who told him that "candidates were traveling through the State on an electioneering campaign at expense and trouble to themselves and great annoyance to the people." Mr. Macon expressed the opinion that "this was a talking government," and he apprehended that the proposed change would destroy this safeguard of liberty.

The convention did not share the fears of their venerable president, and adopted both amendments. Time has justified their wisdom. Certainly our liberties are in no danger from the change.

The convention next entered upon a long and in many respects an able and interesting discussion on the proposition to amend the 32d Article of the Constitution. This Article provided: "That no person who shall deny the being of God, or the truth of the Protestant religion, or the Divine authority either of the Old or New Testament * * * shall be capable of holding any office of trust or profit in the civil department of the State." The only proposition seriously discussed, although several others were considered and voted upon, was whether the word "Protestant" should be stricken out and the word "Christian" inserted; and it is difficult at this day to understand how so able a body of men could have spent so much time and taken so wide a range of debate on such a simple proposition. For many years different opinions had been held in the State whether the Article, as it stood, excluded Roman Catholics from holding office, but the question had never been brought to a practical test. Judge Gaston had been elected to the Legislature a number of times, and two years prior to the meeting of the convention had been elected by a practically unanimous vote of the General Assembly a justice of the Supreme Court, and commissioned by Governor Swain, without any question other than the expression of private opinions. He was on the bench at the time of the convention.

The debate indicated a wide range of opinion in regard to whether any, and if any, what religious test should be applied. The objections to any change were based upon a number of reasons. Some thought that to admit Roman Catholics would meet with much opposition from the people. Mr. Smith of Orange thought that in some indefinite way he was instructed "by his constituents not to remove the test." It is quite interesting to note how, by unanswerable facts and arguments his difficulty was removed, but his mind and conscience not satisfied.

Mr. Macon said that so far as he was individually concerned it mattered not what provisions were incorporated in the Constitution. His time had nearly come. But this article was the only feature in the old Constitution which he had ever heard objected to outside of the State; and the objection was always coupled with an expression of surprise that it could have got a foothold in a State where the principles of liberty were so well understood. There were times when a man must stake himself for the good of his country. The present was a crisis of this kind. To him it appeared too plain a question to argue that every man may worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. But it is a practical denial of its truth to debar a man from office be cause he may entertain certain religious opinions. You might as well attempt to bind the air we breathe, as a man's conscience—it is free—liberty of thought is his inalienable birthright. Referring to Judge Gaston, Mr. Macon said: "There was one member of this Convention whose father had been inhumanly murdered by the Tories in our Revolutionary struggle—he begged pardon for the allusion, but it was history—and shall it be said that his son, baptized, as it were, in the blood of his father, is unworthy a seat in the Legislature of our country?"

As one of the many instances in which men have used language, in making constitutions and laws, capable of many different constructions, numerous and widely divergent views were expressed in respect to the purpose and meaning of the Constitution. Some thought that it was intended to exclude Roman Catholics—some that it had no reference to persons of that faith and was not intended to exclude them, while others insisted that by reason of the uncertainty of its meaning it was incapable of enforcement.

Judge Gaston, the only member of the Convention to whom it could be supposed the article had any personal application, discussed the subject in all of its aspects in the last, and probably the greatest speech made by him in any deliberative body. While expressing his views strongly, and explaining the circumstances upon which he went upon the bench, he said: "But as an individual I beg it to be understood, that I am utterly indifferent as to the determination of the Convention and of the people, except a desire that the consitutional provision be made explicit. If it be thought essential to the State that a monopoly of offices be secured to certain favored religious sects, let it be so disclosed. He who now addresses you will not feel a moment's pain, should such a decision render it his duty to return to private life. Office sought him—he sought not office. An experience of its cares, its labors and its responsibilities has not tended to increase his attachment to it."

Mr. Smith said that he wished this section to be laid aside as sleeping thunder, to be called up only when necessary to defeat some deep-laid scheme of ambition.

Mr. Swain disliked to keep the "sleeping thunder" of this section, as the gentleman from Orange termed it, to be used in some emergency hereafter. He did not like to leave it in the hands of men in power, who might hereafter abuse it by > "Dealing damnation round the land,

> On all they deemed their foe."

After rejecting a number of proposed amendments, the Convention, by a vote of 74 to 52, struck out the word "Protestant" and inserted the word "Christian." The negative vote included a number of delegates who were opposed to retaining any religious test. Upon the final test the Convention by a vote of 76 to 32 refused to strike out the word "Christian," Gaston voting with the majority.

Upon the question of submitting the amendments to the people, Mr. Macon said that he could not give them his approval as he had two decided objections to them—the one was the doing away with annual elections, which he considered a fundamental principle of Republican liberty; the other was the change made in the election of Governor. He was sorry that he could not concur in approving the work of a body of men from whom he had received uniform kindness and attention.

The vote on this question stood 81 to 20, the latter being generally from the East.

The closing scenes of the Convention were peculiarly interesting. Judge Gaston, Governor Swain being in the chair, offered a resolution "respectfully tendering thanks to the Honorable Nathaniel Macon, their venerable President, for the distinguished ability, dignity and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of his station." Mr. Macon, after returning his thanks for "all your kindness," said: "This I expect will be the last scene of my public life. We are about to separate; and it is my fervent prayer that you may, each of you, reach home in safety, and have a happy meeting with your family and friends, and that your days may be long, honorable and happy. While my life is spared, if any of you should pass through the county in which I live, I shall be glad to see you.[5]

"On the President's resuming his seat and the applauses of the Convention having ceased," according to the Journal, "Mr. Carson, of Burke, arose and said that he was about to leave old North Carolina to reside in the far West, where he should be happy at all times to see any friend from the old State—to be a North Carolinian, would be sufficient recommendation—his house and corn crib should be at the service of his friends."

[5] Mr. Macon's prophecy was not fulfilled. He was an Elector on the Van Buren ticket of 1836, and presided over the Electoral College. He died, June 29, 1837.

Judge Gaston, from the Committee on Enrollment, reported that the Amendments to the Constitution correctly enrolled on parchment had received the signature of the President and Secretary. After Reverend Dr. McPheeters had offered prayer, the President announced that the business was finished, and on motion of Judge Gaston the Convention stood adjourned.

The amendments were ratified by a vote of 26,771 for, and 21,606 against, the majority being 5,165.

The votes in the following counties are of interest:

Burke, for the amendments,		1,359;	against,	1
Buncombe,	"	1,322	"	22
Iredell,	"	1,184	"	18
Lincoln,	"	1,887	"	42
Rutherfordton,	"	1,557	"	8
Rowan,	"	1,570	"	18
Wilkes,	"	1,757	"	8
Edgecombe,	"	29	"	1,334
Brunswick,	"	0	"	466
Tyrrell,	"	1	"	459
Washington,	"	14	"	409
Martin,	"	14	"	795
Hyde,	"	2	"	431
Warren,	"	46	"	580
Craven,	"	131	"	270
Wake,	"	243	"	1,124

This is a fair average of the vote of the eastern and western counties. They are interesting figures, and shed much light on the history of North Carolina. They also show that the Convention was called none too soon. The question which called the Convention into existence was that upon which the line of division in the vote upon the amendments was formed, representation in the House of Commons based upon population. The other questions were of but little importance in the opinion of the people. Notwithstanding the apprehension of Mr. Smith in regard to the "instruction" given him, the county of Orange ratified all of the amendments by a vote of 1,131 to 246.

The limitations necessarily imposed upon the length of this paper render it impossible to refer to many interesting discussions in the Convention which exhibit a very high order of learning, eloquence and patriotism on the part of the delegates. They are worthy of and will repay study by any person interested in our history.

THE LIFE AND SERVICES OF BRIGADIER GENERAL JETHRO SUMNER.

BY KEMP P. BATTLE, LL.D.

[Abridged from his Guilford Battle Ground address, by the author.]

The President of the Guilford Battle-Ground Company, the eminent Judge Schenck, who, with wonderful energy and success, made green the memories of the warriors, who. on the 15th of March, 1781, 127 years ago, inflicted on the disciplined army of Cornwallis the blow which saved the Carolinas from slavery, caused to be transported the remains of General Jethro Sumner from the wilds of Warren County to the battle-field. The heavy stones, which by the care of his daughter, were over his dust, were reverently taken down and as reverently reerected here.

The task of writing his history has not been an easy one. The facts of his career were only obtainable by diligent research through many manuscripts of a public nature and through numerous volumes relating to the history of Virginia and the Carolinas and the United States. We know nothing of General Jethro Sumner's family in England, whence it came. It must have been one of respectability and substance, for we find his grandfather, William Sumner, becoming a freeholder of Virginia soon after William and Mary ousted from the English throne Mary's tyrranical father, James II. He came about the time of the removal by the choleric Governor Nicholson of the capitol from Jamestown to Williamsburg and of the founding of the second college in America, the noble old William and Mary, named in honor of the new sovereigns, (1691). On his plantation, called Manor, (for English ways and English names were then much liked) one mile from the town of Suffolk, he raised his tobacco and his corn and wheat, and after the fashion of the day, his blooded horses and fat cattle, while a family of five boys and one daughter grew up around him.

The name of the daughter has not come down to us. The names of the five boys were, Jethro, John, James, William and Dempsey. It is altogether probable that Jethro was the oldest. The right of primogeniture then existed and was dear to the landholders, who had not lost their English love of aggrandizing the family name by entailing the principal homestead on the oldest son. I find that Jethro Sumner was in 1743 one of the first vestrymen of the Episcopal church at Suffolk, and his oldest son, Thomas, was in his stead four years afterwards. General Sumner in his will refers to the "Manor plantation" of his brother in Virginia. These facts seem to show that Jethro, the elder, inherited the paternal land.

Jethro Sumner, the elder, died early, leaving three children, Thomas, already named, Jethro and Sarah. Thomas lived many years and died a bachelor, though not childless. General Sumner's will shows that he did not devise his "Manor plantation" to him, but bequeathed him only a legacy in money.

Sarah married a man with the singular name of Rushworm, whose family seems to have become extinct.

Jethro Sumner, the younger, was born in 1733 and was probably about twelve years of age at the death of his father. How long he had been deprived of a mother's care we do not know. There is a tradition that he was well cared for by his mother's mother.

The East Virginia planters of Colonial days were a race of striking virtues, but with many defects both as to character and conduct. They were high spirited, brave and truthful. They were loyal to the English Crown, but they understood their rights and were always ready to defend them. They were devoted to horses, and boasted justly that they owned scions of the best racers of England. They had frequent races and both sexes thought it no harm to bet on them, the men heavily, often to the impairment of their fortunes, the ladies seldom venturing beyond a pair of gloves.

The young men learned the art of horsemanship not only in fox-chases, but by constant habit of visiting and traveling on horseback. So deep-rooted was this fashion, that a traveler of that day avers that he has often seen men walk five miles to catch a horse in order to ride one.

The use of firearms was learned by practice in hunting deer, wild turkeys and squirrels, and other game so numerous as to seriously threaten the existence of food crops. Shooting matches, too, were common, the victor not only winning the stake, but receiving the plaudits of admiring neighborhoods.

There was little of what we call education. A few boys received college training at William and Mary. Still fewer were sent to the great schools or universities of England, but the greater part were content with reading and writing and a little arithmetic. The writing was invariably legible, but much liberty in spelling was allowable. In General Sumner's will the county of "Isle of Wight" is spelled "Ilewhite." The gallant Murfree writes of "legenary coors" (legionary corps). Uniform spelling came in with Webster's blue-back spelling-book. The colonial gentleman was likewise too proud to be willing to submit himself to the strict grammatical rules of the solemn pedant who posed as the predecessor of Lindley Murray.

But while there was little education from books, there was a most valuable training from the exigencies of life in a country full of natural resources, but requiring for their development incessant watchfulness and incessant toil. The carrying the chain and the compass through thickets almost impenetrable and swamps almost impassable, the felling of forests, the defense from floods, the war of extermination against wild animals, the occasional march to help the settlers of the mountain lands to repel the hostile, or to barter for furs with the friendly Indians, the rough sports on horse or on foot—all these, joined with watchful criticism and a discussion of their rights by charter and by inheritance, made a hardy, self-reliant, independent, proud and daring people. They were, as a rule, respectful to those in authority, friendly and courteous to their equals, kind and considerate to their inferiors, but equally ready when angered by encroachment upon their rights to resist fiercely, to avenge insults, to crush insubordination even with cruelty.

In depicting the habits and the character of the people among whom young Jethro Sumner was trained up to manhood, I have pictured him. His removal to North Carolina did not change him for the better or for the worse.

Hardly had Jethro Sumner reached maturity before a contest broke out, of far-reaching influence on the destinies of this country. This was the struggle between the French and the English for the ownership of the magnificent territory, drained by the Mississippi and the Great Lakes and their tributaries. The French sought by connecting Quebec and New Orleans with chains of forts, and by gaining the alliances of powerful Indian tribes to confine the English between the ocean and the Alleghanies.

In the early stages the plans of the French were crowned with success. Our colonies had been designedly kept in a state of pupilage to the mother country. While there was great individual capacity, they had not been taught to organize into armies. Looking each to England for their commerce, and most of them for their chief executive and judicial officers and their clergy, they knew little of one another.

Their laws were subject to the royal veto. They had not learned the immense value of union among themselves. Their levies of soldiers were badly supported and badly armed. At first too, the English government supported them in a manner feeble and actually tending to cripple their efforts. The officers sent were stupid and arrogant, as full of conceit of their own importance as contempt for the colonists. There was disaster almost everywhere, while ruthless savages were laying waste the entire Northwest frontier of the British colonies.

In 1757 the genius of Pitt changed disaster into victory. He gained the confidence of the colonies by consulting their legislatures about the conduct of the war. He promised arms and ammunition, tents and provisions, the colonies to raise, clothe and pay the twenty thousand troops called into service with promise of reimbursement by parliament. Incompetent officers were replaced by competent officers. Amherst captured Louisburg and superceded Abercrombie, who had lost two thousand troops in a rash assault on Ticonderoga. Bradstreet captured Oswego. Forbes, aided by Washington, seized Fort Du Quesne, and on the 13th of September the great contest was virtually won by Wolfe's heroic capture of Quebec. The French power was broken and in the following year (1760), which witnessed the death of old King George II and the succession of his grandson George III, also witnessed the final conquest of Canada and the end of a glorious dream of a dominating New France in the New World. Three years later the English flag waved over all the land from the ocean to the Mississippi.

Jethro Sumner was an actor in this great struggle. Bearing a letter of commendation from Governor Dinwiddie to Colonel Washington, he was in 1758 appointed a lieutenant in a Virginia regiment of which William Byrd was Colonel, General Joseph Forbes being Commander-in-Chief. Washington had been endeavoring with insufficient means, to defend the long frontier from the terrible savages, whose destruction of property and slaughter and torture of the settlers, old and young, male and female, had been inconceivably horrible. The winter was coming on. The fierce winds began to blow; the snow began to whiten the hills. The General and his council of war talked of delaying the march till spring. Washington begged to be allowed to lead the van with his provincials, who were clamoring for an onward move. Through all difficulties, watching against ambuscades, infusing his indomitable spirit into his men, he pressed on. The French officer saw that he had an officer of brains and daring in his front, and, setting fire to the woodwork of the fort, he fled with his troops down the Ohio. On the 25th of November, 1758, Washington and his brave troops marched into the ruined fortress. Jethro Sumner was one of those daring men, who gained for the Anglo-Saxon race the control of the Ohio, and started their onward march, which from that day has had no backward move, and ninety years later climbed the lofty Rockies and planted the starry flag on the shores of the Pacific.

His were likewise among the kindly hands which, after the victory was gained, reverently and tenderly gathered the bones of Braddock's men, whitened by the sun, and amidst the solemn silence of the interminable forest, gave them Christian burial. A great city, whose smoke from a thousand factories overshadows the scenes of those old fightings, commemorates by its name of Pittsburg the sagacious and daring war minister who prepared the victory.

Sumner remained in service until his regiment was disbanded in 1761. He was evidently an officer of merit. An order published in the Colonial Records of our State, dated November 26, 1760, from Colonel Bouquet, his superior, shows that he was entrusted with separate command at Fort Bedford. His regiment marched twice into the Cherokee country as far as Holston River, while Colonel Grant with an army of twenty-six hundred men terribly avenged the massacre of the garrison of Fort Loudon. For their services grants of land were authorized to be given to the discharged officers. Sumner having reached the grade of captain, received three thousand acres.

This war prepared the way for American Independence. It taught the colonies their own strength. It taught them how to fight, and what is of still more importance, that they could fight. They learned the value of union. They learned the value of organization and discipline. The war was a training school for their officers—for Washington and Mercer, Sumner and Montgomery, Putnam and Morgan and many others.

After his return to Nansemond the young officer determined to change his home. Probably his long service among the hills and mountains had given him a distaste to the dreary flatness of the lands which adjoin the great Dismal Swamp. Only an imaginary line separates our State from Virginia. There has been for two centuries a steady movement of population from the dearer lands of the valley of the James to the cheaper lands drained by the streams which flow into the Albemarle and the upper waters of the Tar. The Sumners, the Eatons, the Mannings, the Smiths of Scotland Neck, the Ransoms, the Armisteads, the Riddicks, the Norfleets, the Saunderses, the Lewises, the Ruffins, the Camerons, the Battles, the Plummers, the Bakers, the Pughs, the Winstons, the Winbornes, the Hunters, the Bridgerses, the Thomases, the Taylors, and hundreds, perhaps thousands of others, were all old Virginia families. Some changed their homes because, being younger sons, they had no share in the paternal lands; others, because high living or losses by gaming had worsted their estates; others to exchange few acres for larger plantations equally fertile, or old fields for virgin forests; others to escape by settlement among the rolling hills of Bute and the country westward, the miasmatic diseases of the low country. But for whatever causes they migrated they changed neither their opinions nor their practices, nor their business habits. They still sent their produce to Virginia markets—Richmond, Petersburg, or Norfolk. Returning wagons brought back the tea and coffee and sugar and ladies' finery. They kept their accounts in both Virginia and North Carolina currency. Visits to these cities for shopping or pleasure were the summun bonum of the aspirations of young men and maidens.

Most of these emigrants from Virginia became true North Carolinians. Occasionally would be heard arrogant boasting of Virginia superiority, as from the old man, mentioned to me by my mother, who answered all who disputed with him, "Weren't I born in Jeems (James) River, and ough'nt I to know?" But most of them, as Jethro Sumner did, devoted their affections and their energies to their adopted State.

Captain Sumner settled at the court-house of the new county of Bute (pronounced Boot), named in honor of the first instructor and minister of George III, who became so odious that a favorite amusement among the populace was with groans of derision to throw an old jack-boot, often accompanied by an old petticoat, to illustrate, falsely, I think, his suspected intimacy with George's mother, into a bonfire and dance around the crackling effigy. An early General Assembly of free North Carolina expunged the name of the odious Marquis from the map and substituted Warren and Franklin as names of the new counties carved from the old. The court-house of Bute was a few miles to the south of the present county seat of Warren. Here Jethro Sumner set up his household gods. We do not know the exact date of Sumner's settlement in Bute. It was certainly prior to 1769.

Mr. William J. Norwood has donated to the Battle-Ground Company an account book kept with all the neatness of penmanship and durability of black ink so remarkable among our ancestors. It contains the dealings of the neighbors with the keeper of the tavern at Bute Court-house. It shows among many others the account of General Sumner from November, 1769, to November, 1774. It effectually contradicts the statement of Captain Smyth, author of Smyth's tour, as to his occupation. He says that Sumner pursued the business of tavern-keeper, and that more than one-third of the officers of the American army had the same occupation, and were chiefly indebted to that circumstance for their rank. He gives as a reason that by this public calling their principles became known, and their ambitious views were excited by the variety of the company they entertained. Smyth's book shows violent false prejudices throughout. In his opinion Washington was a very poor general, but a most cunning demagogue, his moderation and disclaimer of desire for office being only for electioneering purposes. The book is valuable in many respects, but utterly unreliable in its statements about the officers of our army. It would have been no discredit to Sumner if he had been the keeper of the only inn at the court-house, but this account book shows that he was the owner of it and rented it to one Elliott for thirty-six pounds per annum. Smyth states, as we learn from other sources, that he had married "a young woman of good family, who brought him a handsome fortune."

Captain Sumner was appointed sheriff in 1772. The office was a very dignified and responsible one. The appointment was by the Governor of one out of three nominated by the justices of the county. I have a copy of his commission, signed by Governor Jo. Martin at Hillsborough at August Term, 1772. It is a proof of the high character and business habits of Sumner, that while there had been great uprisings of angry people in some of the counties almost adjoining Bute, and loud complaints of extortion and embezzlement in those and many others, there were no charges of such criminal conduct in Bute. There were no Bute militia, however, in Tryon's Army which marched against the Regulators in 1771.

The account book of Bute court-house tavern confirms my statement that Sumner and his neighbors retained the habits and feelings of Eastern Virginia. The New Light and Great Revival, if they made any impression on them, it was only transitory. We see glimpses of the same high living and love of fun. We see notices of a court-house ball, of a "bull-dance," the progenitor probably of the modern "stag," of a game of pitch, (quoits, probably, of which Chief Justice Marshall was especially fond); of games at cards, at which one of the players "got broke" and borrowed money of the landlord, of ten pounds paid by Sumner for the erection of a battery, which was a wooden wall for playing the good old game of "fives"; of a barbecue costing six pounds, seven shillings, and three pence, given by William Park; and of fox-hunts of course. All these were accompanied by drinking of liquor in some shape. Sometimes it was rum pure and simple, or as we say "straight"; more seldom it was brandy, never whiskey, but usually it was some mixture. The most common is bumbo, composed of rum, water, sugar, and nutmeg; but we have also juleps (spelt julips) and frog and flip; sometimes we see wine and sangaree and cider too (spelt cyder). There is an entry which the rising generation hardly understands. After a "rousing frolic" there is a charge for "broke glasses." This suggests the foolish custom of winding up the feast with some jolly toast and, after drinking it, smashing the tumblers against the ceiling, typifying that having conferred a pleasure so divine, they should never henceforth be debased to any ignoble use.

And in this account book we detect William Person (called Billy Parsons) and Green Hill, members of the General Assembly, engaged in what we consider a crime, but was then expected of all candidates—that is, treating at elections. They are charged with their proportions of "liquors expended in the court-house while voting, ten shillings"; also toddy one shilling and three pence. Rum one shilling and six pence.

There was a strange hallucination in regard to spirituous liquors in the "good old days." The men of that generation thought that they were drinking health and joy and long life. In truth they were drinking down gout and dropsy, and liver disease, and kidney troubles and short life. There were few old men of that generation.

General Sumner was like the rest—he kept the prevailing fashion. Smyth says that he was a "facetious" man. Doubtless he told good stories about his experiences in the army, and the peculiarities of the unlettered backwoodsmen with whom as sheriff he had dealings. He was "of person lusty and rather handsome", says Smyth, that is he had a strong body and vigorous health, and a fine, manly bearing. The cynical Englishman of a nation of grumblers, chronicles that his dinner was excellent. We can easily call to our mind the Jethro Sumner of that day, at the age of forty-two, his long hair combed back so as to fully expose his rubicund face, tied in a cue behind him, his countenance frank and open, looking one straight in the face with a clear, bright eye, his body inclining to portliness, as became the devourer of good cheer; vigorous from out-door exercise, on foot or on horse, in sport and on business, having the air of authority as became the executive officer of a county in those monarchical days when official station inspired far more awe than at present; as became too a man who had learned the art of command in actual service in an army where officers and men were widely separated by social as well as by army rank, as became, too, the owner of a great estate and many laborers.

At the dinner-table in the familiarity of social intercourse with a young military officer of wealth and good blood, he showed appreciation of a good joke, a quality which has not yet died out in North Carolina. I think better of him for that. Capt. William Biggs, an admirer of Chief Justice Merrimon, and Col. Henry A. Dowd, an admirer of Senator Vance, were once rather heatedly discussing the relative excellencies of their favorites; "I admit," said Biggs, "that Vance can tell a joke better than Merrimon"—"Stop right there", shouted Dowd, "I tell you no man but a smart man can tell a good joke." It is a pleasant picture—these two—the Bute County sheriff and the English officer, exchanging their army anecdotes over their nuts and wine, or rather, I should say, over their hickory nuts and bumbo, in the beautiful month of November, 1774, both too polite to discuss the angry questions which will in three years array them in opposite armies at Germantown, thirsting for each other's blood, the host an American colonel, the guest a British captain. Notwithstanding Sumner's desire to be agreeable to his guest, Smyth notices that he was a man "of violent principles" in regard to the pending quarrel between the mother country and the colonies.

No part of the State was more unanimous in resistance to English aggressiveness than the county of which Sumner was sheriff. "There were no Tories in Bute" was the proud boast. And few families contributed as much to the common cause as the descendants of William Sumner. One of his grandsons, Luke Sumner, repeatedly represented his county, Chowan, in the State Congresses before and the State Senate during the war, and was the highly trusted chairman of the committee of safety from Chowan, member of the eminent committee which reported the Constitution of 1776, and many other important committees, such as those for the purchase and manufacture of arms. David Sumner was a member of the State Congress of August, 1775, and of the committee of safety of Halifax and Lieutenant Colonel of Militia, James Sumner was lieutenant in a company of Light Horse. Robert Sumner was a member from Hertford of the convention of 1776 which formed the State Constitution, and of the Senate afterwards, while Elizabeth Sumner's husband, Elisha Battle, was representative from Edgecombe in the State Congresses of 1775, 1776, and State Senate under the Constitution.

But the most eminent of all the family was Jethro Sumner, whose "violent principles" were noticed by Smyth. As sheriff it was his duty to hold the elections, and he could not himself be elected to the convention of 1774 and of March, 1775, but after the flight of Governor Martin to the Royal ship Cruiser, we find him member of the Hillsboro Congress, 1775. The congress proceeded with firmness and wisdom to inaugurate a provisional government and prepare for war. The militia was organized, a special force of five hundred minute-men for each of six judicial districts was ordered to be raised, besides two regiments of five hundred each for the continental army. Bounties were offered for the manufacture of articles most needed.

Captain Sumner was chosen major of the minute-men of the Halifax District. They were in effect volunteer militia, with the privilege of electing their company commissioned officers. He at once showed the superiority natural to one who had learned the art of war under Washington. Occasion was now had for his services. Within a few weeks after the adjournment of Congress the following order was issued:

IN COMMITTEE OF SAFETY,
November 28th, 1775, Halifax.

Ordered that Major Jethro Sumner raise what minute-men and volunteers he can, and follow Colonel Long with the utmost dispatch.

By order OROON DAVIS, Clerk.

A copy.

Most probably Colonel Long had marched to the defense of Norfolk, and Sumner followed with the minute-men of Bute. Colonel Howe, afterwards General Howe, hurried forward the second regiment of Continentals, and took command of them and of the North Carolina minute-men. He arrived two days after the victory of the Great Bridge, but he and his troops so gallantly defended Norfolk that the baffled Dunmore on the first day of January, 1776, burned the town and sailed away. Howe was emphatic in his praises of the troops under his command and the legislature of Virginia thanked him and his men for their services.

The Congress of 4th April, 1776, at Halifax, looked the great issue boldly in the face, discarded their hope of friendship from the English King or the English people, and, first of all the colonies, authorized its delegates in the Continental Congress to vote for Independence. The militia was ordered to consist of all between sixteen and sixty years of age. A brigadier-general for each distrtict was elected. Four additional regiments were voted for the American continental army, and four hundred thousand pounds, or one million dollars in bills of credit, were ordered to be issued for the purpose of paying all expenses. The name of Provincial Council for the supreme executive power was found to be inappropriate, as the word "Provincial" implied a recognition of dependence on Great Britain. The name Council of Safety was substituted. Large executive and judicial powers were given, care being taken, however, that they should not be despotic. Three vessels of war were ordered to be built and officers appointed for them.

So highly appreciated was the conduct of Major Sumner that at the next meeting in April of the Provincial Congress he was promoted to the colonelcy of the third regiment of the Continental troops. His field officers were William Alston, lieutenant-colonel; Samuel Lockhart, major. His captains were William Brinkley, Pinkethman Eaton, John Gray, William Barrett, Jacob Turner, George Granbury, James Cook and James Emmett. The enlisting of men was voluntary, and the following instructions to recruiting officers are interesting: They were to accept "able-bodied men only, capable of marching well and of undisputed loyalty." Regard must be had as much as possible to "moral character, particularly sobriety." The Colonel was authorized to reject those not fit for service. No soldier under five feet, four inches high must be enlisted. They must be healthy, strong-made and well-limbed. The character of disqualifying bodily infirmities sounds strange in our day. They must be "not deaf or subject to fits, or ulcers on their legs, or ruptures." The last-mentioned may have been frequent on account of log-rolling matches, and other violent exercises, but what caused the prevalence of ulcers and fits is a mystery. The recruit took an oath to be faithful and true to the united colonies.

About the middle of July, 1776, the recruits were carried to Wilmington, where Gen. Francis Nash was in charge of the brigade of six regiments. Lillington was too old to go on parade and Lieutenant-Colonel Lambe was substituted. Recruiting had been very successful and the regiments were full. About the middle of November the troops were marched north to join Washington, but were stopped for three weeks in Halifax on the land of Col. Nicholas Long, now Commissary-general of this State. They were marched back to participate in a campaign against Florida. They paused on their journey near the boundary line of South Carolina, about three weeks, "making excellent beds of the long moss on the trees." Here a squad of men claimed that they were enlisted for only six months, and, on being refused their discharges, deserted. "Three of them were colored people," so it appears that free colored men helped to gain American Independence. From this camp they marched to Charleston, and lay in camp opposite to Fort Sullivan until the middle of March, living on fresh pork and rice as their constant diet, the expedition to Florida being abandoned.

It has always been thought that only the first and second regiments under Colonels Moore and Martin, brigaded under Brigadier-General Howe, participated in the brilliant defense of Charleston on the 28th of June, 1776, Charles Lee being general-in-chief, and that they only of the North Carolina soldiers were entitled to the splendid praise of General Lee, all the more valuable since he had been an officer in the English army. "Their conduct is such as does them the great est honor; no men ever did and it is impossible to ever behave better," and again in his report to the Virginia Convention, "I know not which corps I have the greatest reason to be pleased with—Mecklenburg's Virginia's or the North Carolina troops; they are both equally alert, zealous and spirited." But a letter from Col. Jethro Sumner to Lieut.-Col. William Alston, printed in the tenth volume of our Colonial Records, page 790, shows, I think, that Sumner and his regiment were at the defense of Charleston.

The letter places Sumner in the most favorable light. He states that General Lee had given him leave to return to North Carolina for the purpose of providing necessaries for the troops in view of the coming winter. He urges Lieutenant-Colonel Alston to be particularly careful of the discipline and to keep a good understanding among the officers and soldiers. He wishes them informed of the cause of his leaving, that it is to their benefit. He says, "You are at all times to keep up a strict discipline, but to reserve a mode of clemency as among young troops; now and then to throw something of a promising hope among them of a quick return to North Carolina, which I doubt not but some time hence will be the case. It will engage the mind and will for a time dispense with inconvenience. Be careful in seeing that no fraud is done them by the commissaries, and their pay regularly to a month delivered by their captains."

We see here a kind, fatherly and careful heart. Soldiers with such a sympathetic commander were sure to reciprocate his watchfulness for them by attention to duty in camp and on the battle-field.

At the same time that Colonel Sumner went to North Carolina, Lee was ordered north to join Washington. At the urgent request of the authorities of Georgia and South Carolina, the North Carolina troops remained for the defense of those States during the fall and winter following the Declaration of Independence. They were on the fifteenth of March, 1777, ordered to join Washington's army. The route was by Wilmington, Halifax and Richmond. The story of their brilliant victory over the British fleet had preceded them. Their progress through Virginia was an ovation. They could, says the chronicle, hardly march two miles without being stopped by ladies and gentlemen who flocked to see them. At Georgetown those, who had not suffered from smallpox, were inoculated with such success that not a man was lost. They reached Washington's camp at Middlebrook about the last of June. They were placed under the command of General Alexander, Lord Sterling.

Washington met the enemy on the eleventh of September at Brandywine. Sterling's division, including Nash's brigade, was under the command of Sullivan. They showed praiseworthy courage. The flight of Sullivan's own division exposed the flank of Sterling and of Stephen. As Bancroft says, "These two divisions, only half as numerous as their assailants, in spite of the unofficer-like behavior of Stephen, fought in good earnest, using their artillery from a distance, their muskets only while within forty paces." They were forced to yield to superior numbers. Sullivan redeemed his want of generalship by personal bravery, and Lafayette fought by their side as a volunteer and was shot through the leg.

Within five days Washington was ready for another fight, but the conflict was prevented by a furious rain-storm, which damaged the powder of both armies. On the fourth of October he formed an excellent plan for attacking the enemy at Germantown. The brigades of Maxwell and Nash under Sterling, formed the reserve in the most difficult attack—that on the British left. This attack was successful and if it had been supported properly by the other parts of the army would have won the victory. North Carolina lost some of her ablest men—General Nash, Col. Henry Irwin, Jacob Turner, a captain in Sumner's regiment, and soon afterwards the noble-hearted Col. Edward Buncombe, who was wounded and fell into the hands of the enemy, died at Philadelphia.

The North Carolina brigade went through with fortitude the heart-rending suffering at Valley Forge in the winter of 1777-78. When the news of the Alliance of the United States and France and the sailing of the French fleet to America induced the British commander to retreat to New York, giving up Philadelphia, they did faithful service at Monmouth on the twentieth of June—a victory which would have been most signal for the Americans but for the misconduct of the traitor, Gen. Charles Lee. They were posted on the left flank of the army and prevented the turning of that flank by Cornwallis.

In May, 1778, on account of the diminished numbers, the North Carolina battalions as they were called after joining Washington's army, were consolidated. The sixth was put into the first under Col. Thomas Clark, the fourth into the second under Col. John Patton, and the fifth into the third under Col. Jethro Sumner.

Sumner was promoted for his faithful services to be brigadier-general on January 9, 1779. The North Carolina regulars, dwindled to only seven hundred men, were ordered to the south for the defense of South Carolina and Georgia. General Howe had been disastrously defeated near Savannah, and Congress had superceded him with General Lincoln. General Sumner and his brigade had the post of honor in the attack on the intrenchments of the enemy at Stono Ferry on June the twentieth, 1779. The troops were ordered to trust to the bayonet only, but meeting with a heavy fire, they could not be restrained from returning it. They behaved with great spirit, but as Moultrie, who had been charged with this duty, was unable for the want of boats to prevent the arrival of reinforcements to the British, Lincoln withdrew his men with small loss and in good order. Soon after the battle active operations ceased, on account of the heated air laden with malaria. Sumner's strong constitution, which had resisted the fierce cold of a Pennsylvania winter, could not save him from the prevailing fever. He was forced to ask leave of absence, expecting a speedy recovery in the highlands of Warren. His presence in North Carolina was needed to aid in forwarding recruits to his depleted brigade. His request was granted early in July, and he was therefore not engaged in the disastrous assault on Savannah by the French and American forces on October the ninth, 1779.

In November, 1779, General Sumner was again with Lincoln and joined in the advice to cross the Savannah into Georgia, a movement rendered of no avail by the defeat of General Ashe. On account of his great personal influence in North Carolina he was detached to raise four new regiments of regulars and so escaped being captured at Charleston.

Baffled in the attempt to conquer the Middle States the British ministry determined to transfer the theater of war to the South. The policy seemed for a while successful. In 1779 occurred the disastrous failure by the Americans to capture Savannah. In May, 1780, Charleston capitulated, and by the blundering policy of General Lincoln, urged on by the governor and other officers of South Carolina, two thousand of our best regular soldiers, the heroes of many hard-fought battles, including the North Carolina brigade under General Hogan, were lost. Georgia and South Carolina were overrun, only a few small partisan bodies, under Marion and Sumter and others, keeping alive the slumbering fires of patriotism.

To make matters worse, Congress which had already inflicted one unwise general on the South, now sent another still worse. The defeat of Gates at Camden left North Carolina open to invasion.

General Sumner was one of the most active and efficient officers in the movement which led to the salvation of the Carolinas. As said before, the North Carolina regulars, except those who were absent on leave, were captured under Lincoln at Charleston. General Greene on account of the unreliability of short term troops earnestly desired the organization of another brigade of regulars. He was ably seconded by the General Assembly, whose determination like that of senators of old Rome, rose higher as the invader drew nigher. As the Roman senators did in times of extreme danger, they appointed a dictator—a Council-Extraordinary—composed of the Governor (Nash), ex-Governor Caswell and William Bignal, of New Bern, and for fear that the Assembly would be prevented from meeting, gave it all the powers vested in the Board of War and Council of State, the powers of the purse and of the sword, the power "to do and execute every act and doing which may conduce to the security, defense and preservation of this State."

Conscription, the last resort of a self-governing people, was adopted. A law to raise two thousand, seven hundred and twenty men for filling up the Continental battalions was enacted and great bounties offered. All runaways and deserters, all who harbored deserters, all who failed to appear at the time of drafting, were to be ipso facto privates in the Continental army for twelve months.

Other strong measures were authorized, such as power of impressment for supplies for the army, the confiscation of property of Tories, and a specific tax of one peck of corn or the equivalent in other provisions, for each one hundred pounds of property. This was afterwards increased to one bushel. These were stern measures, and could only have been enacted by those who valued freedom over property and life.

Prior to the battle of Guilford, March the fifteenth, 1781, there seems to have been small success in recruiting. Greene was forced to replenish his small army with militia. Seeing this state of things, Sumner, with the full approval and at the request of Greene, offered his services as a commander of a brigade of militia, but the offer was not accepted on account of the influence, it is said, of Caswell, who dreaded the despotic influence of officers of the regular army.

Governor Alexander Martin differed widely from Caswell. On the first day of January, 1782, he made an urgent request to General Sumner for Continental officers. He writes, "With your leave Major Hogg accepts a command of Light Infantry of five hundred men with Major McCree; Captain Tatum in command of a troop of horse attached to Major Hogg. Captain Dixon also will command such of the State troops as are now at Warren Court-House until the corps can be organized under Lieutenant Marshall. I flatter myself with the great advantage this State will derive from having the honor of Continental officers in its service at this important period which may finally blast the hopes of a despairing enemy and cause them to fall an easy prey to our arms."

Col. John Armstrong, in a letter to Sumner, gives graphic account of his trials. He says: "The General (Greene) seems very uneasy about the delay of the draft of the Salisbury district and of the desertions that frequently happen by reason of the forced number of Tories into the service, and as soon as they receive the bounty, they desert. I have received nigh three hundred men and will have not above two hundred in the field. I did everything in my power to bring out the drafts of this district, but all to no purpose. There is one-half at home yet, and remain without molestation. As for clothing, there was little or none sent fit for a negro to wear, except from Rowan. I am sorry that I ever had anything to do with such slothful officers and neglected soldiers. There is a number of them now almost naked, and when cold weather sets in they must be discharged, for no officer would pretend to put them on duty. The neglect we have labored under heretofore, together with the present, makes the service very disagreeable to every one in camp. We are without money, clothing, or any kind of nourishment for our sick; not one gill of rum, sugar or coffee, no tents or camp kettles or canteens, no doctor, no medicine. Under these circumstances we must become very inefficient."

"I am afraid that in a short time you will have but few officers in the field, by reason of the shameful neglect of the State. We seem rather a burden than a benefit to them; we are tossed to and fro like a ship in a storm."

The one thing praised by Armstrong is the pleasantness of the situation of the camp, "plenty of good water." "But," he adds, with a groan, "It has one failing—it will not make grog." Armstrong says that if Sumner had known of the sad condition of the soldiers a remedy would have been found. This is a confirmation of what I have already mentioned of his tender care of his troops.

Although the required number had not been raised, yet Sumner was able on the fourth of July, 1871, to march from Salisbury for Greene's camp in South Carolina, to take command of a thin brigade of one thousand men, distributed into three battalions.

In the pleasant hills of the Santee the raw soldiers, many of whom were conscripted on account of their desertion from their militia duties, were taught the drilling and discipline of soldiers. The enemy under Stewart, was near the confluence of the Wateree and Congaree, each army in sight of the watch-fires of the other. Two large rivers ran between them, effectually preventing surprises, and the operations were confined to cutting off convoys and foraging parties, in which the infantry was not employed.

Greene was the first to move. On the twenty-second of August he marched up the Santee, and Stewart, divining his intention to cross, fell back forty miles nearer his supplies at Eutaw Springs, where the battle occurred. In this stubborn conflict, in which both sides displayed the lofty qualities for which the Anglo-Saxon race is distinguished, Sumner and his brigade, although the soldiers were new levies with only three months' training, and most of them had never before been in a battle, made such a brilliant charge as to win from General Greene the strong commendation, "I was at a loss which most to admire, the gallantry of the officers or the good conduct of the men." And again, "The North Carolina brigade under Sumner were ordered to support them, and though not above three months men, behaved nobly." Governor Martin wrote, "I congratulate you on the honor you have gained at the head of the North Carolina army at the Eutaw." And such was the general verdict. Captain Smyth, the British officer, heretofore mentioned, after peace speaks of Sumner's having "distinguished himself in the course of the late war, being the General Sumner of the American army, who has been so active in the Carolinas."

Although the glory of a conceded victory was denied the Americans, the British forces hurried off to Charleston, and Greene, weakened by the expiration of the term of service of so many of his men, retired to his camp among the hills of the Santee, soon to rejoice over the glorious news from Yorktown. Here he waited for recruits and watched the enemy.

As soon as the camp was reached, Sumner at Greene's request returned to North Carolina for the second time for the thankless business of raising new forces and urging the supplying of his brigade with food and clothing. Colonel Armstrong wrote on February the thirteenth, 1782, from camp at Colonel Shivers, thirty miles from Charleston: "Your officers and soldiers are very naked and no hopes of being better."

There was universal apathy. The currency became worthless and people in defiance of stringent laws began to refuse to accept it. Specie began to make its appearance at the North, but very little found its way to our State. There was no provision made for the soldiers when recruited. One officer writes that he has men, but no food, another that he has not a single blanket to his company. Another that his drafted men have not come in, and if he obeys Sumner's orders to march he will go alone. Another says that the men came in slowly, and that numbers desert, "we are very scarce of provisions and under the necessity of impressing from the inhabitants who have been greatly disturbed,"..... "The people will make very little corn in this (Caswell) county."

It is impossible at this late day to trace with any minuteness the actions of General Sumner during the last eighteen months of the war. As no great movements of the armies were inaugurated it is probable that he remained in North Carolina, prosecuting his duty of raising troops. In this, his efforts, as were similar efforts in other States, had little success. The ravages of disease in the low lands of South Carolina, where the operations were carried on, had been so great that each recruit, as he turned his back on his home, felt that he was marching to suffering and death. Drafting was the only remedy, and this became so odious that only one-third of those liable in North Carolina were procured.

On the twenty-third of April, 1783, furloughs were granted to the North Carolina soldiers, and they returned gladly to their homes. Large grants of the fertile lands of Tennessee were made them, including twenty-five thousand acres to General Greene, while General Sumner's share was twelve thousand acres. A commission was appointed to settle and pay the just dues, which the Continental Congress had failed to discharge.

In the closing years of the war only the energy generated by fears of defeat and ruin had kept up the people to the fighting point. After the capture of Cornwallis there was a universal feeling that war was practically over. The exertions which were the fruit of terror and despair, gave way to supineness and lethargy. The poor soldiers, far from home, seemed to have been forgotten. In some commands there were mutinies and threats to enforce their rights at the point of the bayonet. An Alexander, a Cæsar, a Napoleon, might have urged the fierce discontent of the army for the organization of a military despotism. The great and good Washington, by the union of kindly feeling and occasional force, quieted these troubles. The brave soldiers who encountered all the sufferings which can afflict mankind—hunger, thirst, nakedness, disease, wounds, separation from loved ones, apparent ingratitude and neglect from those in civil authority—officers whose fame will never die, and their humble followers, "unnamed demigods of history," hung up their swords and their muskets on the bare walls of their ruined dwellings, and addressed themselves manfully to repairing their shattered fortunes and laying the foundation of the Great Republic of the world. As S. S. Prentice so beautifully said to the returned soldiers of the Mexican War: "Thus the dark thundercloud at Nature's summons marshals its black batallions and lowers in the horizon, but at length, its lightning spent, its mission finished, its dread artillery silenced, it melts away into the blue ether, and the next morning may be found glittering in the dewdrops among the flowers, or assisting by its kindly moisture the growth of the young and tender plants."

General Sumner was exempt from some of the trials suffered by his compatriots. He was a man of large possessioons. His home was not in the track of the armies and suffered no injury from the rude soldiery. His neighbors were all loyal to America and we find no depredations of Tories or deserters in Bute. His prudence kept him from debt. In the midst of admiring friends, enjoying the satisfaction of a well-earned reputation, he spent the residue of his days in the management of his estate, the care of his slaves and his blooded horses, the training of his children and the exercise of a generous hospitality. His wife probably died during the war, as she seems to have been living in 1781, and was not living in 1785.

Only once was he induced to leave his privacy. In 1784 was formed the Society of the Cincinnati, composed of the officers of the Continental army. Its name was taken from the personification of Washington, called, like Cincinnatus of old, from his farm to the salvation of his country. It was designed to perpetuate the feelings of patriotism and brotherly affection engendered by the long struggle together for Independence, and provide for the indigent in their ranks. Washington was its president-general. General Sumner was president of the North Carolina division and presided over a meeting of the delegates at Hillsboro on April the thirteenth. As delegates to the general body he appointed Archibald Lyttle, Reading Blount, and Griffith J. McCree. As in the original incorporation the primogeniture principle was contemplated, fears entered the public mind that the society was an entering wedge for the introduction of an aristocracy into our country. This hostility, coupled with the difficulty of communication in this large but thinly settled State gave it a short life here. In some of the States it still flourishes, and has been successfully revived in North Carolina. From it is derived the name of one of the most flourishing cities of the West.

We have the inventory of General Sumner's effects, returned by his executors. Including the bounty lands in Tennessee, he left over twenty thousand acres of land, besides town lots in Halifax, Louisburg and Smithfield, in Virginia. He owned two valuable farms in Warren County, one called his "Manor Plantation" and the other his "Bute Court-House Plantation." On them were thirty-five slaves, nearly all able to work, and seventeen horses, some of them racers, and about two hundred and forty hogs, twenty sheep and eighty-six head of other cattle. The possession of this large amount of stock, together with one hundred and fifty barrels of old corn and a quantity of bacon and beef and six hogsheads of prized tobacco and about two to prize," as late as the fifteenth of March, after the winter was passed, is a pretty good showing for his management. The mention of a "quantity of quart bottles, some rum, brandy, cyder and wine," five large China bowls, and four small ditto, shows that he kept up the convivial habits which distinguished Warren society for so many years, while the "one chamber chair" suggests that the war-worn veteran, after leaving his active army life, may have contracted by too generous living that affliction, formerly called the aristocratic disease, the gout, exceedingly common in that day. There is an enumeration of a large quantity of earthenware and china, silver and ivory-handled knives and forks, "two square tables, two round tables, and two tea ditto," which shows that he was accustomed to show bountiful hospitality. As mementos of his army experience we find two thousand, three hundred and seventy-four pounds, nine shillings and six pence of army certificates, his silver-handled sword, bequeathed to his eldest son, and "his camp-beds, bedsteads and furniture," which he gave to his daughter. The division of his "printed books" between his two sons, in that day when books were quite rare, indicates that he had some taste for literature.

The end was much nearer than the age of fifty-two years would seem to make probable. The exposures of war from the bitter cold of Valley Forge to the fever swamps of South Carolina, undermined his strong constitution. His will is dated March fifteenth, and he died March the eighteenth, 1785.

I regret that I can ascertain nothing satisfactory about General Sumner's wife. Smyth states, as I have mentioned, that she was young at the time of the marriage, of good family and of a handsome fortune. Wheeler says that she was a widow Heiss, of New Bern, but none of the old inhabitants of that town know anything about her. General Sumner bequeaths to his daughter the "clothing and jewels of his wife, now in possession of Mrs. Long, of Halifax." Mrs. Long, of Halifax, the widow of Col. Nicholas Long, the commissary-general, was a notable lady, whose maiden name was McKinnie, and from the fact that Mrs. Sumner's clothing and jewelry were left with her, coupled with the fact that one of her sons was named McKinnie Hurst, and further that it appears from an act of the General Assembly, disentailing some lands, that the McKinnies and Hursts were related, the presumption is that she was either a McKinnie or a Hurst, nearly related to Mrs. Long. The presumption is strengthened by the fact that one of the devisees of Sumner's lands, in the case of the death of all his children in their minority and without issue, was Nicholas Long, Jr., a son of Mrs. Long.

General Sumner left three children, all minors. We do not know the dates of his marriage or of the birth of any of his children, except Jacky Sullivan, who married Thomas Blount, a brother of Col. Reading Blount, one of Sumner's colonels. She changed her name to Mary Sumner Blount, and died in 1822. She was born in 1778 and was probably the youngest child. The two sons were Thomas Edward and McKinnie Hurst. To the former, doubtless the oldest child, was devised his Manor Plantation. To McKinnie Hurst the Bute Court-House Plantation. In case either should die in their minority the other was to have the whole. If all his children should die in their minority his lands were to go to Nicholas Long, Jr., and the oldest son of Benjamin McCullock and James Gray. His executors nominated were Benjamin McCullock, John Baptista Ashe, Young McLemon, and James Grey, but only McCullock and Grey qualified. McKinnie died young and Thomas, after being a member of the legislature of North Carolina, removed to Tennessee and died childless, and so all the property finally vested in Mrs. Mary Sumner Blount and was scattered by her among sixty legatees, including the Episcopal Church of Raleigh, and friends who had been kind to her. Her husband was a member of Congress of the United States, and one of the commissioners to locate the capitol, and also the University.

From the foregoing sketch, we are able to estimate what manner of man Jethro Sumner was. He was not a genius; he had little education derived from books. But he had a generous nature and a big heart. One of his colonels writes: "Dear General, you are no stranger to our sufferings; we have our eyes upon you as our support in our hour of need." They did not lean on a broken reed, but on a sturdy oaken staff. He had a strong head and sound common sense. General Greene and Governor Nash and scores of military leaders in the dark hours of a desolated State, of civil strife, of ruined currency, of despondency and of terror, asked the aid of his sagacity and pluck, and asked not in vain. He had a long experience in actual military service, in fierce battles, in laborious marches, in dreary encampments, in thankless recruiting service, from a Lieutenant to a Brigadier-General's place. He was a loyal, brave, true, gallant soldier. He did his whole duty and made no boast. He left no posterity to keep his fame burnished. Let us join in thanks to the giver of all good, because of His gift to North Carolina of *"Jethro Sumner, one of the Heroes of 1776."

* This is the inscription on Sumner's monument.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE MECKLENBURG DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

BY BRUCE CRAVEN.

The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, May 20, 1775, was tremendously significant in that it was a logical fruition of and a striking keynote to the unconquerable and indomitable free spirit of the people of North Carolina. It was not the effect of sudden passion. It was not an ill-advised act of fanatics. It was instead an extraordinarily noticeable outcropping of a pure vein of sturdy independence that extends from the beginning to the end of the history of North Carolina. This heart of the matter has been neglected in the intricate efforts to prove or to disprove that the event occurred as claimed. The simple fact of this long drawn-out discussion which has continued unabated for nearly one hundred years is evidence of the importance of the act, the genuineness of which can not be doubted by any unbiased mind in possession of the uncontrovertible testimony. The desire here, however, is not to present proof of established history, but to penetrate the outward semblance and analyze the motives and purposes of the spirit so powerfully manifested in advance of the other American colonies and at a time when the Continental Congress was declaring fealty to George the Third and denying any desire for national independence.

Freedom of thought and speech is the foundation of the American Republic and is engrafted into every American constitution, but this immortal fundamental element of true democracy was born in North Carolina. It was the first declaration of the first settlers and in their first laws it was first legally guaranteed to mankind with equal rights to all and special privileges to none. The desire for freedom of mind and conscience was directly responsible for the settlement of America, but the Puritans and Cavaliers who sought and won freedom for themselves, denied it to others, thereby sacrificing the principle of it. Never was it guaranteed by any people to all other people in good faith until in 1653 the gentle peace-loving pioneers left Berkeley's tyranny in Virginia and came southward and settled around Albemarle Sound. Of these people Bancroft said "they were the freest of the free," and further, "If you would study man's capacity for self-government, study the history of North Carolina." These settlers included many nationalities, but they were united in a common cause in a sincere and abiding belief in the natural and inalienable rights of pure liberty. When in 1663 the King granted the territory to the Lords Proprietors, the first inducement held out to new settlers was this guaranty of religious and industrial freedom, and though the promise was not held sacred by some of the British Governors, the rights were never surrendered by the people who submitted gracefully to British rule so long as it protected them, and resisted it boldly and defiantly when it trampled upon their rights.

In 1678, when the government was fifteen years old and the colonists numbered twenty thousand, they accomplished the first successful armed resistance to the encroachment of British tyranny. The trouble began with the philosophic but impossible "Model Constitution" prepared by Locke and Shaftsbury, and which provided for high-sounding titles and civic and military dignitaries intended to captivate the people. Nothing ever failed more completely. The offer of Dukedoms and Earldoms had no more attraction for these free people who had builded their homes with their own hands out of the rough-hewn logs of the forests than the offer of toys would have for full-grown men. The fantastic document was scorned with unanimity, the people thus showing their innate repugnance to undemocratic government. They feared God and loved the brethren, were willing to bear their own burdens and to help others, but never to presume to add to the neighbor's burden by any assumption of superiority warranted or unwarranted. Relieved from this handicap, they were subjected to an attempt to rigidly enforce the odious navigation act which stipulated that the colony could only trade with English vessels. This would have destroyed a chief source of wealth in preventing trading with the other colonies, and as it was plainly an infringement of national rights, the people, headed by John Culpepper, threw the officials into jail and conducted their own government in actual independence for two years, until their just demands were satisfied in the repeal of the law.

In 1688 the colonists became incensed at Governor Seth Sothel (also one of the Proprietors) for his tyranny and extortion, arrested, tried and convicted him and drove him from the State in disgrace. The authorities in England decided that the only hope of maintaining the rule over the North Carolinians was to send one of their own number over as Governor, so they sent the one England could spare the best. He was captured at sea by Algerine pirates, who might have atoned for many misdeeds by keeping him, but they released him at the end of two years, during which time he no doubt added much to his store of knowledge in wicked ways. In his five years' administration of the colony's affairs he set the pace for all time for corruption in office. He was a shameless libertine, briber and taker of bribes, and thievery and all species of corruption were as natural to him as drawing breath. The people endured his misdeeds until patience ceased to be virtue and then gave a fitting example of the way to deal with such abuses, even though the object of their wrath was the sole representative of the power of the greatest nation on earth.

In 1704 a law was promulgated making the Established Church of England the State church for North Carolina. Delegations were sent to Queen Anne protesting that they paid their own preachers and would pay no others, and declaring their unalterable determination to resist the injustice even unto death. The struggle was fierce but short and the authorities saw that discretion was the better part of valor. The people won and the obnoxious law was repealed.

In all history there is no finer example of the spirit of freedom than in the open defiance of England by these few thousand colonists living in their rude log cabins. The Lords Proprietors, perceiving the impossibility of conquering the spirit, turned the colony over to the King in 1729, and the people entered no protest. They recognized the English government as the seat of authority and offered no resistance until the government abused its power. Gabriel Johnston was Governor from 1734 to 1752, and though he was a faithful servant of the King he was an able and conscientious man and the people enjoyed peace and were never more friendly disposed toward the mother country. In these years the rushing tides of immigration were settling the State as far west as the foot of the Blue Ridge Mountains, but the spirit of the population remained unchanged. In 1749 the printing press was introduced into the State and the progress and prosperity were so noticeable that there was no suspicion of the storm that in twenty years was to follow the calm.

In 1764 the North Carolinians forced Governor Arthur Dobbs to admit that the control of the State's revenue rested exclusively with the people who paid the taxes. Governor Dobbs, by his obstinacy and lack of tact, developed much friction and hard feeling between the people and the government. He claimed that the revenues belonged to England and that he, as England's representative, had the right to disburse them without recourse to the will of the people. The people had no text-book of political economy and cared but little about theories of law and government; they knew this was an attempt to destroy their liberty and they refused to pay taxes until the Governor, facing open rebellion, yielded to their demands that no money should be appropriated from the public funds without the consent of the General Assembly.

William Tryon came into office in 1765, when the people were discontented and distrustful and fearful of British rule, and his services began with the duty of enforcing the Stamp Act, which required all legal papers to be written on stamped paper, for which a revenue tax was collected. The declaration was unanimous that there should be no submission to this unjust measure, and when the ship-of-war Diligence arrived at Wilmington with the hated paper, September 28, 1765, Colonels Ashe and Waddell, leading armed men, told the ship's commander that the paper could not be landed, and he probably knowing something of North Carolina history, made no attempt to carry out his task. Again the contest was fierce, brief and decisive. The Stamp Act was annulled by the King, but only after it had already been annulled by the voice of the people, which was continuing to demonstrate its supremacy over Kings and Empires and Parliaments. Governor Tryon tried to pacify the enraged people by giving a great public feast in Wilmington, but they would have none of it, and showed their contempt for such patronizing methods by throwing the roasted meats in the river and pouring the beer on the ground. It was an open declaration that peace could only be maintained by submitting to the people's will and guarding and protecting them in their just rights; but the government failed to profit by the hint, and from that time events led rapidly to the Revolution.

May 16, 1771, in the battle of Alamance, was shed the first blood in the war for Independence. After the repeal of the Stamp Act, the taxes were increased to the limit of endurance and the extortions of corrupt officials made the bad matters worse. This moved the people to organize to regulate the abuses, and this organization, under the leadership of Herman Husbands, became known as the "Regulators." They first appealed to the courts, which showed themselves to be mockeries of justice. Then they resisted the injustices of the extortionists, and the hostility prevailed to such an extent that Governor Tryon, always ready for military display, formed an army to intimidate the Regulators. Husbands, with his followers, many of whom were unarmed and none of whom were well armed, approached the Governor's troops for a parley, and the Governor, realizing his advantage, forced a battle. To Tryon, it gave the opportunity (which he desired) to send a message to the King proclaiming "a glorious victory over the rebels." The Regulators were completely routed and the organization was ended, but rapidly from this time the British authority in North Carolina tottered to its fall, and the shedding of patriot blood opened the eyes of North Carolinians to the sober fact that though the issue had been before them for one hundred years, now they knew that British rule was not feasible in America and that the only possible permanent government in North Carolina must be founded on the consent of the governed.

April 26, 1774, William Hooper wrote to James Iredell. "With you I anticipate the important share the colonies must soon have in regulating the political balance. They are striding fast to independence, and ere long will build an empire upon the ruins of Great Britain; will adopt its Constitution, purged of its impurities, and from an experience of its defects will guard against the evils which have wasted its vigor and brought it to an untimely end." It is no wonder that Thomas Jefferson wrote to John Adams that "No State was more fixed or forward than North Carolina in the struggle for independence." About the time Hooper's letter was written,

Governor Martin (who succeeded Tryon in 1771) dismissed the Assembly with the statement that it should not meet again until peace should reign. This was a practical declaration of war, and the people met it as they had met previous abuses. There was no legal provision for them to assemble at their own will, but these men were of the kind who make precedents when there are none sufficient to the needs. John Harvey, the aged leader, even then near death, drove in his gig to meet Willie Jones, Samuel Johnston and Edward Buncombe. These fearless patriots consulted together and threw defiance to the King and his Governor by calling on their own authority an Assembly to meet in Newbern, August 25, 1774. This Assembly, the first one in America to meet independent of British authority, elected Joseph Hewes, Richard Caswell and William Hooper delegates to the Continental Congress, and made it plain that further submission to the King was not possible.

In view of this unparalleled record for independent character, there is nothing inconceivable nor inconsistent in the action of the sterling patriots of Mecklenburg assembled in Charlotte May 20, 1775, and who, upon receiving the news of the Battle of Lexington, adopted resolutions declaring: "We do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us with the mother country," "absolve ourselves from the allegiance to the British Crown," and "declare ourselves a free and independent people." At a second meeting May 31, further resolutions were adopted and provisions made for self-government. The declaration simply described actual conditions, for from May 20, 1775, North Carolina was independent of Great Britain. The militia of the counties were under arms subject to the orders of the Provincial Congress, and early in June Governor Martin went on board a war-vessel at Wilmington and British authority was thereby forever brought to an end in the State. From the ship-of-war

Governor Martin sent to England a copy of the Resolutions of May 31, which had been published in the Cape Fear Mercury and the Charleston Gazette, and said they were the most treasonable publications he had yet seen. In August of 1775 the independent government was fully organized, with Cornelius Harnett as Governor. February 27, 1776, the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge was fought and the first American victory won. April 12, 1776, the Provincial Congress instructed the North Carolina delegates at Philadelphia to vote for national independence, and in this connection it is well to note that the three delegates from Mecklenburg went to the Provincial Congress with instructions to vote for the resolution of independence.

The story of the Revolution need not be detailed here. The North Carolinians left their own State unprotected in order to aid their sister States. Cornwallis entered the State in September of 1780 as a conqueror and in anticipation of a triumphant march to join the British troops in the North, but as a result of the fighting in Charlotte and the battles of King's Mountain and Guilford Court-House, he left the State in defeat only to go to Yorktown for unconditional surrender. Thus in the study of the character of the people we reach the logical conclusion that the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence was a rational manifestation of the will of the people and in perfect harmony with the history of the State from the beginning to the end of the tremendous struggle for free and independent government "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

BIOGRAPHICAL AND GENEALOGICAL MEMORANDA.

COMPILED AND EDITED BY MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

JUDGE HENRY GROVES CONNOR.

Judge Connor was born in Wilmington, N. C., July 3d, 1852; the son of David and Mary C. (Groves) Connor. He was educated in the town schools of Wilson; married in Wilson, Kate Whitfield, daughter of George Whitfield, afterwards his law partner; he practiced law at Wilson; was State Senator, 1885; Superior Court Judge, 1885-1893; Speaker of the House of Representatives, 1889; again member of the House of Representatives in 1901; was elected Associate Justice of the Supreme Court January 1, 1903, and still continues to perform the duties of that office.

Judge Connor has always been a consistent Democrat, and his party has shown appreciation of his value, in the high offices to which he has been chosen. For many years he was President of the Branch Banking Company, Wilson, N. C. He was President of the State Literary and Historical Association, 1901-1902. He delivered an address before the Law Class of the University of North Carolina in 1899; and at the Civic Celebration at Trinity College, February 22, 1899; before the Colonial Dames of North Carolina on their annual pilgrimage to Old Brunswick, 1902. He contributed to "Great American Lawyers" a sketch of Judge William Gaston; to the Biographical History of North Carolina sketches of Judges George Howard and Charles M. Cooke; to the North Carolina Booklet, Vol. IV, an article entitled "The Convention of 1788," and in the present number one on "The Convention of 1835."

In 1908 the State University conferred on Judge Connor the honorary degree of LL.D.

In preparing a sketch of such a man as Henry Groves Connor it is only just to mention his character as a man and a private citizen, which even more perhaps than his public record has made him beloved and honored in his own community and everywhere that he is known. Judge Connor has long been a member of the Episcopal Church. His residence continues in Wilson, N. C., while his office is in the Supreme Court Building in Raleigh.

KEMP PLUMMER BATTLE.

NOTE.—A sketch of Dr. Battle appeared in Vol. VII, October, 1907, of this Booklet. Since that time Dr. Battle completed the first Volume of The History of the University of North Carolina, and in consideration of its merit, the State Literary and Historical Association awarded to him, at the annual meeting in October, 1907, the "Patterson Memorial Cup."

BRUCE CRAVEN.

Prof. Bruce Craven, the author of "The Significance of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence," was born May 14, 1881, in Trinity. He is the son of the late James L. Craven, M.D., and Mrs. Nannie Bulla Craven; grandson of Rev. Braxton Craven, D.D., LL.D., founder and president of Trinity College, and of Hon. James Ruffin Bulla, who was for many years one of North Carolina's most noted lawyers; was educated in Trinity College, and since leaving college in 1900 has been superintendent of the graded schools of Murphy and Clinton and Morganton. He has achieved distinction as a clear and strong writer, is an excellent speaker, an active member of the Methodist Church and an ardent advocate of thorough and effective education. November 5, 1901, he was married to Miss Clara Chaffin, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. R. Chaffin, of Mocksville, who was his classmate in college. In the year 1907 was superintendent of the public schools in Elizabeth City, and has been elected superintendent of the city schools of Lancaster, S. C. Mr. Craven has been active and prominent in educational work in North Carolina for several years and has achieved reputation in independent and fearless advocacy of genuine moral and intellectual training. For many years past he has been a close student of North Carolina history, particularly that of Mecklenburg County, and a frequent contributor of historical and educational discussions to leading newspapers and magazines. In the recent campaign for State prohibition he was one of the speakers for the cause. Though he has accepted the call to Lancaster, yet he remains a genuine North Carolinian for all time. His home people have watched with interest and pleasure his success in teaching and in literary and historical work.

The unveiling of a tablet to the "Ladies of the Edenton Tea Party of October 25th, 1774," will take place on October 24th, 1908, in the capitol of North Carolina.

INFORMATION

Concerning the Patriotic Society

"Daughters of the Revolution"

The General Society was founded October 11, 1890,—and organized August 20, 1891,—under the name of "Daughters of the American Revolution"; was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York as an organization national in its work and purpose. Some of the members of this organization becoming dissatisfied with the terms of entrance, withdrew from it and, in 1891, formed under the slightly differing name "Daughters of the Revolution," eligibility to which from the moment of its existence has been lineal descent from an ancestor who rendered patriotic service during the War of Independence.

"The North Carolina Society"

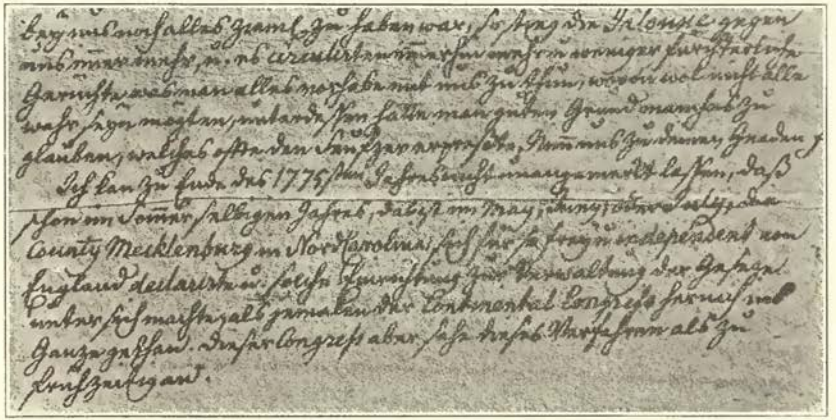
a subdivision of the General Society, was organized in October, 1896, and has continued to promote the purposes of its institution and to observe the Constitution and By-Laws.

Membershipand Qualifications

Any woman shall be eligible who is above the age of eighteen years, of good character, and a lineal descendant of an ancestor who (1) was a signer of the Declaration of Independence, a member of the Continental Congress, Legislature or General Court, of any of the Colonies or States; or (2) rendered civil, military or naval service under the authority of any of the thirteen Colonies, or of the Continental Congress; or (3) by service rendered during the War of the Revolution became liable to the penalty of treason against the government of Great Britain: Provided, that such ancestor always remained loyal to the cause of American Independence.

The chief work of the North Carolina Society for the past seven years has been the publication of the "North Carolina Booklet." It still continues to extend its work and to spread the knowledge of its History and Biography in other States.

This Society has its headquarters in Raleigh, N. C., Room 411, Carolina Trust Company Building, 232 Fayetteville Street.



Photographic Fac-simile of the Contemporary Moravian Church Record of 1775, which eminent historians declare is the final proof of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence.

Vol. VIII. JANUARY, 1909. No. 3

The North Carolina Booklet

"Carolina! Carolina! Heaven's blessings attend her!
While we live we will cherish, protect and defend her."

Published by
THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY
DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION

The object of the Booklet is to aid in developing and preserving North Carolina History. The proceeds arising from its publication will be devoted to patriotic purposes. Editors.

ADVISORY BOARD OF THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.
PROFESSOR D. H. HILL.
MR. W. J. PEELE.
PROFESSOR E. P. MOSES.
DR. KEMP P. BATTLE.
MR. MARSHALL DELANCEY HAYWOOD.
MRS. T. K. BRUNER.
MR. R. D. W. CONNOR.
DR. E. W. SIKES.
DR. RICHARD DILLARD.
MR. JAMES SPRUNT.
JUDGE WALTER CLARK.

EDITORS:

MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON, MRS. E E MOFFITT.

OFFICERS OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY DAUGHTERS OF THE REVOLUTION, 1906–1908.

REGENT:
MRS. E. E. MOFFITT.

VICE-REGENT:
MRS. WALTER CLARK.

HONORARY REGENT:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

RECORDING SECRETARY:
MRS. LEIGH SKINNER.

CORRESPONDING SECRETARY:
MRS. W. H. PACE.

TREASURER:
MRS. FRANK SHERWOOD.

REGISTRAR:
MISS MARY HILLIARD HINTON.

GENEALOGIST:
MRS. HELEN DE BERNIERE WILLS.

FOUNDER OF THE NORTH CAROLINA SOCIETY AND REGENT 1896-1902:
MRS. SPIER WHITAKER.

REGENT 1902:
MRS. D. H. HILL, SR.*

REGENT 1902-1906:
MRS. THOMAS K. BRUNER.

---

*Died December 12, 1904.

THE NORTH CAROLINA BOOKLET.

Vol. VIII JANUARY, 1909 No. 3

THE MECKLENBURG DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

BY A. S. SALLEY, JR.

For nearly ten years prior to the adoption of constitutional forms of government by the several British provinces of North America, following the breaking out of hostilities in 1775, those constitutions had been evoluting from the extra-legal committees that had from time to time during those years been organized at town and county meetings in the different sections of America. With the arising of each new cause for political dissatisfaction the number and influence of these local committees increased, and as their strength and influence increased they assumed greater powers or were voted them by the people in town or county meetings.

When the passage of the Boston Port Bill, as it was popularly called, by the Parliament of Great Britain in 1774 became known in the several provinces the local committees called meetings of the inhabitants, at which delegates were elected to provincial conventions.

The first provincial convention of North Carolina was held in New Bern August 25, 26, and 27, 1774. On the last day resolutions appropriate to the existing political conditions in America were adopted, wherein was incorporated the following recommendation looking to a closer union of the people of the province:

and it is recommended to the deputies of the several Counties, That a Committee of five persons be chosen in each County by such persons as acceed to this association to take effectual care that these Resolves be properly observed and to correspond occasionally with the Provincial Committee of Correspondence of this province.[1]

These committees were chosen soon after the adjournment of the convention.[2] The signers of the Association soon selected their committee in Mecklenburg, as was the case in the other counties. The date can not be fixed, but it was done most likely before January 26, 1775, when Governor Martin made the following statement to the Earl of Dartmouth, British Secretary of State for the American Department, in a letter of that date:

> In this Province as in all others to the Northward Committees have been Chosen by the people to carry into execution the measures of the General Congress. Your Lordship will judge of the spirit of these extraordinary Tribunals by the proceedings of that of Halifax County (of which I herewith enclose a copy) towards a very worthy and respectable merchant of that place.[3]

Martin's statement is confirmed by the action of the second provincial convention of North Carolina, held April 3-7, 1775, when occasion was taken to "recommend to the Committees of the several Counties to propose Premiums to the Inhabitants whose Industry may be a proper Subject for their Bounty."[4] Additional confirmation may be gathered from the fragmentary records of the committees of several other counties which have been published in the Colonial Records of North Carolina.

---

[1] The South-Carolina and American General Gazette, October 7, 1774; American Archives (Peter Force), Fourth Series, I, 734-737; Colonial Records of North Carolina, IX, 1043-1049. The resolution recommended that five persons be chosen but almost every county of which we have any records of the committee of selected more than that number. Rowan and New Hanover counties each selected twenty-five.

[2] In Rowan September 23, 1774 (See journal of the committee, Wheeler's Historical Sketches of North Carolina, II, 361); in Pitt December 9, 1774 (See Colonial Records of North Carolina, IX, 1095); in New Hanover January 4, 1775 (Ibid., 1107).

[3] Colonial Records of North Carolina, IX, 1115.

[4] Ibid., 1185.

We are also uninformed as to who composed the Mecklenburg committee, save that by two contemporaneous records it is shown that Ephraim Brevard was the secretary and Abraham Alexander the chairman. The first of these records was published in The South-Carolina Gazette; And Country Journal (Charles Town) for June 13, 1775; in The North-Carolina Gazette (New Bern) for June 16, 1775; and in The Cape-Fear Mercury (Wilmington) for June 23, 1775. The following are the resolutions as they appear in The North-Carolina Gazette:

Charlotte Town, Mecklenburg County, May 31.

This Day the Committee met, and passed the following

RESOLVES:

WHEREAS, by an address presented to his Majesty by both Houses of Parliament in February last, the American colonies are declared to be in a state of actual Rebellion, we conceive, that all Laws and Commissions confirmed by, or derived from the Authority of the King or Parliament, are annulled and vacated, and the former civil Constitution of these Colonies for the present wholly suspended. To provide in some Degree for the Exigencies of the County in the present alarming Period, we deem it proper and necessary to pass the following RESOLVES, viz.

1. That all Commissions, civil and military, heretofore granted by the Crown, to be exercised in these Colonies, are null and void, and the Constitution of each particular Colony wholly suspended.

2. That the Provincial Congress of each Province, under the Direction of the Great Continental Congress, is invested with all legislative and executive Powers within their respective Provinces; and that no other Legislative or Executive does or can exist, at this Time, in any of these Colonies.

3. As all former Laws are now suspended in this Province, and the Congress have not yet provided others, we judge it necessary, for the better Preservation of good Order, to form certain Rules and Regulations for the internal Government of this County, until Laws shall be provided for us by the Congress.

4. That the Inhabitants of this County do meet on a certain Day appointed by this Committee, and having formed themselves into nine Companies, to wit, eight for the County, and one for the Town of Charlotte, do choose a Colonel and other military Officers, who shall hold and exercise their several Powers by virtue of this Choice, and independent of Great Britain, and former Constitution of this Province.

5. That for the better Preservation of the Peace, and Administration of Justice, each of these Companies do choose from their own Body two discreet Freeholders, who shall be empowered each by himself, and singly, to decide and determine all Matters of Controversy arising within said Company under the Sum of Twenty Shillings, and jointly and together all Controversies under the Sum of Forty Shillings, yet so as their Decisions may admit of Appeals to the Convention of the Select Men of the whole County; and also, that any one of these shall have Power to examine, and commit to Confinement, Persons accused of Petit Larceny.

6. That those two Select Men, thus chosen, do, jointly and together, choose from the Body of their particular Company two Persons, properly qualified to serve as Constables, who may assist them in the Execution of their Office.

7. That upon the Complaint of any Persons to either of these Select Men, he do issue his Warrant, directed to the Constable, commanding him to bring the Aggressor before him or them, to answer said Complaint.

8. That these eighteen Select Men thus appointed, do meet every third Tuesday[5] in January, April, July, and October, at the Court-House, in Charlotte, to hear and determine all matters of Controversy for Sums exceeding Forty Shillings; also Appeals: And in Cases of Felony, to commit the Person or Persons convicted thereof to close Confinement, until the Provincial Congress shall provide and establish Laws and Modes of Proceeding in all such Cases.

9. That these Eighteen Select Men, thus convened, do choose a Clerk to record the Transactions of said Convention; and that said Clerk, upon the Application of any Person or Persons aggrieved, do issue his Warrant to one of the Constables, to summons and warn said Offender to appear before the Convention at their next sitting, to answer the aforesaid Complaint.

10. That any Person making complaint upon Oath to the Clerk, or any Member of the Convention, that he has Reason to suspect that any Person or Persons indebted to him in a sum above Forty Shillings, do intend clandestinely to withdraw from the County without paying such Debt; the Clerk, or such Member, shall issue his Warrant to the Constable, commanding him to take the said Person or Persons into safe Custody, until the next sitting of the Convention.

11. That when a Debtor for a Sum below Forty Shillings shall abscond and leave the County, the Warrant granted as aforesaid shall extend to any Goods or Chattels of said Debtor as may be found, and

---

[5] The South-Carolina Gazette; And Country Journal prints "Thursday," but all other contemporary copies and the county court records show "Tuesday" to have been correct.

such Goods or Chattels be seized and held in Custody by the Constable for the Space of Thirty Days; in which Term if the Debtor fails to return and discharge the Debt, the Constable shall return the Warrant to one of the Select Men of the Company where the Goods and Chattels are found, who shall issue Orders to the Constable to sell such a Part of the said Goods as shall amount to the Sum due; that when the Debt exceeds Forty Shillings, the Return shall be made to the Convention, who shall issue Orders for Sale.

12. That all Receivers and Collectors of Quitrents, Public and County Taxes, do pay the same into the Hands of the Chairman of this Committee, to be by them disbursed as the public Exigencies may require. And that such Receivers and Collectors proceed no farther in their Office until they be approved of by, and have given to this Committee good and sufficient Security for a faithful Return of such Monies when collected.

13. That the Committee be accountable to the County for the Application of all Monies received from such public Officers.

14. That all these Officers hold their Commissions during the Pleasure of their respective Constitutents.

15. That this Committee will sustain all Damages that may ever hereafter accrue to all or any of these Officers thus appointed, and thus acting, on Account of their Obedience and Conformity to these Resolves.

16. That whatever Person shall hereafter receive a Commission from the Crown, or attempt to exercise any such Commission heretofore received, shall be deemed an Enemy to his Country; and upon Information being made to the Captain of the Company where he resides, the said Captain shall cause him to be apprehended, and conveyed before the two Select Men of the said Company, who, upon Proof of the Fact, shall commit him, the said Offender, to safe Custody, until the next sitting of the Convention, who shall deal with him as Prudence may direct.

17. That any Person refusing to yield Obedience to the above Resolves shall be deemed equally criminal, and liable to the same Punishments as the Offenders above last mentioned.

18. That these Resolves be in full Force and Virtue, until Instructions from the General Congress of this Province, regulating the Jurisprudence of this Province, shall provide otherwise, or the legislative Body of Great Britain resign its unjust and arbitrary Pretentions with Respect to America.

19. That the eight Militia Conpanies in this County do provide themselves with proper Arms and Accoutrements, and hold themselves in Readiness to execute the demands and Directions of the Provincial Congress, and of this committee.

20. That this committee do appoint Colonel Thomas Polk, and Doctor Joseph Kennedy, to purchase 300lb. of Powder, 600lb. of Lead, and 1000 Flints, and deposit the same in some safe Place, hereafter to be appointed by the committee.

Signed by Order of the Committee.
EPH. BREVARD, Clerk of the Committee.

Richard Cogdell enclosed a copy of The North-Carolina Gazette containing the foregoing resolutions to Richard Caswell, in attendance on the Continental Congress in Philadelphia, in a letter, dated "New Bern 18th June 1775", in which he said: "you'l Observe the Mecklinburg resolves, exceed all other Committees, or the Congress itself. I send you the paper wherein they are incerted as I hope this will come soon to hand."[6]

Governor Martin issued a proclamation June 16, 1775, wherein he denied the allegations made by the committees of the counties in the Wilmington district of designs on the part of the British Ministry and Parliament to enslave Americans and severely denounced the associators in North Carolina.[7]

On Tuesday, June 20, 1775, the several committees in the Wilmington district met in the court house in Wilmington, and unanimously chose Richard Quince, Sr., chairman. Among the matters taken up was Governor Martin's proclamation of the 16th, and a committee of three was appointed to answer it. On Wednesday, the 21st, this committee returned its answer "which was read and ordered to be printed in the public papers and in hand bills." The preamble closed with this language:

We, then, the Committees of the counties of New Hanover, Brunswick, Bladen, Duplin and Onslow, in order to prevent the pernicious influence of the said Proclamation, do, unanimously, resolve, that in our opinion, his Excellency Josiah Martin, Esq. hath by the said Proclamation, and by the whole tenor of his conduct, since the unhappy disputes between Great Britain and the colonies, discovered himself

[6]This letter and newspaper are in the library at Hayes, the old Johnston home near Edenton.

[7]Colonial Records of North Carolina, X, 16-19.

to be an enemy to the happiness of this colony in particular, and to the freedom, rights and privileges of America in general.[8]

At a meeting of His Majesty's Council for North Carolina, held June 25, 1775, Governor Martin called the attention of the Council to the seditious Combinations that have been formed, and are still forming in several parts of this Colony and the violent measures they persue in compelling His Majesty's Subjects by various kinds of intimidations, to subscribe Associations, inconsistent with their Duty and allegiance to their Sovereign, The obliging People to frequent meetings in Arms, by the usurped Authority of Committees, the recent Assemblage of a Body of armed Men, in the town of Wilmington for the purpose of awing His Majesty's Loyal Subjects there into submission to the dictates of an illegal and tyranical tribunal erected there under that name, and the late most treasonable publication of a Committee in the County of Mecklenburg, explicitly renouncing obedience to His Majesty's Government and all lawfull authority whatsoever.[9]

In a letter written at Fort Johnston June 30, 1775, Governor Martin detailed to the Earl of Dartmouth what had happened in North Carolina since his last despatch (No. 33). He recounted the causes which had induced him to issue his proclamation of June 16, enclosing a copy thereof, and wrote of the reply of the committees at Wilmington on the 21, as follows:

The News Paper enclosed will shew Your Lordship that the same spirit of Sedition and extravagance that gave cause to that Act of Government, has produced an impudent and formal contradiction of the undeniable truths it contains, under the authority of a Committee; proving irrefragably that People embarked in a bad cause, scruple not to avail themselves of the basest falsehoods, and calumnies to support it according to custom, and as the last effort of malice, and falsehood, Your Lordship will find this Publication prescribes me as an Enemy to this Province in particular, and to America in General.

Further on Governor Martin wrote:

The Minutes of Council held at this place the other day, will make the impotence of Government here as apparent to your Lordship, as anything I can set before you.

---

[8] Ibid., 27.

[9] Ibid., 38-39.

In the next paragraph he wrote:

> The Resolves of the Committee of Mecklenburg which Your Lordship will find in the enclosed News Paper, surpass all the horrid and treasonable publications that the inflamatory spirits of this Continent have yet produced; and Your Lordship may depend, its Authors and abettors will not escape my due notice, whenever my hands are sufficiently strengthened to attempt the recovery of the lost authority of Government. A Copy of these Resolves I am informed were sent off by express to the Congress at Philadelphia, as soon as they were passed in the Committee.[10]

Governor Martin marked this letter, or despatch, "No. 34."[11] In it he mentioned three enclosures: the proclamation of June 16, the minutes of the Council meeting of June 25, which he referred to twice, and a newspaper, which he referred to twice—the first time as containing the reply made by the Wilmington district committees June 21 to his proclamation of June 16, and the second time as containing the "Resolves of the Committee of Mecklenburg." The proclamation (endorsed: "In Governor Martins of the 30 of June 1775 No. 34") and the minutes of the Council are filed with the letter in the British Public Record Office, but the newspaper is missing. The original wrapper of the despatch, whereon there doubtless was the Earl of Dartmouth's usual endorsement as to who the letter was from, the number of enclosures, etc., is missing also and the following endorsement which does not state the number of enclosures, has been made on the back of the last page of the letter: "(Origl. mislaid) Gov^{r}. Martin 30th June 1775. (No. 34.)" The following pencilled memorandum is also there: "Printed Paper taken out by M^{r}. Turner for M^{r}. Stevenson, August 15th, 1837."[12] [10]These extracts have been taken from a photograph of the original letter, which is on file in the British Public Record Office, London. See also Colonial Records of North Carolina, X, 41-50.

---

[11]The writer has had the use of photographs of the entire letter.

[12]Andrew Stevenson was then United States minister to England. In the Public Record Office is also this memorandum: "1837 July 24. Sent to Mr. Backhouse, Foreign Office, North Carolina 1774-5-6-7. No.

That memorandum and the statements in Governor Martin's letter show that but one newspaper was sent, containing both the Wilmington and Mecklenburg resolutions. Unfortunately the Governor did not mention in his letter the title of the newspaper, but it is perfectly clear that it could only have been a paper issued between June 21 and 30. The two papers then publishing in Charles Town and the one at Williamsburg were all too far off to have received the news of the 21 and returned a printed paper to Fort Johnston by the 30. The next issue of The South-Carolina and American General Gazette, which appeared June 23, is not in the Charleston Library's file, but that was too soon after June 21 to have enabled the news to reach Charles Town. The succeeding issue was June 30, and does not contain that news either. The next issue of The South-Carolina Gazette; And Country Journal was June 27, and, even if it had contained the two sets of resolutions, it could not have reached Governor Martin by June 30, but it has already been shown that the Mecklenburg resolutions were published in the issue for June 13, and the files of that paper in the Charleston Library show that the Wilmington resolutions were not published therein until July 11.

The only papers near enough to have contained the Wilmington reply of June 21 were The North-Carolina Gazette,

96. Returned to the State Paper Office 21 February 1839." It is apparent, therefore, that Mr. Turner got the paper from the Foreign Office. That he got it for his own use and not "for Mr. Stevenson" is amply attested by the following statement made in 1875 by United States Senator J. W. Stevenson, a son of Minister Stevenson, to a reporter for The New York Herald who had asked him if the paper was among the papers left by his father and then in the Senator's possession:

"That document is not among my father's papers, but in its stead is a memorandum which states that though the paper was withdrawn under the sanction of my father it was not withdrawn for his use, but for the use of another person whose name is there given." (See The New York Herald, May 15, 1875.)

of New Bern, and The Cape Fear Mercury, of Wilmington. These papers were issued every Friday. The only intervening issues, therefore, were those of June 23 and 30. It has already been shown that the New Bern paper of June 16 contained the Mecklenburg resolutions. It is hardly likely that they were repeated immediately. It is clear, therefore, that it was The Cape-Fear Mercury that Governor Martin enclosed to the Earl of Dartmouth, and, as Wilmington was too far from Fort Johnston for a paper issued there June 30 to have reached the Governor on the same day—in time to be twice mentioned in the lengthy letter in which the paper was enclosed to Dartmouth, that day—it is also clear that the date of the paper which Governor Martin sent to Dartmouth was June 23, 1775. This is confirmed by the following extracts from a proclamation which Governor Martin issued from "on board His Majesty's Sloop Cruizer in Cape Fear River," August 8, 1775:

> Whereas I have seen a publication in the Cape Fear Mercury which appears to be proceedings of a General Meeting of People stiling themselves Committees of the District of Wilmington signed Richard Quince Senr Chairman, in which the well known and incontestible facts set forth in my Proclamation bearing date the 12th day of June last are most daringly and impudently contradicted, and the basest and most scandalous Seditious and inflammatory falsehoods are asserted evidently calculated to impose upon and mislead the People of this Province and to alienate their affections from His Majesty and His Government and concluding in the true spirit of licentiousness and malignity that characterizes the production of these seditious combinations with a resolve declaring me an Enemy to the Interests of this Province in particular and America in General.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> And whereas I have also seen a most infamous publication in the Cape Fear Mercury importing to be resolves of a set of people stiling themselves a Committee of the County of Mecklenburg most traiterously declaring the entire dissolution of the Laws Government and Constitution of this country and setting up a system of rule and regulation repugnant to the Laws and subversive of His Majesty's Government.[13]

[13] Colonial Records of North Carolina, X, 142, 144.

On July 6, 1775, Governor Martin wrote a letter ("No. 35") to Dartmouth wherein he said:

I have engaged Mr Alexr Schaw whom I have now the honor to introduce to your Lordship to charge himself with this Letter, and my Dispatch No. 34.[14]

On July 16 Governor Martin wrote ("No. 36") to Dartmouth:

Since the departure of Mr Schaw who was charged with my Dispatches to your Lordship No 34 and 35, Duplicates of which are herewith enclosed. . . . Having an opportunity of writing safely by a passenger in a Merchant's Ship, I could not let it escape me without giving your Lordship the Accounts contained in this letter relative to the operations of the Army at Boston.[15]

The passenger referred to was a Mr. Burgwine, and on September 15 Dartmouth wrote to Governor Martin:

I have received from the hands of Mr Burgwine your dispatches numbered 34, 35, 36, 37 & 38, the two first being Duplicates, the originals of which you mention to have been trusted to Mr Schaw, who has not yet appeared.[16]

The original despatches numbered 34 and 35 reached Dartmouth soon thereafter, and No. 34 is in the Public Record Office, as already mentioned. The duplicate thereof, which was enclosed in No. 36 is still in the collection left by the Earl of Dartmouth, and was described, with its enclosures, in a calendar of that collection which was published in 1895. It retains its original wrapper and thereon is endorsed "North Carolina. Fort Johnston, 30. June 1775. Governor Martin. N°. 34. (Duplicate original not rec^{d}) R. Sept^{r}. 10. 1775. 3 Inclosures." Of these enclosures the minutes of the Council of June 25 is on file in the Public Record Office and is marked "Duplicate No. 36." The duplicate of the proclamation of June 16 is with the duplicate of the letter (No. 34) in the Dartmouth papers and in lieu of a duplicate copy of "the enclosed News Paper" there is a manuscript [14]Ibid., 70. [15]Ibid., 96, 98. [16]Ibid., 247.

copy of the Mecklenburg resolutions of May 31, 1775, which Governor Martin had said in his letter were printed in the "enclosed News Paper", and it is endorsed: "In Gov^r. Martins of the 30 of June, 1775. No. 34."

In a letter (No. 39) written from aboard the Cruizer in Cape Fear River August 28, 1775, Governor Martin said to the Earl of Dartmouth:

> I have found myself defeated in almost every attempt I have made to correspond with the well affected people in the upper Country. All of them who have come down here to consult me about their safety, have been intercepted coming or going, and searched, detained, abused, and stript of any Papers they have had about them except a Messenger from a considerable Body of Germans, settled in the County of Mecklenburg, who brought me a loyal declaration against the Very extraordinary and traiterous resolves of the Committee of that County, of which I had the honor to transmit a copy to your Lordship with my last Dispatches.[17]

These resolutions, published in three contemporaneous newspapers of the section; Cogdell's comments thereon in his letter to Caswell; Governor Martin's comments thereon in his letter of June 30 and the duplicate thereof enclosed in his letter of July 16; the manuscript copy thereof which Martin enclosed in his duplicate letter of June 30 accompanying his letter of July 16, and Martin's remarks on the address of the German settlers of Mecklenburg all show beyond refutation that on May 31, 1775, the committee of Mecklenburg County declared the laws of the province of North Carolina wholly suspended in Mecklenburg County and, "for the better Preservation of good Order" formed "certain Rules and Regulations for the internal Government of this County" and provided for the selection of certain officers for the county "who shall hold and exercise their several Powers by Virtue of this Choice, and independent of Great-Britain, and former Constitution of this Province." This action was not taken with any view of declaring absolute independence of Great Britain, but, as the committee themselves declared in the preamble to their resolutions, "To provide in some Degree for the Exigencies of the County in the present alarming Period" when, according to the expressed views of the committee, all laws were suspended in America by the recent acts of the British parliament.

[17] Colonial Records of North Carolina, X, 231.

The Mecklenburg records now available are so meager that we are unable to say how many of the provisions of these resolutions were carried out, but it is certain that some of them were. That the inhabitants of the county formed themselves into a militia regiment, as directed, is attested by the fact that the Provincial Congress appointed Thomas Polk colonel, Adam Alexander lieutenant-colonel and John Davidson major thereof September 9, 1775.[18] The records do not show whether the convention of selectmen, which was to act as both an executive and a judicial body, was ever organized or not, but the records of the County Court of Mecklenburg show that that court, which had been established several years before, continued to be convened the third Tuesday in every January, April, July and October thereafter up to and including the July, 1776, term; that the same justices who had composed the court before the passage of these resolutions continued to sit thereon after the passage of these resolutions, and bound men over to keep "the peace to all his Majesty's liege subjects" and, even at their July, 1776, term continued the "crown" docket to the next term; that it was discontinued only after the passage of the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, and that it was reorganized in January, 1777, after a new constitution had been adopted by North Carolina.[19]

[18]Ibid., 206.

[19]See Publications of the Southern History Association, XI, 329-338.

Another evidence that the committee had not intended a secession from the mother country when they passed these resolutions is that at the meeting of the Provincial Congress in August and September following, wherein Mecklenburg was represented by Thomas Polk, John Phifer, Waightstill Avery, Samuel Martin, James Houston and John McKnitt Alexander, that body issued an "Address to the Inhabitants of the British Empire" wherein they avowed themselves loyal subjects of Great Britain, vehemently denied that independence was their object and called on the Almighty to witness that "it is our most earnest wish and prayer to be restored with the other United Colonies, to the State in which we and they were placed before the year 1763" and finally covered the Mecklenburg case with the following language:

> Whenever we have departed from the Forms of the Constitution, our own safety and self preservation have dictated the expedient; and if in any Instances we have assumed powers which the laws invest in the Sovereign or his representatives, it has been only in defence of our persons, properties and those rights which God and the Constitution have made Unalienably ours. As soon as the cause of our Fears and Apprehensions are removed, with joy will we return these powers to their regular channels; and such Institutions formed from mere necessity, shall end with that necessity that created them.[20]

That address breathed the sentiments of the whole American people at that time—if we are to judge by their own repeated public and private utterances. But a year later it was different, and the country was ready for independence when the Continental Congress declared it. The home rule government which the committee had provided for Mecklenburg by the resolutions of May 31, 1775, now no longer acknowledged allegiance to the crown of Great Britain but to the State of North Carolina; the temporary independence became permanent, and there can be no doubt that the resolutions of May 31, 1775, very soon began to be referred to traditionally (though erroneously) as a declaration of independence. That such was the case is evidenced by the fact that scattered through a period of about forty years thereafter we find in current records an occasional reference that indicates as much. The earliest of these is to be found in some reminiscences of the Revolution prepared by Traugott Bagge, of Salem, in the neighboring county of Surry, and is as follows:

[20] Colonial Records of North Carolina, X, 201-203.

I cannot leave unmentioned at the end of the 1775th year that already in the summer of this year, that is in May, June or July, the county of Mecklenburg declared itself free and independent of England, and made such arrangements for the administration of the laws among themselves, as later the Continental Congress made for all. This Congress, however, considered these proceedings premature.[21]

The next account we have of a declaration of independence is in some rough notes prepared by John McKnitt Alexander, of Mecklenburg, in 1800. It appears that his house was burned in April, 1800; that he claimed to have lost therein some records of the Mecklenburg committee's proceedings, and that some time between April 6 and September 3, 1800, he prepared these notes, which are as follows:[22]

On the 19th May 1775[23] Pursuant to the Order of Colo Thos. Polk[24] to each Captain of Militia in his regiment of Mecklenburg County, to elect nominate and appoint 2 persons of their Militia company, cloathed with ample powers to devise ways & means to extricate themselves and ward off the dreadful impending storm bursting on them by the British Nation &c. &c.

[21]See The Wachovia Moravian for April, 1906, 2-3.

[22]The original notes in John McKnitt Alexander's handwriting are not now in evidence, but a copy thereof, which was made for Bancroft about 1855, is now in the New York Public Library and has been reproduced in fac-simile in The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence (New York, 1907) by William Henry Hoyt, A.M. The copy here given has been made from Mr. Hoyt's fac-simile. The blank spaces show where parts of the original had been destroyed.

[23]Bancroft's copyist made explanatory notes to his copy. He states in one of these that a 6 was written through this 5.

[24]The copyist states that "Adam Alexander" was stricken out and "Thos Polk" written above.

Therefore on sd 19th May the sd. Committee met in Charlotte Town (2 men from each company) Vested with all powers these their constituents had or conceived they had &c.

After a short conference about their suffering breathren beseiged and suffering every hardship in Boston and the American Blood running in Lexington &c. the Electrical fire flew into every breast and to preserve order Chosse Abraham Alex Esquire chairman & J. McK. A. Secretary[25] After a few Hour free discussion in order to give relief to suffering America and protect our Just & natural right 1st. We (the County) by a Solemn and awful vote, Dissolved[26] our allegiance to King George & the British Nation.

2d. Declared ourselves a free & independent people, having a right and capable to govern ourselves (as a part of North Carolina)

3d. In order to have laws as a rule of life—for our future Government We form[27] a Code of laws; by adopting our former wholesome laws.

4th. And as there was then no officers civil or Military in our County We Decreed that every Militia officer in sd. County should hold and occupy his former commission and Grade

And that every member present, of this Committee shall henceforth as a Justice of the Peace (in the) Character of a Committee M hear and determine all Controversies agreeable to sd. laws— peace Union & harmony in sd. County—and to use every spread the Electrical fire of freedom among ourselves & w

5th. &c. &c. many other laws and ordinances were then ma after sitting up in the Court house all night—neither

After reading and maturing every paragraph they were all passed Nem-Con about 12 o'clock May 20 1775[28]

But in a few days (after cooling) a considerable part of sd. Committee Men convened and employed Captn. James Jack (of Charlotte) to go express to Congress (then in Philadelphia) with a Copy of all sd. resolutions and Laws &c. and a letter to our 3 members there. Richd. Caswell, Wm. Hooper & Joseph Hughes in order to get Congress to sanction or approve them &c &c.

Captn. Jack returned with a long, full, complasent letter from sd. 3 members, recommending our zeal perseverance order & forbearance

---

[25]The word Secretary is interlined above J. McK. A. and the initials are jammed up to After.

[26]The word abjured is written above Dissolved.

[27]ed on the end stricken out.

[28]The figures 180 were stricken out before 1775, showing that the writer had started to write 1800.

&c. (We were premature) Congress never had our sd. laws on their table for discussion, though said Copy was left with them by Captn. Jack.

N. B. about 1787 Doctor Hugh Williamson (then of New York: but formerly was member of Congress from this state) applied above by Colo. Wm. Polk, who was then compiling a in order to prove that the American people in the Revolution and that Congress com
N. B. allowing the 19th. May to be a rash Act effects in binding all the middle & west firm whigs—no torys but not fully represented in the first

The next reference to the traditional declaration is in the following toast that was offered at a banquet held in Charlotte the night of July 4, 1808:

By Jos. Pearson—The Patriots of Mecklenburg: the first to declare Independence—May their sons be the last to acknowledge themselves slaves.[29]

The next reference is in the following extract from a valedictory address delivered at Sugar Creek Academy, Mecklenburg County, June 1, 1809, and printed in The Minerva (Raleigh) of August 10, 1809:

On the 19th of May 1776, a day sacredly exulting to every Mecklenburg bosom, two delegates duly authorized from every militia company in this county* met in Charlotte—After a cool and deliberate investigation of the causes and extent of our differences with G. Britain, and taking a view of the probable result; pledging their all in support of their rights and liberties; they solemnly entered into and published a full and determined declaration of independence, renouncing forever all allegiance, dependence on or connection with Great Britain; dissolved all judicial and military establishments emanating from the British crown; established others on principles correspondent with their declaration, which went into emmediate operation: All which were transmitted to Congress by express, and probably expedited the general declaration of Independence. May we ever act worthy of such predecessors.[30]

---

[29]See The Raleigh Register, July 28, 1808.

[30]To the asterisk in the foregoing extract the following note appeared in The Minerva: "*The present county of Cabarrus was then included in Mecklenburg."

The next discussion of this traditionary declaration was brought forth by a discussion which arose over a statement in Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry, which appeared in 1817. Wirt claimed that Henry "gave the first impulse to the ball of the Revolution," and the discussion was as to whether the earliest movements toward independence took place in Virginia or in Massachusetts. During the session of Congress of 1818-19 this controversy was a topic of conversation among congressmen, and members from North Carolina, recalling the Mecklenburg tradition, avowed that Mecklenburg County had declared independence in May, 1775, but were unable to furnish any proof of the truth of their assertions. Senator Macon showed considerable interest in the matter, and Representative Davidson wrote to Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander, a son of John McKnitt Alexander who had fostered the tradition for so many years, but who had died July 10, 1817, for information. In reply Dr. Alexander sent Davidson a paper which he gave to Senator Macon who sent it to the Raleigh Register and North Carolina Gazette[31] wherein it was published April 30, 1819, as follows:

It is not probably known to many of our readers, that the citizens of Mecklenburg County, in this State made a Declaration of Independence more than a year before Congress made theirs. The following Document on the subject has lately come to the hands of the Editor from unquestionable authority, and is published that it may go down to posterity.

North-Carolina, Mecklenburg County,
May 20, 1775.

In the spring of 1775, the leading characters of Mecklenburg county, stimulated by that enthusiastic patriotism which elevates the mind above considerations of individual aggrandisement, and scorning to shelter themselves from the impending storm by submission to lawless power, &c &c held several detached meetings, in each of which the individual sentiments were "that the cause of Boston was the cause of all; that their destinies were indissolubly connected with those of their Eastern fellow-citizens—and that they must either submit to all the impositions which an unprincipled, and to them an unrepresented parliament might impose—or support their brethren who were doomed to sustain the first shock of that power, which, if successful there, would ultimately overwhelm all in the common calamity. Conformably to these principles, Col. Adam Alexander, through solicitation, issued an order to each Captain's Company in the county of Mecklenburg, (then comprising the present county of Cabarrus) directing each militia company to elect two persons, and delegate to them ample power to devise ways and means to aid and assist their suffering brethren in Boston, and also generally to adopt measures to extricate themselves from the impending storm, and to secure unimpaired their inalienable rights, privileges and liberties from the dominant grasp of British imposition and tyranny.

[31]See Hoyt's The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, 1-3.

In conforming to said Order, on the 19th of May, 1775, the said delegation met in Charlotte, vested with unlimited powers; at which time official news, by express, arrived of the Battle of Lexington on that day of the preceding month. Every delegate felt the value and importance of the prize, and the awful and solemn crisis which had arrived—every bosom swelled with indignation at the malice, inveteracy and insatiable revenge developed in the late attack at Lexington. The universal sentiment was: let us not flatter ourselves that popular harangues—or resolves; that popular vapor will avert the storm, or vanquish our common enemy—let us deliberate—let us calculate the issue—the probable result; and then let us act with energy as brethren leagued to preserve our property—our lives,—and what is still more endearing, the liberties of America. Abraham Alexander was then elected Chairman, and John M'Knitt Alexander, Clerk. After a free and full discussion of the various objects for which the delegation had been convened, it was unanimously Ordained—

1. Resolved, That whosoever directly or indirectly abetted, or in any way, form or manner countenanced the unchartered and dangerous invasion of our rights, as claimed by Great-Britain, is an enemy to this Country,—to America,—and to the inherant and inalienable rights of man.

2. Resolved, That we the citizens of Mecklenburg County, do hereby dissolve the political bands which have connected us to the Mother Country, and hereby absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the British Crown, and abjure all political connection, contract or association with that Nation, who have wantonly trampled on our rights and liberties—and inhumanly shed the innocent blood of American patriots at Lexington.

3. Resolved, That we do hereby declare ourselves a free and independent People, are and of right ought to be, a sovereign and self-governing Association, under the control of no power other than that of our God and the General Government of the Congress; to the maintenance of which independence, we solemnly pledge to each other our mutual cooperation, our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor.

4. Resolved, That as we now acknowledge the existence and control of no law or legal officer, civil or military, within this County, We do hereby ordain and adopt, as a rule of life, all, each and every of our former laws,—wherein, nevertheless, the Crown of Great-Britain never can be considered as holding rights, privileges, immunities or authority therein.

5. Resolved, That it is also further decreed, that all, each and every military officer in this county is hereby reinstated to his former command and authority, he acting conformably to these regulations. And that every member present of this delegation shall henceforth be a civil officer, viz: a Justice of the Peace, in the character of a 'Committee man,' to issue process, hear and determine all matters of controversy, according to said adopted laws, and to preserve peace, and union, and harmony in said County,—and to use every exertion to spread the love of country and fire of freedom throughout America, until a more general and organized government be established in this province.

A number of bye-laws were also added, merely to protect the association from confusion and to regulate their general conduct as citizens. After sitting in the Courthouse all night, neither sleepy, hungry, or fatigued, and after discussing every paragraph, they were all passed, sanctioned and declared unanimously, about 2 o'clock, A. M. May 20. In a few days a deputation of said delegation convened, when Capt. James Jack of Charlotte was deputed as express to the Congress at Philadelphia, with a copy of said Resolves and Proceedings, together with a letter addressed to our three Representatives there, viz: Richard Caswell, Wm. Hooper and Joseph Hughes—under express injunction, personally, and through the state representation, to use all possible means to have said proceedings sanctioned and approved by the general Congress. On the return of Capt. Jack, the delegation learned that their proceedings were individually approved by the members of Congress, but that it was deemed premature to lay them before the House. A joint letter from said three members of Congress was also received, complimentary of the zeal in the common cause, and recommending perseverance, order and energy.

The subsequent harmony, unanimity and exertion in the cause of liberty and independence, evidently resulting from these regulations, and the continued exertion of said delegation, apparently tranquilised this section of the State, and met with the concurrence and high approbation of the Council of Safety, who held their sessions at Newbern and Wilmington alternately, and who confirmed the nomination and acts of the delegation in their official capacity.

From this delegation originated the Court of Enquiry of this County, who constituted and held their first session in Charlotte—they then held their meetings regularly at Charlotte, at Col. James Harris's and at Col. Phifer's alternately one week at each place. It was a civil Court founded on military process. Before this judicature all suspicious persons were made to appear, who were formally tried and banished, or continued under guard. Its jurisdiction was as unlimited as toryism, and its decrees as final as the confidence and patriotism of the County. Several were arrested and brought before them from Lincoln, Rowan and the adjacent counties—

[The foregoing is a true copy of the papers on the above subject, left in my hands by John M'Knitt Alexander dec'd; I find it mentioned on file that the original book was burned April, 1800. That a copy of the proceedings was sent to Hugh Williamson in New York, then writing a History of North-Carolina, and that a copy was sent to Gen. W. R. Davie.

J. M'KNITT.][32]

This production, however, is entirely inconsistent with the history of the time, both as to America in general and North Carolina in particular, as revealed by the authentic contemporary records. There is not one contemporary record in evidence to sustain it. The traditionary references to a declaration of independence heretofore quoted are neither contemporaneous nor specific, and will apply as readily to the authenticated resolutions of May 31 as to this alleged declaration of May 20. Neither Bagge nor Pearson states that the declaration to which they refer was passed May 20, 1775, by a convention. John McKnitt Alexander gave May 20 as the date of the passage of the declaration that he so poorly jotted down what he recalled concerning, but he stated that it was passed by a committee and gave none of the words of the declaration. The valedictory address follows Alexander's notes as to the day of the meeting—in fact the reference opens exactly as the amended notes opened: "On the 19th of May 1776"—but gives nothing specific in addition. A perusal of the entire address at once discloses that it was written by a person of mature years, and, as the teacher of the Sugar Creek Academy, Samuel C. Caldwell, was a son-in-law of John McKnitt Alexander, it is evident that this reference to the declaration came from the same source as the rough notes of 1800. The resolutions of May 31 preclude the possibility of any such action having been taken on May 20. The resolutions provided for the organization of the people of Mecklenburg into a regiment of militia at a future date. It is evident that the colonel of the regiment could not have called a convention of two men from each company when there were as yet no companies. The resolutions provided for the organization of a convention of two selectmen from each of these companies after their organization. It is further evident that this convention could not have been called together at a date prior to May 31 when provision was made for its organization. This narrative asserts that John McKnitt Alexander was secretary of the convention which passed the declaration. These resolutions show that Ephraim Brevard was clerk of the committee. The narrative asserts that Abraham Alexander was chairman of the convention. The following certificate, which has been published in several historical works, shows that he was "Chairman of the Committee of P. S." for Mecklenburg County:

[32]From the files in the Library of Congress.

North Carolina, Mecklenburg County, }
November 28, 1775. }

These may certify to all whom they may concern, that the bearer hereof, William Henderson, is allowed here to be a true friend to liberty, and signed the Association.

Certified by Abr'm Alexander, Chairman of the Committee of P. S.

It will be observed that parts of this "declaration" bear close resemblance to parts of the national Declaration of Independence; in fact the combinations of words "inherent and inalienable rights," "dissolve the political bands which have connected," "all allegiance," "all political connection," "free and independent," "are and of right ought to be," "pledge to each other" and "our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor" are taken verbatim therefrom. That fact, together with the fact that there had never been any widespread knowledge of the Mecklenburg traditionary declaration, raised doubts as to the genuineness of this paper. Had John McKnitt Alexander's rough notes of 1800 and the valedictory address been brought into evidence at that time, those doubts would have been increased, as critical observers would have seen at once that those two papers and the national Declaration had furnished nearly all of the material from which both the narrative and the "declaration" had been constructed. But, as none of the records which have been cited here to show exactly what it was that Mecklenburg County adopted in May, 1775, were then in evidence, and as there were many people alive who had personally witnessed the passage of what they had long regarded as a declaration of independence, there were many who readily accepted this paper as authentic. Some of those who had witnessed the proceedings in May, 1775, made statements.

One of the first of these was Col. William Polk, who was sixteen years old in May, 1775. He stated in a letter to Judge Archibald DeBow Murphey, August 18, 1819, that he could not vouch for the accuracy of the resolutions in the paper which he enclosed (a copy of the foregoing narrative and "declaration"), and which he said he had procured from Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander, but that they were "essentially correct." The Raleigh Register for February 18, 1820, published a further statement to the effect that Colonel Polk vouched for "the correctness of the facts generally, though he thought there were errors as to the name of the Secretary," etc. There is nothing in Colonel Polk's statements to prove that the declaration he witnessed the passage of was passed by a convention May 20. The imperfect knowledge which he displayed might easily apply to the resolutions of May 31, and his statement as to the secretary is in accord therewith. The paper which he sent Judge Murphey was revised by the Judge and published in The Hillsboro Recorder in March, 1821.

The next witness was Rev. Francis Cummins. He stated in a letter to Senator Macon, November 16, 1819, that he was a young man in Mecklenburg in 1775, and that "in the same year 1775, I think positively before July 4th, 1776, the males generally of that county met on a certain day in Charlotte, and from the head of the court-house stairs proclaimed Independence of English Government, by their herald Col. Thomas Polk." He stated that he was present, but did not take and keep the date and could not be particular as to that; that Rev. Hezekiah James Balch, Waightstill Avery, Hezekiah and John McKnitt Alexander and Col. Thomas Polk were the leading characters "in this business," and that Captain James Jack "was sent with the account of these proceedings to Congress, then in Philadelphia." He did not say that the "declaration" published in the Raleigh Register was the one he saw passed, or that it was passed May 20 by a convention. What he said could easily apply to the resolutions of May 31, and his statement as to Captain Jack corroborates the statement in Governor Martin's letter of June 30, 1775, that a copy of those resolutions had been sent to Philadelphia as soon as they were passed.

Captain Jack was appealed to and in a letter to Senator Macon, December 7, 1819, said that he had seen "in the news papers some pieces respecting the Declaration of Independence by the people of Mecklenburg County, in the State of North Carolina, in May, 1775"; that at that time he resided in Charlotte and had been "privy to a number of meetings of some of the most influential and leading characters of that county on the subject, before the final adoption of the resolutions"; that "among those who appeared to take the lead, may be mentioned Hezekiah Alexander, who generally acted as Chairman, John McKnitt Alexander, as Secretary, Abraham Alexander, Adam Alexander, Maj. John Davidson, Maj. (afterwards Gen.) Wm. Davidson, Col. Thomas Polk, Ezekiel Polk, Dr. Ephraim Brevard, Samuel Martin, Duncan Ochiltree, William Willson, Robert Irwin"; that "when the resolutions were finally agreed on, they were publickly proclaimed from the court house door in the town of Charlotte"; that he proceeded to Philadelphia in June and delivered the "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence of May, 1775, to Richard Caswell and William Hooper, the Delegates to Congress from the State of North Carolina; that court was in session when he passed through Salisbury. Although he had seen the "pieces" in the papers he did not say that the "declaration" included in those "pieces" accorded with his recollection of that which he took to Philadelphia, nor did he mention a convention or May 20. He said he carried the declaration to Philadelphia in June. Governor Martin said the resolutions of May 31 were sent to Philadelphia "as soon as they were passed in the Committee." The Rowan court records show that court was held in Salisbury from the 1st to the 6th of June. Jack's statement accords with Martin's and the court records. It is evident that he took the resolutions of May 31 to Philadelphia.

John Simeson, Sr., stated in a letter to Colonel Polk, January 20, 1820, that he had conversed with many of his old friends and others "and all agree in the point, but few can state the particulars"; that, "in the language of the day, every Province had its Congress, and Mecklenburg had its county Congress, as legally chosen as any other, and assumed an attitude until then without a precedent"; that Colonel Thomas Polk, "as commanding officer of the county, issued orders to the Captains to appoint two men from each company to represent them in the Committee"; that he could not remember all of the committee men but that Neill Morrison, John Flenniken, Charles Alexander, John McKnitt Alexander, Hezekiah Alexander, Abraham Alexander, John Phifer, David Reese, Adam Alexander, Dickey Barry and John Queary were some of them; that he thought Dr. Brevard drew the "declaration"; that it was "in substance and form, like that great national act agreed on thirteen months after"; that the action was taken towards the close of May, 1775; that the "committee appointed three men to secure all the military stores for the county's use—Thomas Polk, John Phifer, and Joseph Kennedy"; that he was "near the head of the line, near Colonel Polk, and heard him distinctly read a long string of Grievances, the Declaration and Military Order above." He admitted that he could remember very little, but made several statements that apply forcibly to the resolutions of May 31. (See resolution 20 in regard to the military stores.) The "long string of Grievances" are in the resolutions of May 31 and the "Military Order" is there. They are not in the Alexander "declaration." He did not mention May 20 or a convention, but said committee.

The Raleigh Register of February 18, 1820, published a certificate from George Graham, William Hutchinson, Jonas Clark and Robert Robinson reciting that they were in Charlotte May 19, 1775, "when two persons elected from each Captain's Company in said county, appeared as Delegates, to take into consideration the state of the country, and to adopt such measures as to them seemed best, to secure their lives, liberty, and property, from the storm which was gathering, and had burst upon their fellow-citizens to the Eastward, by a British Army, under the authority of the British King and Parliament"; that "the order for the election of Delegates was given by Col. Thomas Polk, the commanding officer of the militia of the county, with a request that their powers should be ample, touching any measure that should be proposed"; that to the best of their recollection the meeting took place in the court-house about 12 o'clock and Abraham Alexander was chosen chairman and Dr. Ephraim Brevard secretary; that the "delegates continued in session until in the night of that day" and "on the 20th they again met" and a committee read some resolves "which went to declare themselves, and the people of Mecklenburg County, Free and Independent of the King and Parliament of Great Britain"; that "from thenceforth, all allegiance and political relation was absolved between the good people of Mecklenburg and the King of Great Britain"; that the "Declaration was signed by every member of the Delegation"; that they were not, "at this late period, able to give the names of all the Delegation," but could safely declare Thomas Polk, Abraham Alexander, John McKnitt Alexander, Adam Alexander, Ephraim Brevard, John Phifer, Hezekiah James Balch, Benjamin Patton, Hezekiah Alexander, Richard Barry, William Graham, Matthew McClure, Robert Irwin, Zacheus Wilson, Neil Morrison, John Flenniken, John Queary and Ezra Alexander to have been thereof; that "in a few days" after the meeting Capt. James Jack carried the resolutions to Philadelphia; that "a Committee of Safety for the county was elected" and that its acts "were received as the Civil Law of the land in many cases." It is evident from the verbiage of that certificate that those who gave it refreshed their memories to a considerable extent from the publication in the Raleigh Register. Nevertheless they put into it some nuggets of truth that will not harmonize with that publication near so well as with the resolutions of May 31. They said that Colonel Polk was colonel of the militia regiment of the county and that Ephraim Brevard was the secretary of the meeting which they did not term a convention. They said the delegates "on the 20th again met." They did not remember an all-night session of delegates free from hunger and fatigue and a 2 a. m. unanimous vote on the 20th. They had an indistinct recollection of the truth, as it is revealed by the heading put to the copies of the resolutions of May 31 sent to the gazettes: "Charlotte-Town, Mecklenburg County, May 31, 1775. This day the Committee of this county met, and passed the following resolves." They did not say that the resolutions in the Raleigh Register were what they heard read that day. They said the resolutions "went to declare" independence, not that they declared it.

The foregoing statements and letters were published in a pamphlet by J. Gales & Son, Raleigh, 1822.

The next memory witness was Reverend Humphrey Hunter who wrote his Revolutionary recollections to a friend who had requested it. He said that Colonel Polk had issued orders to the several companies to select two men from each company to meet at the court house May 19, 1775, for consultation; that a larger number met on the day appointed; that there was some difficulty in choosing the "commissioners," as it would have made the meeting "too numerous" to have chosen all thought worthy; that the following were selected, and styled Delegates," according to the best of his recollection: Abraham Alexander, Thomas Polk, Richard Harris, Sr., Adam Alexander, Richard Barry, John McKnitt Alexander, Neil Morrison, Hezekiah Alexander, Hezekiah J. Balch, Zacheus Wilson, John Phifer, James Harris, William Kennon, John Ford, Henry Downs, Ezra Alexander, William Graham, John Queary, Charles Alexander, Waightstill Avery, Ephraim Brevard, Benjamin Patton, Matthew McClure, Robert Irwin, John Flenniken and David Reece; that Abraham Alexander was made chairman and John McKnitt Alexander and Ephraim Brevard secretaries. He gave a copy of the "declaration" which had appeared in the Raleigh Register and followed it with comments which clearly show that he drew upon that newspaper article for his narrative.

About 1825 the Alexander "declaration" underwent another evolution. A broadside appeared containing the first three resolutions thereof, with the names appended thereto of Abraham Alexander, Chairman; J. M. Alexander, Secretary; Adam Alexander, Hezekiah Alexander, Ezra Alexander, Charles Alexander, Waightstill Avery, Ephraim Brevard, Hezekiah J. Balch, Richard Barry, John Davidson, William Davidson, Henry Downs, John Flenniken, John Ford, William Graham, James Harris, Robert Irwin, William Kennon, Matthew McClure, Neill Morrison, Samuel Martin, Duncan Ochiltree, John Phifer, Thomas Polk, Ezekiel Polk, Benjamin Patton, John Queary, David Reese, Zacheus Willson and William Willson as signers of the "declaration". The alleged copy of the "declaration", which Alexander had furnished to Davidson, contained no signatures and the only mention of signers in documents then in evidence was that made in the certificate by Graham, Hutchinson, Clark and Robinson. This broadside contained the name of every man who had been mentioned by any of the memory witnesses as having anything to do with the "convention," or committee. It bore many internal evidences of not being a contemporary publication, and, much faith having been put in its authenticity by the super-credulous, its compiler, Dr. J. G. M. Ramsey, and printer, F. S. Heiskell, stated that it had been printed in Knoxville, Tenn., "in 1825 or thereabouts." The minutes of the county court of Mecklenburg for the July and October, 1775, and January, April and July, 1776, terms show that Robert Harris, Abraham Alexander, Robert Irwin, Richard Barry, John Foard, Hezekiah Alexander and Adam Alexander, all alleged "signers" of the "declaration," sat as justices during that time; and, notwithstanding the "declaration" they are alleged to have signed in May, 1775, held court in the name of the Crown.

On October 11, 1827, James Johnson, of Knox County, Tenn., certified to the best of his recollection that "in the month of May, 1775, there were several meetings in Charlotte concerning the impending war"; that being young he was not called upon to take an active part, but that he positively remembered that Mecklenburg County held a "convention," declared independence and "sent a man to Philadelphia with the proceedings." He did not say this was done May 20, and did not say that the "declaration" was in the same words as the Alexander production.

July 4, 1828, The Charleston Mercury published another version of the "declaration" slightly different in verbiage from all previous versions. The contribution was signed "Guilford." In November of the same year another slightly different version appeared in Garden's Anecdotes of the American Revolution, but it is plainly to be seen upon comparing the Guilford and Garden versions that the latter was revised from the former.

In 1829 Judge F. X. Martin, of Louisiana, published a history of North Carolina in which he incorporated this "declaration." It is clear from the context, the circumstances under which it appeared, and the absence of accurate references to the source from which it was obtained, despite the claim in his preface that his work had been prepared twenty years before, that this version of the "declaration" was obtained after the other chapters of his work had been prepared, and the correspondence of Judge Murphey, now in evidence, shows that Martin used the version Judge Murphey published in 1821.

In the same year that Martin's history appeared Thomas Jefferson's works were published, and therein was found a letter from Jefferson to John Adams in which Jefferson declared that this "declaration" was spurious and that he had never heard of it before. Letters of Adams and additional letters of Jefferson still in manuscript show that Adams fully agreed with Jefferson. Jefferson's letter aroused renewed interest in the matter in North Carolina and drew from Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander the following contribution, which appeared in The Yadkin and Catawba Journal, of Salisbury, of November 9, 1830, under the caption "Declaration of Independence, by the citizens of Mecklenburg County (then including Cabarrus) North Carolina, on the 20th day of May, 1775", and over his full signature:

Estimating this transaction as giving the primary impulse to our national independence; as directly operative in producing the Declaration subsequently made by the Legislature of North Carolina; then by the Legislature of Virginia; and perfected on the 4th of July, 1776, by our National Congress; it becomes a matter of high importance to establish the fact, that the citizens of Mecklenburg county, through their delegates, on the 20th of May, 1775, drew up, signed and promulgated a Declaration of Independence of the British Government, and transmitted the same to the Congress of the United States for their approbation.

In claiming this as the patriotic achievement of our forefathers, we wish to derogate nought from the patriotism and energy of any State, or of any individual on earth, but at the same time, we feel bound, by the most sacred obligations of truth and justice, to guard this our birthright with vigilance.

To every ingenious mind, the difficulty is at once obvious of establishing by positive proof, such a transaction, 55 years after its occurrence, when no record of the transaction could be officially kept; when a long Revolutionary war supervened; the place of its occurrence, for a season, being in the occupation of the enemy; when all the delegates are in the silent grave,[33] and when the validity of the transaction has never been called in question until Mr. Jefferson, in a letter of his recently published, pronounced it "a spurious and unjustifiable quiz";—but difficult as the task may appear, we dread not to meet the closest scrutiny. [Here follow resumes of the certificate of Graham, Hutchinson, Clark and Robinson and the statements of Simeson, Cummins and Jack. These are followed by a resume of a certificate from William S. Alexander, a resume of the statement in Hunter's journal, resumes of statements by Joseph Graham and John Davidson, resumes of certificates by Isaac Alexander and Samuel Wilson, and a resume of the statement by James Johnson.]

There is now a paper in my possession, written and signed by J. M. Alexander, and purports to be extracted from the old minutes, &c Of this there is no date to show when these extracts were made, the introductory part is similar, as far as it goes, to that placed in the hands of Gen. Davie. The Resolves entered into, are in this extract noticed as follows: [Here follows a resume of the John McKnitt Alexander rough notes of 1800.]

I hold these papers, certificates, &c., subject to the inspection of any one desirous of examining them.

From the proceeding certificates, it appears most probable that there were drawn up by a select committee, a declaration of grievances and a formal Declaration of Independence, which, if so, was the paper sent on by Captain Jack to Congress; the original of which is lost to us through the death, shortly afterwards, of Dr. Ephraim Brevard, the Chairman of the Committee, and by the occupation of Charlotte by Cornwallis, where the Dr. lived, and where his papers probably were. But be this as it may, we have an authentic copy of these resolves and bye-laws mentioned in so many of the certificates, in the handwriting of John McKnitt Alexander, and certified by him as Clerk, which had been by him deposited with Gen. Wm. R. Davie, for the use of some future historian; and after the death of the General, procured and deposited with us, by Dr. Samuel Henderson, now Clerk of the Superior Court of this County. [Here follow the resolutions that he had furnished to Davidson and Polk in 1819, and which had been published in The Raleigh Register and The Hillsboro Recorder.]

These Resolves having been concurred in, bye-laws and regulations for the government of a standing Committee of Public Safety were enacted and acknowledged, &c. &c. The whole proceedings of the delegation, though interesting, are too long for this publication; but to show, in accordance with Gen. Graham's certificate, as to Dunn and [33]He overlooked the fact that Major John Davidson, an alleged "Signer" of the "declaration" was still alive and had lately made a statement for him.

---

Booth, that municipal authority was assumed and acted on by the Committee of Public Safety, I will only copy a certificate now in my possession, viz: [Here follows the certificate, already quoted, from Abraham Alexander, Chairman, relative to William Henderson and following that is a digression to acts and doings of the Provincial Congress of North Carolina in 1776 that have not the remotest bearing on the acts and doings of Mecklenburg County in May, 1775. The contribution then closes with a few remarks criticising Thomas Jefferson.]

Joseph McKnitt Alexander.

Joseph Graham, in a letter to Dr. Alexander, October 4, 1830, said he would give "the details of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence on the 20th of May, 1775," as well as he could recollect them "after a lapse of fifty-five years"; that he was present on the occasion, "a lad about half grown"; that during the winter and spring preceding several popular meetings were held in Charlotte at which papers were read, grievances stated and public measures discussed; that on the 20th of May, 1775, "besides the two persons elected from each militia company (usually called Committee-men), a much larger number of citizens attended in Charlotte than at any former meeting"; that the news of the battle of Lexington had arrived; that the "committee were organized in the Court-house by appointing Abraham Alexander, Esq. Chairman, and John McKnitt Alexander, Esq. Clerk or Secretary to the meeting"; that after the usual reading of papers and much animated discussion "they resolved to declare themselves independent"; that "among other reasons offered" was one "that the King or Ministry had, by proclamation or some edict, declared the Colonies out of the protection of the British Crown"; that Doctor Brevard, Mr. Kennon and a third person whom he could not recall were appointed to draft the declaration and retired from the court house, but that while they were out the "committee continued in session in it"; that upon the return of the "sub-committee" Dr. Brevard

"read their report, as near as I can recollect, in the very words we have since seen them several times in print"; that the instrument was read at the court house door; that he understood afterwards that Captain Jack "undertook, on request of the committee, to carry a copy of their proceedings to Congress" and that on his way, at Salisbury Mr. Kennon publicly read the declaration, which was approved by the crowd present. It is evident that Graham's memory had been much refreshed by the publications he had been reading, but, notwithstanding that, the facts that had imbedded themselves in his memory would come forth occasionally. He remembered that the body that passed the declaration was a committee and not a convention. The only reason he could remember of all those assigned why independence should be declared was "that the King or Ministry had, by proclamation or some edict, declared the Colonies out of the protection of the British Crown," and that is the very reason why the resolutions of May 31 were adopted, as set forth in the preamble thereto.

Major Davidson, in a letter to Dr. Alexander, October 5, 1830, said that he had been a member of the "Convention" and that he was the sole survivor thereof, but that "being far advanced in years" and not having his "mind frequently directed to that circumstance for some years" he could give "but a very succinct history of that transaction"; that "there were two chosen from each captain's company, to meet in Charlotte, to take the subject into consideration"; that when they met "a motion was made to declare ourselves independent of the Crown of Great Britain," which was carried by a large majority; that Dr. Brevard prepared the "sketch of the Declaration of Independence" and that Captain Jack took it to Philadelphia. The only participant in the proceedings who has ever made a statement in regard thereto since the publication of the Alexander "declaration" did not proclaim that the declaration he had assisted in the passing of. He did not say that it was done May 20, 1775.

The certificate which Dr. Alexander alleged that he had from William S. Alexander was to the effect that he "was in Philadephia in the Spring of 1775," and that "on the day General Washington left that city to take command of the American army in the north" he met Captain Jack who told him that Mecklenburg County "had declared themselves independent of the Government of Great Britain, and that they had sent him on express with their Declaration, to Congress," and that he had delivered it to the North Carolina delegation in Congress. He said nothing that could not be applied to the resolutions of May 31 as the declaration that Jack told him of.

Isaac Alexander and Samuel Wilson, who had also witnessed the proceedings in May, 1775, also gave certificates to Dr. Alexander reciting the fact that they had been present when the declaration was passed. Alexander gave the dates May 19 and 20, and thought that the "declaration" furnished by Dr. Alexander was what he had seen adopted. Wilson was not definite in his statements. Their testimony, like that of all of the others will apply as readily to the authenticated resolutions of May 31 as to the "declaration" of May 20, which is unsupported by a single contemporary document or reference.

The General Assembly of North Carolina at the session of December, 1830—January, 1831, appointed a special committee to examine the evidence bearing on the Mecklenburg "declaration" and other matters and report the result of their work. The report expressed the belief that Mecklenburg County did pass the "declaration" that Dr. Alexander had furnished to Davidson in 1819. It was then resolved that the Governor "be directed to cause to be published in pamphlet form" the report of the special committee, "the Mecklenburg Declaration, with the names of the Delegates composing the meeting"; the statements of the memory witnesses heretofore cited, and other papers bearing on other matters. In carrying out the resolutions of the General Assembly Governor Stokes engaged David L. Swayne, a judge of the Superior Court, to edit the pamphlet. His preface thereto is a resume of the evidence bearing on the Alexander "declaration" and an argument for its authenticity. The "names of the delegates present" are declared to be Thomas Polk, Ephraim Brevard, Hezekiah J. Balch, John Phifer, James Harris, William Kennon, John Ford, Richard Barry, Henry Downs, Ezra Alexander, William Graham, John Queary, Abraham Alexander, John McKnitt Alexander, Hezekiah Alexander, Adam Alexander, Charles Alexander, Zacheus Wilson, Sr., Waightstill Avery, Benjamin Patton, Matthew McClure, Neil Morrison, Robert Irwin, John Flenniken, David Reese, Richard Harris, Sr. No information whatever is given as to where this list was obtained, or how it was compiled. If there is anywhere in any contemporary record a mention of the names of the Mecklenburg committee, or of the convention of selectmen provided for by the resolutions of May 31, it has never been put in evidence. It is quite certain that this list was compiled from the various lists given by the memory witnesses. It differs from the list compiled by Ramsey for his broadside in 1825, and contains fewer names than were mentioned by the memory witnesses. Some names had doubtless been edited out to avoid dilemmas. William Davidson and Samuel Martin, for instance, were citizens of Rowan County and Ezekiel Polk, of South Carolina. John Davidson was probably left out because his memory had not been clear enough on what the convention of which he claimed to have been a member did. William Kennon was a citizen of Rowan County and should not have been on this list.

Waightstill Avery could not have been present, for his fee book, which is extant, shows that during the month of May, 1775, he was in attendance upon the courts of Rowan, Guilford and Surry Counties, and the Rowan court records show that he was appointed "Attorney for the Crown" at Salisbury August 2, 1775. There was no such person as Richard Harris, Sr. There was a Robert Harris in Mecklenburg taking a conspicuous part in public affairs in 1775. John Foard's name is misspelled in the pamphlet. Following the "names of the delegates present" is a copy of the Alexander "declaration." Following this are the exhibits. The first (A) is a reprint of the article in the Raleigh Register of April 30, 1819. Following this is the following certificate (B):

I, Samuel Henderson, do hereby certify, that the paper annexed was obtained by me from Maj. William Davie in its present situation, soon after the death of his father, Gen. William R. Davie, and given to Doct. Joseph M'Knitt by me. In searching for some particular paper, I came across this, and knowing the handwriting of John M'Knitt Alexander, took it up and examined it. Maj. Davie said to me (when asked how it became torn) his sisters had torn it, not knowing what it was.

Given under my hand, this 25th Nov. 1830.

Sam. Henderson.

To this certificate there is the following note:

To this certificate of Doct. Henderson is annexed the copy of the paper A, originally deposited by John M'Knitt Alexander in the hands of Gen. Davie, whose name seems to have been mistaken by Mr. Jefferson for that of Gov. Caswell. * * * This paper is somewhat torn, but is entirely legible, and constitutes the "solemn and positive proof of authenticity," which Mr. Jefferson required, and which would doubtless have been satisfactory, had it been submitted to him.

The certificate of William S. Alexander, who was then dead, was not printed in the pamphlet, but, in its stead, there is a certificate from Alphonso Alexander, Amos Alexander and J. M'Knitt that they had often heard him say that he had met Jack in Philadelphia and learned from him that he "was there as the agent or bearer of the Declaration of Independence made in Charlotte, on the twentieth day of May, seventeen hundred and seventy-five, by the citizens of Mecklenburg, then including Cabarrus, with instructions to present the same to the Delegates from North Carolina, and by them to be laid before Congress." A glance at that certificate shows that the affiants were more than "willing" witnesses. Captain Jack could not have told William S. Alexander all that they certify that he told them Jack said, nor does this certificate accord with what is credited to him in The Yadkin and Catawba Journal of November 9, 1830, nor with Captain Jack's own statement.

On November 12, 1776, a convention of the people of North Carolina met at Halifax to adopt a constitution for the independent State of North Carolina—so made by the national Declaration of Independence, passed the preceding 4th of July. Mecklenburg was represented in that convention by John Phifer, Robert Irwin, Zacheus Wilson, Hezekiah Alexander and Waightstill Avery. They had been elected by the freemen of the county November 1, 1776. They had been given certain instructions to follow in the State convention. In 1837 a Charlotte newspaper published a draft of "Instructions for the Delegates of Mecklenburg County, proposed to the consideration of the County." It was dated September 1, 1776. Wheeler, who subsequently published it in his Historical Sketches of North Carolina, says: "It was found among the old surviving papers of John McKnitt Alexander, and he is the author of them." Wheeler probably got his information from the newspaper, which is not at hand, but that he is correct is attested by the instructions that were adopted at the county meeting and which were printed in the North Carolina University Magazine, 4, 259, with a note saying that they were "in the well-known sharp, angular handwriting of Colonel Avery, with the exception of Sections 17 and 18, which are in the small cramped hand of John McKnitt Alexander. Sections 10, 11 and 13, as appears from a marginal note in the handwriting of Mr. Alexander, were rejected by the people." In addition to this direct statement as to Alexander's connection with the instructions that were adopted, enough of the ideas of the draft found among Alexander's "old surviving papers" were incorporated into them to confirm Wheeler's statement that he was the author of that draft. That draft also contains some of the very words and ideas of the alleged "declaration" of May 20, 1775. "North Carolina is and of right ought to be, a free and independent State," and "unalienable Rights" are familiar expressions to the point. Like the national Declaration, the rough notes of 1800 and the valedictory address it was evidently used in the preparation of that "declaration."

Prior to this time no copy of the resolutions of May 31 had been brought into the controversy, but in 1838 Peter Force, the well-known historical writer, called attention to an epitomised copy thereof in The New York Journal of June 29, 1775, credited to The South-Carolina Gazette; And Country Journal of June 13, 1775, and another such copy in The Massachusetts Spy of July 12, 1775, credited to the same gazette, and suggested that these resolutions probably accounted for the Mecklenburg tradition. In 1840-1841, while working in London, Sparks saw a copy of The South-Carolina Gazette; And Country Journal of June 13, 1775, which Governor Wright, of Georgia, had sent to London, and in 1848 Bancroft also saw it. Both of these eminent historians publicly called attention to their discoveries and expressed the opinion that the resolutions of May 31 constituted the foundation for the tradition and the testimony of the memory witnesses. But the Alexander "declaration" had now become a reality with, a part of the Presbyterian religion of, and a test of patriotism with many North Carolinians and reliable evidence and logical deductions could not throw it down from the pedestal upon which myth-worshipping idolators had placed it.

About 1845, after the death of Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander, the papers which he had bearing on the "declaration" were given into the custody of the State. A paper before unmentioned was now discovered among them. It contained the same resolutions and historical note, with a few textual variations, as were published in the Raleigh Register of April 30, 1819.[34] There were several evidences on the face of the paper, however, to show that it was not copied but was improvised as the writer went along. At the end of the 5th resolution, for instance, the writer had written the word State, but seeing that it would not fit the history, struck it out and wrote province. Other words had been stricken out and better words interlined; another evidence of improvisation and not copying. In the narrative the constructor of this paper wrote: "From this delegation originated the Court of Enquiry of this county, who constituted and held their first session in Charlotte immediately on Lord Cornwallis leaving Charlotte in the year 1780—they then held their meetings regularly at Charlotte, at Col. James Harris's," etc. But when the constructor saw that to mention Cornwallis and 1780 would spoil the story he struck the references out. To this paper and the "half sheet" whereon John McKnitt Alexander's rough notes had been written the following certificate was attached:

No. Carolina,
Mecklenburg County.

The sheet and torn half sheet to which this is attached (the sheet is evidently corrected in two places by John McKnitt Alexander as marked on it☞—the half sheet is in his own handwriting) were found after the death of Jno. McKnitt Alexander in his old mansion house in the centre of a roll of old pamphlets, viz: "an address on public liberty printed Philadelphia, 1774"; one "on the Disputes with G. Britain, printed 1775"; and "an address on Federal policy to the Citizens of No. Ca. held at Halifax the 4 of April, 1776," which papers have been in my possession ever since. Certifyed Novr. 25th, 1830.

[34] A paper, prepared for Bancroft, showing these variations, is in the New York Public Library.

J. McKnitt.

In an address delivered at an Academy near Charlotte, published in the Raleigh Minerva of 10th Augt., 1809, the Mecklenburg Declaration is distinctly stated, etc.

As to the full sheet being in an unknown handwrite, it matters not who may have thus copyed the original record: by comparing the copy deposited with Genl. Davie they two will be found so perfectly the same, so far as his is preserved, that no imposition is possible—the one from the same original as the other is conclusive. I have therefore always taken from the one which is entire, where the other is lost. the entire sheet is most probably a copy taken long since from the original for some person, corrected by Jno. McKnitt Alexander, and now sent on. the roll of pamphlets with which these two papers were found I never knew were amongst his old surveying and other papers untill after his death. They may have been unrolled since 1788.

J. McKnitt.

About 1853 ex-Governor Swain, Historical Agent for North Carolina, took these papers from the State archives to the University of North Carolina. The Davie "copy," so often mentioned by Dr. Alexander, was now examined by Professor Charles Phillips of the faculty of the University, who discovered that all of it was gone except the last two resolutions and the following certificate in the handwriting of John McKnitt Alexander, which had received no notice from Dr. Alexander, the legislative committee, or Swain.

It may be worthy of notice here to observe that the foregoing statement, though fundamentally correct, may not literally correspond with the original record of the transactions of said delegation and court of inquiry, as all these records and papers were burnt with the house on April 6, 1800; but previous to that time of 1800 a full copy of said records, at the request of Dr. Hugh Williamson, then of New York, but formerly a representative in Congress from this State, was forwarded to him by Colonel William Polk, in order that those early transactions might fill their proper place in a history of this State, then writing by said Dr. Williamson, in New York. Certifyed to the best of my recollection and belief, this 3d day of September, 1800.

J. McK. Alexander.

With the documents before us that have heretofore been cited there can be no reasonable disputation of the conclusion that the paper sent to Davidson by Dr. Alexander, and subsequently published in numerous newspapers and books, was a fabrication. That it was fabricated after the formation of Cabarrus County in 1792 is quite certain and, as John McKnitt Alexander made no mention of Cabarrus in his rough notes of 1800, it is evident that it was fabricated after the publication in 1809 of the valedictory address wherein was incorporated that foot-note about Cabarrus; otherwise there would have been no occasion to bring into the narrative that extraneous reference to Cabarrus.

In the first paper which Dr. Alexander gave out he avoided acknowledging that John McKnitt Alexander was his father; hid his identity under the signature "J. M'Knitt"; mentioned "papers" left in his hands by "John M'Knitt Alexander dec'd," although he produced only one paper, and did not say how many more there were or what their import was; and did not say that John McKnitt Alexander was the author of the paper or tell how the latter came into possession of it, or in what shape it was. He stated that he had found it "on file that the original book was burned April 1800. That a copy of the proceedings was sent to Hugh Williamson in New York, then writing a History of North-Carolina, and that a copy was sent to Gen. Davie." He never produced that "file" during the whole controversy over his paper, but when we compare his first certificate with that of his father on the Davie "copy" it is evident that he was cognizant of the statement his father had made in that certificate in reference to the burned records. In his article in the Yadkin and Ca- tawba Journal he stated that there was "an authentic copy of these resolves and bye-laws mentioned in so many of the certificates, in the handwriting of John McKnitt Alexander, and certified by him as Clerk which had been deposited with Gen. Wm. R. Davie, for the use of some future historian." He knew that that was false, for the Davie "copy" contained the father's certificate that that paper was not taken from an original record but was prepared from memory and was only true to the best of his belief, and there was nothing thereon to show that he claimed to have been clerk of the body that passed the "Declaration" which he saw voted. He made it appear that he had the "whole proceedings of the delegation" which, "though interesting," were "too long for this publication." He forgot that at the very outset of the same article he had said that it was difficult to prove a thing after fifty-five years "when no record of the transaction could be officially kept." As a matter of fact he never did have a single original record and all that he was ever able to produce was the rough notes, the paper of doubtful origin and the Davie "copy" and of that only the last two resolutions and the certificate were left. At the outset he gave the impression that no records of the convention had been kept, yet at a later point stated that he had in his possession a paper "written and signed by J. M. Alexander, and purports to be extracted from the old minutes." The father tells us that the records had been burned in his house, but says not a word about his notes being a copy of those same original records. The son intimates to us that no official minutes had been kept, and then tells us that he has some extracts taken from the minutes by his father. But the Bancroft copy of those notes shows the evidence on their face of having been written in 1800. In his paper of 1819 Dr. Alexander said the paper had been "left in my hands by John M'Knitt Alexander dec'd" but in his certificate to the rough copy of the declaration and the rough notes he said they "had been found after the death of Jno. McKnitt Alexander in his old mansion house in the centre of a roll of old pamphlets" which "may have been unrolled since 1788." Not only are the two statements irreconcilable, but contradict the father's statement that his house was burned in 1800 and everything lost. The rough draft of the "declaration", which had been shown by evidence on its face to have been fabricated, was the basis for his subsequent copies for Davidson and Polk, for he tells us in the last certificate that he had "always taken from the one which is entire, where the other is lost." The "other" he referred to was the Davie "copy." He also tells us that "it matters not who may have thus copyed the original record." It does matter, however, for it is evident that no "original record" was copied at all. This is not only shown by the face of the paper itself but by the certificate of the father which shows that the "original record" had been destroyed.

We might excuse Dr. Alexander's failure to see that the paper in the unknown hand contained statements contradictory of the rough notes in his father's hand and language stolen from the national Declaration of Independence, on the ground of lack of critical discernment, but for the fact that even after he got the Davie "copy," which should have set him straight, he, even more than before, tried to keep up the deception. The Davie paper was most likely a polished version of the rough notes of 1800, but Dr. Alexander maintained in his certificate of November 25, 1830, that it was "perfectly the same" as the rough draft and that both had been copied from "the original record." The only evidences to connect John McKnitt Alexander with this rough draft, which was the prototype of what was first published in the Raleigh Register, are the statements of Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander that it had two corrections in his father's handwriting (only one is noted by Bancroft's copyist) and that it was "perfectly the same" as the remaining fragment of the Davie "copy," which Henderson certified was in John McKnitt Alexander's handwriting. It seems hardly possible that John McKnitt Alexander would have put only two corrections on a paper which contained statements in conflict with his rough notes and his certificate to the paper he gave General Davie. He would doubtless have noticed that this paper said convention and not committee as he had said.

It will be observed that Henderson did not certify that the fragment of the Davie "copy" which he found was "perfectly the same" as corresponding parts of the resolutions in the Raleigh Register, nor did any one else who saw it before or after it fell into the hands of Dr. Alexander so certify. The legislative committee has left no statement to that effect, and the editor of the pamphlet which was issued by legislative authority merely appends a note to Henderson's certificate saying that to the certificate there is annexed the copy of the paper A "originally deposited by John M'Knitt Alexander in the hands of Gen. Davie" and that "it is somewhat torn, but is entirely legible." There is no evidence that Judge Swain wrote that note or saw the paper himself. That he did not and that he accepted that note, ready made, from Alexander is attested by the following statement made by Professor Charles Phillips in letters to Lyman C. Draper, June 8, and June 22, 1875:

> Gov. Swain had very little confidence in Dr. Jos. McKnitt Alexander; and evidently knew more about him than he told me * * * * treading on delicate ground when insinuating that Dr. Joseph McKnitt Alexander was guilty of a discreditable suppressio veri; he used to talk of it to me confidentially as a dirty trick but one which he could not expose.

With the Alexander papers before him Professor Phillips, aided and abetted by Governor Swain, published in the North Carolina University Magazine for May, 1853, an exposition of the May 20 fraud. From an official supporter thereof Governor Swain had now become (temporarily) a repudiator thereof. In one of the letters above cited Professor Phillips said that there was "no evidence that John McKnitt Alexander claimed for himself the Secretaryship in 1775" and that the "introductory portion, with the first three of the Resolves, had been torn off the Davie copy," so that they had no opportunity to test the handwriting, though he noted one difference in the two papers. In another letter Professor Phillips wrote: "The condition of the originals in our possession here, the diversity of handwriting, the frequent interlineations, erasures, etc., show that the younger Alexander tried to set forth a poem in Alexandrian measure."

It is very doubtful, therefore, if the original Davie "copy" was "perfectly the same" as the rough draft of the "declaration" in the unknown hand from which Dr. Alexander had "always taken" his copies. By the fragment of it which was left it was impossible to show that it had ever contained the narrative which was published in the Raleigh Register, and which contains so many statements at variance with well-established facts, or that the first three resolutions thereof were in the same language as the corresponding resolutions of the publication in the Raleigh Register, which contain all of the expressions stolen from the national Declaration of Independence, and, in the fourth and fifth resolutions, notwithstanding the interlineations, erasures, etc., Professor Phillips still noted one difference. An examination of the carefully made Bancroft copy of the rough notes will confirm Professor Phillips's statement as to the interlineations and erasures. Particularly is that the case in the matter of John McKnitt Alexander being named as secretary. A word was evidently erased and his initials crowded in its place and the word secretary interlined.

That Dr. Alexander tried to force the Davie "copy" and his father's rough notes to conform to his Raleigh Register publication seems quite likely, and that he was the fabricator of that document is attested by the very best of circumstantial evidence. The writer is not alone in that opinion. In a letter to Draper, July 31, 1875, Professor Phillips said that about 1857 Governor Swain submitted "all the original documents in his possession touching on the subject of the Mecklenburg Declaration" to former Chief-Justice Thomas Ruffin, and asked him for a candid and impartial opinion thereof; that, after due examination, Judge Ruffin returned the papers with the remark:

> I want no better case to convict the parties concerned of forgery.

In a letter to his daughter, written a few years after this, Professor Phillips said:

> This is Meckl. Decl. time & N. C. has made herself ridiculous as usual of late. When she cd. & might read a veritable Decl. of 1775, she tries to perpetuate the paper of May 20, & so endorse what Judge Ruffin called—"to all intents & purposes a forgery." My Presbyterianism & my patriotism boil with indignation at the fraud of Joe McKnitt Alexander, at its unworthy success.

There are several little internal evidences in some of the papers which Dr. Alexander published that tend to strengthen the opinions of Swain, Phillips, Ruffin and the writer. Once he got that idea into his head about Cabarrus County it asserted itself on all occasions. It appeared with his "declaration," then in his contribution to the Yadkin and Catawba Journal and in the certificate which he, Amos Alexander and Alphonso Alexander furnished for the legislative pamphlet. In the certificate which he attached to the rough draft of the "declaration" and his father's rough notes he mentioned the valedictory address, wherein the fact that Cabarrus had formerly been a part of Mecklenburg was first stressed, thus showing that there was where he first got that idea which he injected into his narrative accompanying his "declaration." Another internal evidence is that in all papers that were submitted as proof of the fact of a declaration, from his "declaration" itself to his final certificate, he signed himself "J. M'Knitt," but when he wrote a defence of his evidence and his own position he signed his name in full.

In concluding the writer will say that he was once a believer in this "Mecklenburg Myth," as it has now come to be generally known in historical circles, but that he was convinced of its lack of authenticity by the late distinguished historian, Edward McCrady, and that a few years ago he was drawn into the controversy over it by the publication in Collier's of Millington Miller's forgery purporting to be an issue of The Cape-Fear Mercury of Friday, June 3, 1775, containing a contemporary copy of the "declaration." The moment the writer saw that publication he pronounced it a forgery and, so far as has yet been shown, was the first to so declare in the public prints, and the records will show that, while others were still defending Miller's production as genuine, he was turning up the proofs which eventually convicted him of forgery to the satisfaction even of those who had formerly defended the forgery.

THE MECKLENBURG DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

BY BRUCE CRAVEN.

"No less than seven witnesses of most unexceptionable character swear positively that there was a meeting of the people of Mecklenburg at Charlotte, on the 19th and 20th days of May, 1775; that certain declarations distinctly declaring independence of Great Britain were then and there prepared by a committee, read publicly to the people by Col. Thomas Polk, and adopted by acclamation; that they were present and took part in the proceedings themselves, and that John McKnitt Alexander was a Secretary of the meeting."—Rev. Francis L. Hawks, D.D., LL.D., in New York, December 16, 1852.

"The documentary evidence in my possession satisfies me that there was a meeting of the citizens of Mecklenburg at Charlotte, on the 19th and 20th of May, 1775, and that resolutions in relation to independence were discussed and adopted. I entertain the opinion that the resolutions of the 31st May, were the resolutions published in the Cape Fear Mercury."—Governor D. L. Swain, in a letter to Hon. George Bancroft, March 6, 1858.

"The manuscript (May, 20) applies to Mecklenburg County alone; that county only is declared independent. The declaration (May, 31) is not for one county of one colony. It is a declaration of independence of the United Colonies, and made by men who saw far into the future—whose patriotism was not limited by the boundaries of their own county."—Col. Peter Force, December 11, 1841, in a letter to John Vaughn.

"Thus was Mecklenburg County in North Carolina separated from the British Empire."—George Bancroft's History, Volume 7, page 231, discussing the resolves of May, 31.

Cui Bono? Some wise man has observed that the only justification for anything to be said or written is that it has never been said before or that it has not been said so well. Judged by this criterion in the face of the evidence alluded to above, the perennial outbursts against the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence are so futile as to approach banality. If all the variegated criticisms and witticisms could be brought together and condensed, it would amount to merely "words, words, words, no matter from the heart." Omar Khayyam was a little previous but he struck these anti-history people a sharp blow in his verse about hearing great argument "but evermore came out by the same door wherein he went."

"Who can refute a sneer?" asks Paley in his Moral Philosophy, and the question has not been answered. In the shadow of slander, virtue is at a disadvantage in defending itself. The suspicion-breeder is worse than the cuttle-fish, because he hides within pretensions to noble things. This mere groundless suspicion is all there has ever been in refutation of the unshaken testimony of actual witnesses of the proceedings on the occasion of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence —suspicion conceived in envy, born in malice, nurtured in conceit, and kept alive in vain imaginations. Not one fact has been presented against the Declaration's authenticity (which has been proven by positive testimony) but it seems that the friends of the facts are expected to explain the endless profusion of delusive suspicions and aspersions invented by the experts in mythology. Though obviously unfair, this expectation will be satisfied until there be "no hinge nor loop to hang a doubt on."

Suppose at this late date some sensation monger should cast suspicion upon the Magna Charta signed by King John at Runnymede, June 15, 1215; that the suspicious ones should argue that there was only an uneventful assembly on that occasion; that later some of the Barons drew up the document and it was accepted (not by John) but by his successor Henry III at the famous conference at Bristol, November 11, 1216. Such quibbling could not shake the faith in the accepted history, but the hypothesis could not be proven untrue to the satisfaction of the ones who for reasons of their own might wish to believe them. Verbum sap sapienti.

The motive in this case on the part of the detractors is self-evident. It is the same motive that is responsible for the fact

